The televised trial was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. Saddam was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for his political harangues, and his half-brother and co-defendant, Barzan Ibrahim, once showed up in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

The nine-month, 39-session trial had inflamed the nation. Three defense lawyers and a witness were killed.

"Long live the people and death to their enemies. Long live the glorious nation, and death to its enemies," Saddam cried out after the verdict, before bailiffs took his arms and walked the once all-powerful leader from the courtroom. There was a hint of a smile on Saddam's face.

With justice for Saddam's crimes done, the U.S.-backed Shi'ite prime minister called for reconciliation and delivered the most eloquent speech of his five months in office.

"The verdict placed on the heads of the former regime does not represent a verdict for any one person. It is a verdict on a whole dark era that was unmatched in Iraq's history," Nouri al-Maliki said.

The White House praised the Iraqi judicial system and denied that the U.S. had been "scheming" to have the historic verdict announced two days before American midterm elections, widely seen as a referendum on the Bush administration's policy in Iraq.

President Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"It's a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government," the president said. "Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come."

DOJ_NMG_0091071

But many nations voiced opposition to the death sentences, including France, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Sweden. A leading Italian opposition figure called on the continent to press for Saddam's sentence to be commuted to life imprisonment.

Saddam was found hiding with an unfired pistol in a hole in the ground near his home village north of Baghdad in December 2003, eight months after he fled the capital ahead of advancing American troops. Twenty-two months later, he went on trial on charges that he ordered the torture and killing of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail.

Saddam said those who were killed had been found guilty in a legitimate Iraqi court for trying to assassinate him in 1982. But about 50 of the accused died during interrogation before they could be executed, and some of those hanged were children.

Ibrahim, Saddam's half-brother and intelligence chief during the Dujail killings, also was sentenced to death, as was Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, which issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents.

Former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder and sentenced to life in prison.

Three defendants were given up to 15 years in prison for torture and premeditated murder. Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid and his son, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, were party officials in Dujail, along with Ali Dayim Ali. They were thought to be responsible for the Dujail arrests.

Mohammed Azawi Ali, a local Ba'ath Party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

In the streets of Dujail, a Tigris River city of 84,000, people celebrated and burned pictures of their former tormentor as the verdict was read. In Baghdad, the Shi'ite bastion of Sadr City exploded in jubilation.

But in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, not far from Dujail, 1,000 people defied the curfew and carried pictures of the city's favorite son through the streets. Some declared the court a product of the U.S. "occupation forces" and condemned the verdict. Policemen wept in the streets.

"By our souls, by our blood, we sacrifice for you, Saddam," the Tikrit crowds chanted.

The death sentences automatically go to a nine-judge appeals panel, which has unlimited time to review the case. If the verdicts and sentences are upheld, the executions must be carried out within 30 days.

A court official said the appeals process was likely to take three to four weeks once the formal paperwork was submitted. If the verdicts are upheld, those sentenced to death would be hanged despite Saddam's second, ongoing trial on charges of killing thousands of Iraq's Kurdish minority.

Saddam Hussein Death Sentence A Milestone (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD

Celebratory gunfire swept across parts of Baghdad and other Iraqi cities Sunday as Saddam Hussein and two former top Iraqi officials were sentenced to die for crimes against humanity.

Defiant as the historic verdict was read, Mr. Hussein accused the judge of the US-created tribunal of being a "mouthpiece of occupation and colonialism," and cursed "your law and your articles and clauses."

Amid fears and explicit warnings that a death sentence would deepen bloodshed, Baghdad and two restive provinces were placed under an open-ended curfew for vehicles and pedestrians.

The tribunal is the first such court since Nuremburg's Nazi war-crimes trials to hand down a death sentence. After appeal, Hussein faces hanging.

The tribunal's creators had hoped that the forum would play a central role in closing the door on 30 years of ruthless oppression under Hussein. Indeed, Shiites and Kurds, who bore the brunt of tens of thousands of deaths at the hands of the regime, were jubilant. But that joy was tempered among Sunnis disenfranchised by Hussein's overthrow, and angry over what many saw as a political trial overly dependent on American experts and resources. The result, experts say, is a positive step for Iraqi justice, but one that reveals a deep and continuing weakness in the rule of law.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki heralded the result as "the end of a dark era," and a reason for hope among Iraqis battered by 3-1/2 years of Sunni-led insurgency and sectarian violence that the UN says takes nearly 3,000 Iraqi lives each month.

"Maybe this will alleviate the pain of the widows and orphans, and those forced to bury their loved ones," Maliki said. "The era of Saddam is now the era of the past. It is an era of dictators like Mussolini and Hitler. We are determined to build an Iraq without mass graves, without Anfal, and without wars, without military coups."

US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad called the verdict an "important milestone" for Iraq.

The tribunal, partly due to its heavy reliance on American resources and expertise and the blatant interference of senior Iraqi officials, has drawn criticism from international legal experts. Maliki recently said: "God willing, the verdict of death will soon be issued against the tyrant Saddam."

"This tribunal has suffered an unusual number of problems, compared to other tribunals" such as those of the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, says Miranda Sissons, head of the Iraq program of the New York-based International Center for Transitional Justice.

Deteriorating security has been a crucial issue, experts say, along with the inexperience of Iraqi judges and lawyers, and little reference to lessons learned from other international tribunals, or to non-US experts.

"If there is one thing that will make this court a laughing stock, it is continued executive interference in its work," says Ms. Sissons. "Mistakes were made in setting up the tribunal that shouldn't have been made."

Still, she adds, "this was not a sham trial. It was always an ambitious undertaking. The judges have done their best in difficult circumstances, coming from a very low base."

Amnesty International, which opposes capital punishment, said on Sunday that the tribunal had missed an opportunity to establish the rule of law in Iraq, and to ensure "truth and accountability for the massive human rights violations perpetrated by Saddam Hussein's rule."

The case dealt with a 1982 assassination attempt against Hussein in the town of Dujail, which prompted revenge killings of 148 people, deportation of 400, and razing of orchards. One intelligence document indicated the level of torture used against the 148, noting that "of those who were sentenced to death, 46...had been eliminated or died during the investigation."

But it is only the first in a dozen or so being prepared against Hussein and the former regime by the troubled Iraqi High Tribunal, which has been dogged by legitimacy issues, the murder of three defense lawyers, the resignation of one chief judge, an array of confusing testimony, and a multitude of farcical in-the-dock antics by Hussein and his codefendants.

The second, much larger case, charges genocide and covers the 1988 Anfal campaign against the Kurds in which up to 180,000 were killed. Legally, Sunday's death sentences will go through an automatic appeals process with no deadline. If the verdict is confirmed, the sentence must be carried out within 30 days. Hussein had requested execution by firing squad, normally reserved for the military.

Death sentences Sunday were also delivered to Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half-brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was sentenced to life in prison; three lesser officials were handed 15-year jail sentences. The oldest defendant, a local Baath Party official in Dujail at the time, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

The Iraqi High Tribunal was expressly set up to enable Iraqis to feel "closer" to justice in the "New Iraq" created by the 2003 US invasion and subsequent occupation.

When the first trial began in October last year, Iraqis were at first riveted by the proceedings of the court, in which tearful witnesses - often testifying anonymously from behind a curtain - spelled out their suffering after the Dujail incident.

But it was not long before the novelty began to wear off of seeing Hussein and his co-accused engaging in feisty, irreverent arguments with judges and even guards during the trial's 39 sessions. Average Iraqis became more focused on day-to-day survival amid ongoing carnage. Sunday's verdict, finally, caught the nation's attention again.

"Saddam deserves to face such a court and I don't know how he could escape a guilty verdict for Dujail or more important cases," says Wamidh Nadhmi, a political science professor in Baghdad who manages a Sunni-led political coalition. "But now we are seeing more killing, more bloodletting than during his era."

Mr. Nadhmi helped Hussein in 1959, when he fled to Cairo after participating in a botched assassination attempt against the sitting leader.

"They promised us - the Americans - there would be democracy and human rights. But we see them violated in every day's happenings," says Professor Nadhmi. "The majority of Iraqis think the drastic failure of this regime and the Americans to bring security and human rights to Iraq, does not entitle them to conduct such a trial [or] issue a guilty verdict."

But the sentencing, regardless of its imperfections, is likely to be seen as justice by Iraqis who often did not grasp the magnitude of Hussein regime crimes - often heard about, but rarely physically encountered - until scores of mass graves began being unearthed starting in 2003.

Besides the Dujail and Anfal cases, tribunal investigators say they have documented evidence of more than 100,000 people tortured and killed in the aftermath of the 1991 Shiite uprising.

Some 5,000 Kurds were killed by chemical weapons in Halabja in 1988. Hussein ordered his armies into Iran in 1980, sparking nearly a decade of war that left 1 million dead and wounded, and in which Iraq used chemical munitions. And Iraqi troops occupied Kuwait in 1990.

Iraqis reeled from the legacy of those acts, but could rarely quantify them until the regime fell. Among the most poignant scenes came in late April 2003, just two weeks after the fall of Baghdad, at a graveyard adjacent to the Abu Ghraib prison. There, some 993 graves were marked only with crude numbered signs, until families, most of them Shiites, found lists that matched victims' names with numbers. "O my father, my father!" lamented Mustapha al-Fadil at the time, weeping uncontrollably at grave No. 659, when his family came to dig up the remains for reburial.

Fadil Sadoun, an overtly religious man, had been arrested in 1996 and never came home. "You should be happy," mourned the son. "Saddam is gone."

The scene repeated itself hundreds of times that day, with broken families taking home the broken remains of executed loved ones. At least they could be identified; most mass graves around Iraq are filled with anonymous victims.

But if state-sanctioned violence defined the former regime, Hussein threatened its use again on Sunday, when defense lawyers reported, after a lengthy talk with their client, that the former Iraqi dictator vowed to "die with honor and with no fear."

Americans in Iraq, defense lawyers quoted Hussein as saying, "will see rivers of blood for years to come. It will dwarf Vietnam," [a news service] reported.

Days earlier, Hussein's chief defense counsel, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said after a guilty verdict, "The doors of hell will open in Iraq, the sectarian divide in the country will deepen, and many more coffins will be sent back to America."

But Iraq's prime minister, whose own Islamic Dawa Party had claimed responsibility for the Dujail assassination attempt, saw it differently. "The martyrs and all Iraqis have a right to smile," said Mr. Maliki.

Saddam Verdict Is Met With Mixed Reactions In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The trial of Saddam Hussein that ended Sunday with a guilty verdict and death sentence for the former Iraqi leader, once viewed as a means of reconciliation and justice, instead seemed to fuel the sectarian division that grips the country.

Some Shiites and Kurds celebrated. Some Sunnis mourned angrily. For large swaths of the Iraqi people, Saddam has ceased to be the mesmerizing patriarch who once towered over their nightmares and lives. Many interviewed on Sunday and in recent months said they had laid him to rest long ago, more worried about the internecine violence wracking the country.

"The verdict was right, but prolonging it faded the cheerfulness," said Sameer Asadi, a 38-year-old taxi driver in the southern Iraq city of Basra.

Though Iraqi government officials argue that putting him to death could stymie the hopes of Sunni insurgents, many of those battling daily against U.S. and Iraqi forces long ago dispensed with Saddam as an inspiration, perhaps even before he was found and arrested by U.S. troops nearly three years ago.

The verdict, however, will be felt by many in Iraq as another in a series of divisive jabs in the ongoing battle between Iraq's long-oppressed majority Shiite Muslims and once-powerful Sunni Arabs now incensed over their loss of centuries-old dominance.

Saddam and seven co-defendants faced charges of crimes against humanity for the deaths of 148 Shiite Muslims, who were killed after a failed assassination attempt against the Iraqi leader in the town of Dujail in 1982. Saddam and two other defendants received the death penalty Sunday, which will be automatically appealed, while four defendants received lesser sentences and another was acquitted of charges.

The yearlong trial may or may not have met international standards for war crimes tribunals. Several human rights organizations that monitor such trials said Sunday that it didn't. "We're concerned that flaws in the trial process will jeopardize much of the trial's impact," said Miranda Sissons, head of the International Center for Transitional Justice's Iraq program said in a release.

U.S. officials hailed the verdict as a triumph of "transparency" and an example of the kind of due process denied Iraqis under the former regime.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people's effort to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," President Bush told reporters in Waco, Texas. "It is a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government."

But such lessons on the healing power of the courtroom and virtues of law may well be lost in contemporary Iraq, where the hundreds who die each week in civil warfare dwarf the 148 Iraqis slain by Saddam's regime after the 1982 assassination attempt in Dujail.

As the verdict was broadcast on television, war cries broke out on both sides of the sectarian divide.

Noisy demonstrations broke out in Shiite districts of the capital. Revelers pointed their AK-47s into the air and let loose a 15-minute burst of celebratory gunfire. Many held of posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose followers nightly snatch Sunni Arab men off the streets and torture them with electrical appliances before shooting them in the skull.

"God avenged the killer of my sons," said a 65-year-old woman in the Shiite city of Najaf who gave her name as Um Hassan.

She said lost two of her four boys to Saddam's security forces in the 1991 crackdown on a Shiite insurrection in southern Iraq. "The death penalty is not enough," she said. "I want him to be buried alive twice as he did with my sons."

Even Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, the pious Islamic activist leading this fragmented country, joined in the celebration of fellow Shiites.

"This is the day where you see the dictator after arresting him in his miserable hole, being tried facing the penalty he deserves," comparing him unfavorably to al-Sadr's father and uncle, who were both famous Shiite clerics slain by Saddam's regime.

"Iraqis have the right to smile and rejoice a little for the death sentence issued against this criminal and his minions," he said in a television address.

In Sunni Arab towns and neighborhoods, however, there was sullen anger and public displays of support for the former dictator. Clashes and mortar-fire in Sunni neighborhoods in the capital left at least four dead. They held up Iraqi flags and framed portraits of the man they still call "our president," humiliated that he was to be hung like a common criminal.

"He did not throw them into a big hole and set them on fire," Ameen Adib, one of Saddam's defense lawyers, said of the 148 victims from Dujail. "He just gave them justice. If I were to judge Saddam Hussein I would have given him a medal for his conduct in this issue."

Before the verdict, Khalil Dulaymi, Saddam's lead attorney, described the tribunal examining the Dujail case as an "Iranian court," as if Shiite prosecutor Jaffar Mussawi and Kurdish Judge Raouf Abdul Rahman did not even qualify as fellow Iraqis.

"The judges and the prosecution were appointed according to a sectarian criteria," he said. "They're all either Kurds or Shiites."

Demonstrations in support of deposed former president broke out Sunday in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, as well as other Sunni enclaves, despite a ban on vehicular and pedestrian traffic. In the nearby town of Dorr, hometown of fugitive Saddam loyalist Izzat Douri, rioters torched the local courthouse.

"This is a phony court," said Adel Hussein 27, a Sunni mechanic in the city of Samarra. "This court was formed on sectarian basis and it contains the judges that are related to (al-Maliki's) Dawa Party and other parties that are in the government now."

In the courtroom Sunday, Iraq's sectarian divide -- the two worldviews battling for supremacy of Iraq -- also played out. Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, a member of the defense team, had submitted a brief questioning the court's legitimacy and by extension the U.S.-led invasion and the Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated government it spawned.

The judge exploded. "Out, Out!" he hollered in English at the befuddled Clark, who appeared befuddled as he was escorted out by several bailiffs. "Get him out. He's coming from America to insult the Iraqi people and the court."

Applause erupted from the visitors' gallery.

After acquitting one defendant and sentencing the three others to 15 years each in prison for their roles in the Dujail killings, the judge sparred with former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan, sentencing him to life in prison.

Ramadan exploded. The facts, the witnesses and the testimony in presented in the case were all for show, a cover for a vendetta, he charged.

"It is very clear that the verdict was previously set and had nothing to do with all the trial sessions," he said.

The judge quickly handed a verdict of death by hanging to Awad Hamed Bandar, the chief judge of Saddam's Revolutionary Court. Both the visitors in the gallery and Bandar began chanting, "God is great."

"God is greater than the unjust," Bandar said as Abdel Rahman completed the verdict. "God is greater than the occupier. God is greater than the colonizers. God is greater than the collaborators."

Saddam, wearing his signature black suit and white tie, walked into the courtroom with an air of somberness and gravity, casting himself as the wounded symbol of the Sunni Arab pride that was the cornerstone of his Baath Party's ideology.

"I will listen to the judgment," he said, looking much more somber and downcast than he has in past court appearances. "But I will not stand up."

A bevy of bailiffs surrounded him, forcing him to stand up. One glared at him with what appeared to be a mocking smile as the former president was sentenced to hang for crimes against humanity, including murder, imprisonment, torture, forcible imprisonment and relocation.

"Long live Iraq!" Saddam said, holding up a green Quran. "Long live the Arab nation. Down with the agents! God is great! Long live the people!"

Then Saddam, who helped launching Iraq's sectarian and ethnic divides by targeting Shiites and Kurds throughout the 1980s and 1990s, took on the role of healer of a country being torn asunder by sectarian passions.

"We recommend the great Iraqi people forgive all those who strayed and we recommended the great Iraqi people not to be angry at the people of the countries that participated in occupying your country," he said.

"Don't push," he told the bailiff escorting him out the courtroom. "I am your brother."

Iraqis Consider The Impact Of Verdict (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Celebratory gunfire that erupted Sunday after the announcement of Saddam Hussein's death sentence dissipated quickly as Iraqis went about their lives in a city fractured by sectarian violence.

In other areas, the verdict was denounced. Demonstrators in Tikrit, the former Iraqi leader's hometown, defied a curfew and carried his picture through the streets. Residents of some Sunni neighborhoods in the capital traded gunfire with police, while mortar shells burst in other Sunni areas.

“I don't think it will have much effect,” said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of parliament. “The whole trial hasn't been all fair or free. There have been a lot of defects from the trial from the start. So people aren't caring so much.”

Othman said the court's decision could worsen tensions between Sunnis and Shiites. Sunnis ruled Iraq under Saddam, who ruthlessly persecuted Shiites and Kurds. Now, Shiites dominate the government.

Many in Iraq's majority Shiite population were joyous. Residents of Sadr City, a Shiite neighborhood here, poured into the streets.

Mahmoud Fadhil's brother Mohammed was executed in 1985 by Saddam's government. When the verdict was read, Fadhil, 39, ran into the street and fired his AK-47 rifle into the air. “God's justice has been achieved today, but I'm afraid that they will delay the execution,” he said. “I will not feel comfortable before seeing the rope wrapping Saddam's neck.”

One Sunni leader said Saddam's hanging could spawn more killings. “This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands whose blood will be shed,” Saleh al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told Al-Arabiya television.

The government sought to minimize violence, banning vehicle and pedestrian traffic in Baghdad and other restive provinces indefinitely.

The trial's climax came nearly three years after Saddam was pulled from his hide-out by U.S. troops. The delay between his capture and conviction, and the deterioration of security conditions here, sapped the news of some of its power, Othman said.

Hussein Sentenced To Death By Hanging (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 -- A divided and violence-ridden Iraq broke into starkly disparate displays of emotion on Sunday after judges in Baghdad condemned former president Saddam Hussein to hang for crimes against humanity.

In the south, a Shiite Muslim father held aloft the tiny, shrouded remains of a young son killed long ago during Hussein's armed campaign against the majority sect. The father danced with his son's bones in the street among celebrating crowds, elated at the news.

In the north, a Sunni Arab man in Hussein's home city strapped an explosives belt around his waist and vowed to avenge the death penalty handed to the former dictator.

"Today's sentences were a death sentence on righteousness, and this makes it obligatory to take the revenge for Iraq," said the man, 29-year-old shopkeeper Ibrahim Yahya, joining other Sunnis in jabbing rifle muzzles and pistols in the air in angry protest.

Elsewhere, Kurds pounded giant drums in traditional celebration. Shiite boys and men threw candy and fired into the air. Bitter-faced Sunni men clasped Hussein's portrait in one hand, a weapon in the other. The varied reactions demonstrated how long-standing divisions have widened in Iraq since Hussein's fall and threatened to divide and bloody the country further.

In Baghdad's Green Zone, a five-judge Iraqi panel announced a unanimous sentence of death for Hussein and two of his seven co-defendants, including Hussein's half brother. Four other defendants were sentenced to prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and an eighth was acquitted.

The sentences of death and life imprisonment will be automatically appealed, with no time limit set for the appellate judges' decision.

If Hussein is executed, it would cut short his prosecution for campaigns in the 1980s and '90s in which his government allegedly killed tens of thousands -- or more -- of Shiites and minority Kurds. The charges on which he was convicted Sunday arose from an incident of lesser magnitude: the retaliatory executions of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s.

The United States largely funded Hussein's trial, and U.S. officials close to the trial said Sunday's outcome vindicated the policy of having courts in individual nations try cases involving war crimes and crimes against humanity. The Bush administration has been a leading opponent of international tribunals, fearing that U.S. soldiers could be tried before them for political reasons.

After a meandering, year-long trial, Sunday's sentencing was rapid-fire, brusque and volatile.

"Make him stand up," Chief Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman ordered after Hussein, wearing the same dark suit and open-collared shirt he had worn for most of the trial, took a seat when he entered the courtroom and refused to rise.

Six Iraqi guards hauled Hussein to his feet and held his arms behind his back as his fate was declared. The former leader broke into shouts as soon as Abdel-Rahman began reading. In the five minutes that followed, each man shouted increasingly louder to be heard over the other.

"Long live the nation! Down with the criminal invaders! Down with the spies! Down with the occupiers!" Hussein declared, thrusting his finger in the air, his body shaking with rage.

One of the Iraqi guards put his face within a few inches of Hussein's to watch the former leader's reaction as the death sentence was read. Smacking gum open-jawed, the guard smiled mockingly, then laughed.

"The court has decided to sentence Saddam Hussein al-Majid to death by hanging," Abdel-Rahman said.

"Go to hell! You and the court!" Hussein shouted. "You don't decide anything, you are servants of the occupiers and lackeys! You are puppets!"

"Take him out!" the judge shouted at the end of a declaration convicting Hussein on five of six charges of crimes against humanity.

"Long live the Kurds!" the 69-year-old leader shouted as the guards pulled him to the courtroom door. "Long live the Arabs!"

His co-defendants heard their fate with equal defiance. "It's all in the hand of the Almighty! It's all in the hands of the holy warriors!" shouted Taha Yassin Ramadan, a vice president under Hussein, as the guards pushed him out of the courtroom after his life sentence was announced.

Minutes earlier, at least six guards had surrounded former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark, one of the defense attorneys, and hustled him out of the courtroom. "Get him out! Get him out!" Abdel-Rahman shouted in English, outraged at a court filing submitted by Clark that apparently referred to the trial as a travesty. "He's coming from America to insult the Iraqi people and the court," the judge added in Arabic.

Above the courtroom, VIPs in a visitor's gallery hidden from view applauded when Clark was ejected. "God is greatest!" the unseen spectators cried later, when the first death sentence was announced. Officials said the spectators included some of the survivors of the campaign in Dujail as well as Iraq's current interior minister and other politicians.

The Shiite politicians who lead Iraq's coalition government went on television after the court session to congratulate the victims of Hussein and condemn his leadership. "The Saddam era is over, and his party has become part of the past," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said on al-Iraqiya state television. Maliki's Dawa party carried out the 1982 assassination attempt in Dujail that led Hussein to order the executions.

Jubilant men and boys poured onto the streets of Shiite communities across southern and central Iraq, despite a curfew imposed to try to prevent violent reactions to the verdict. In Baghdad, officers in the Shiite-dominated police forces celebrated by handing out candy from their patrol vehicles and blaring cassettes hailing Shiite political leaders.

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, in the south, the celebrating crowds included boys and young men marching in the old military uniforms of fathers allegedly killed by Hussein's government.

A white-haired, gray-robed man in his 50s, who identified himself only as Abbas, walked among them holding up the swaddled bones of his son Hassan. All of Abbas's sons disappeared in 1991, along with thousands of other Shiites, as Hussein's forces crushed a Shiite uprising after the Persian Gulf War.

Only last week, Abbas had recovered the remains of Hassan, who was 4 when he disappeared, after an official's chance discovery of an old grave holding five bodies. On Sunday, Abbas had been taking his son's body for burial, but when he saw the demonstration, he stopped his car in the middle of the road. Soon he was jumping up and down among the crowd, holding up Hassan's bones for all to mourn.

"Saddam took my sons from me," Abbas said. He began crying. "What was the crime that my son committed? He was only 4."

North of Baghdad, in Hussein's birthplace of Auja, black-robed women with reddened eyes walked along Saddam Hussein Road to a house belonging to members of Hussein's extended family, where they joined the women there in a kind of wake.

"The grief we are going through is unbearable, and we wish we were dead before seeing or hearing this verdict," said Suad Mohammed, 40, her voice hoarse with tears and shouting.

"What happened today at the court gives us the resolve and the power to go ahead on the road of holy war," said Marwan Hakam, a teacher in the city of Tikrit, not far from Auja. "All must now carry arms to fight the Americans."

"I have sworn by God that I shall not go home and will detonate this explosives belt on American forces," said Yahya, the Tikriti shopkeeper.

Samarra and other predominantly Sunni cities and towns also saw protests, with crowds at times shooting at or setting fire to government buildings. They revived a chant that had dominated their lives during Hussein's 24-year authoritarian rule: "Our blood and our souls we sacrifice for you, Saddam."

Many Shiites and Sunnis, however, said that the sectarian violence since Hussein was toppled by a U.S.-led invasion in 2003 has made life now far grimmer. Some warned of worse to come: "This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands whose blood will be shed," Salih al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told al-Arabiya satellite television.

Hussein To Die By Hanging (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein was pronounced guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced Sunday to death by hanging, capping a long and arduous first trial against the notorious former dictator.

As Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman of the Iraqi High Tribunal read the verdict, Hussein defiantly shouted over him, ridiculing the court, the Iraqi government and the U.S.-led military presence in Iraq.

"Long live the Iraqi people, damnation for the damned. You are the servants of the colonizers," he bellowed at the panel of judges, wagging his finger and trembling throughout the outburst.

"Long live the people, long live the Arab nation! Down with the agents. Down with the occupier."

Despite a curfew and heavy security precautions in some parts of Iraq, the verdict was quickly greeted with both street celebrations and protests.

In heavily Shiite areas of southern Iraq, jubilant crowds danced in the street and celebrated the outcome. In Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, about 2,000 Iraqis took to the street in defiance of a government curfew and peacefully protested the verdicts.

Meanwhile, in Baghdad, clashes were reported in the Sunni neighborhood of Ahdamiyah and celebratory gunfire resounded through the mostly quiet streets of other parts Baghdad--which was also on a security lockdown--as the sentencing against Hussein was announced.

In the trial for the 1982 killings of 148 people, two of Hussein's co-defendants, Barzan al-Ibrahim, the former Iraqi intelligence chief and Hussein's half-brother, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the Revolutionary Court judge, also were sentenced to be executed by hanging.

The court also convicted former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan of premeditated murder and sentenced him to life in prison. Three other co-defendants of Hussein -- Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, Ali Dayih Ali and Abdullah Kazim -- were convicted of murder and torture and sentenced to up to 15 years in prison.

An eighth defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, a low-ranking Baath party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

When Hussein was brought into the dock, he immediately sat down in his chair and initially refused to comply with the judges order to stand for the reading of his sentence. He mockingly told the judge that he could hear him just as well from his chair.

Eventually, two bailiffs were ordered to lift the former dictator to his feet, and he remained standing for the rest of the proceedings.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said he hoped that the verdict would help bring about reconciliation. He invited former regime elements that "do not have Iraqi blood on their hands" to join the political process.

"It is the end of the black period and the start of a new period in Iraq," al-Maliki said in a televised address from his office in Baghdad's Green Zone.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad offered congratulations to the Iraqi people.

"A former dictator feared by millions, who killed his own citizens without mercy or justice, who waged wars against neighboring countries, has been brought to trial in his own country – held accountable in a court of law with ordinary citizens bearing witness," Khalilzad said in a statement.

"Although the Iraqis may face difficult days in the coming weeks, closing the book on Saddam and his regime is an opportunity to unite and build a better future. As the Iraqi people move forward, the United States will support them in their efforts to build a just and democratic society."

The verdict comes nearly three years after U.S. forces captured the dictator, unkempt and burrowed away in an underground hiding place in the village of Adwar.

The verdict and sentencing automatically will be sent for review to a nine-member appellate court. It could be several months, if not longer, before the sentences are carried out.

The capital remained on lockdown as the rulings against Hussein and his co-defendants were read in the courtroom deep in the Green Zone, the tightly-guarded compound in central Baghdad that is also home to the U.S. embassy and various Iraqi government buildings.

Fearful that there would be a surge in violence in response to the verdict, the government banned people from the streets of the capital on Sunday. Beyond Baghdad, a curfew was imposed on the Salahuddin province, which includes Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, and the restive provinces of Diyala.

On Friday, the Iraqi government ordered its security forces on high alert, canceling leaves for police officers and soldiers. The government, fearing that former regime loyalists would target Dujail, deployed extra troops to the village.

Hussein's lawyers, Khalil al-Dulaimi and former U.S. Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark, have warned that a death sentence for Hussein surely would lead to increased violence. Both lawyers also protested the timing of the verdict and sentencing, just two days before U.S. voters go to the polls to vote in mid-term congressional elections.

Before the session began on Monday, Clark was ejected from the courtroom after handing the judge a memorandum in which he called the trial a travesty.

Those involved in the trial have faced constant danger since the court convened last year. Three defense attorneys were killed, 200 relatives of victims of Dujail have been murdered and several families of witnesses have been moved inside the Green Zone because of safety concerns, said Bassem Ridha, the Iraq government's court observer (this sentence as originally posted has been corrected).

The Dujail trial centered on Hussein's government systematically rounding up and killing 148 Shiite Muslims from the northern Iraqi town after an attempt to assassinate Hussein there in July 1982.

During the 40-session trial, the prosecution presented incriminating documents. They included an execution order for 148 people signed by Hussein, and an investigative report presented to Hussein that indicated only 10 people were involved in the assassination attempt. Hussein acknowledged that he issued an order to have the village's orchards destroyed and said he had entire families in Dujail detained together.

Another Iraqi government document unveiled during the trial described the mass relocation of 399 people from Dujail to a desert camp in Al-Muthanna province.

Al-Bandar, head of the Revolutionary Court that issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents, admitted in court that all the victims were found guilty in a seemingly perfunctory one-day trial.

Nearly four dozen of the victims died in captivity, and posthumous orders for their execution were issued afterwards. In a matter-of-fact tone, al-Bandar told the court it wasn't all that unusual for detainees to die during interrogation.

One Dujail witness, who avoided being executed because of a bureaucratic snafu, said he did not even recall a trial for the accused.

Throughout the trial, the defense characterized the 148 victims as Shiite militants backing the Iranian government. The incident happened in the midst of the Iran-Iraq war, and the authorities had no choice but to respond with strong measures to an assassination attempt on a head of state, the defendants and their lawyers argued.

In finding Hussein guilty, the court affirmed that the evidence and testimony met the burden of proof that the former president had "command responsibility" for the slaughter committed at Dujail and did nothing to prevent it. He knew about atrocities committed at Dujail but did nothing to stop it or to punish those who carried out the killings, the court ruled.

A second trial of Hussein and six co-defendants is underway for their roles in Operation Anfal, a 1987-88 campaign against Iraqi Kurds in which about 180,000 people were killed. In that case, Hussein and one co-defendant face charges of genocide.

The impact a guilty verdict Sunday might have on U.S. elections remains unclear, with pollsters and analysts saying that a single incident may not be enough to offset voters' deep dissatisfaction with a war in its third year.

In an interview Friday, one Washington political analyst, Charlie Cook, predicted that the verdict would not have a positive impact for the Republican Party, which has been dogged by public disapproval of the Bush administration's handling of the war.

"Unless they take him out to a firing range and shoot him on live American television on Monday, this is going to have no impact on the elections," Cook said. "There's no good news for the Republicans anymore. This election is not about Saddam Hussein."

The verdict capped a year-long trial in which a chaotic, circus-like atmosphere often overshadowed the gripping testimony by victims and witnesses of the systematic roundup and killing of 148 people in Dujail.

Both of Hussein's trials have been marked by rambling monologues from the defendants, harsh rebukes of the court's legitimacy and several boycotts of the proceedings by the defendants and their lawyers.

U.S. officials advising the court complained that despite the noise and distractions caused by the defendants, Hussein received a fair trial.

The court heard testimony from 130 witnesses, and the accused were given the opportunity to mount robust defenses. Unlike other modern despots, including Slobodan Milosevic, Idi Amin and Pol Pot, Hussein and his henchmen were brought to justice in their own country by their own people, the U.S. advisers argued.

"If you really look at the [trial's] chaos, it was really brought [about by] the activities of defense attorneys walking out… or the activities of the defense," said one U.S. official close to the court, who briefed reporters prior to the verdicts.

"Overlaying all of that was the constant receipt of the evidence, the testimony of complainants and witnesses, the documentary evidence, the experts….It goes a long way in saying this was a fair trial."

Hussein Is Sentenced To Death By Hanging (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 — Three and a half years after American troops captured Baghdad and ended the dictatorship of Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi court set up to judge the brutalities of his 24 years in power found him guilty on Sunday of crimes against humanity and sentenced him to death by hanging.

An automatic appeal of the death sentence will delay it, but some Iraqi judicial officials privately held out the possibility that Mr. Hussein could go to the gallows in a matter of months, perhaps before next spring. That may depend on behind-the-scenes maneuvering by Mr. Hussein's embattled successors in Iraq's new government, who have already shown that they are not hesitant to pressure judges in the case.

For Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the death sentence was a welcome relief from bad news on the war front and appeared to be an opportunity to score gains with his own fractured constituency of Shiite religious groups. Mr. Maliki, who has said that he favors the swift execution of Mr. Hussein, appeared on television to proclaim that the former Iraqi ruler got what he deserved.

The case that brought death sentences for Mr. Hussein and two other defendants, including one of his half-brothers, focused on the ruthless repression of a small Shiite town north of Baghdad after what was said to be an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982. Judged against the sweep of terror under Mr. Hussein, the case was a narrow one, involving the execution of 148 men and youths from the town of Dujail, and what the court found to have been a "widespread and systematic" persecution of the town's inhabitants in the years that followed.

The contrasting reaction to the verdicts, in the heavily fortified courthouse in Baghdad and across Iraq, was a testament to the bitter divisions sown by the toppling of Mr. Hussein in April 2003, and to the country's spiraling descent since then into a near-anarchy of insurgency and sectarian killing. From Mr. Hussein and his unreconciled supporters among Iraq's Sunni minority, there was an explosion of anger.

Among the newly empowered Shiite majority, there was an eruption of joy, and volleys of celebratory gunfire from pistols and automatic weapons.

As the chief judge read out the death sentence, a defiant but exhausted-looking Mr. Hussein shouted: "Long live the people! Long live the nation! Down with the occupiers! Down with the spies!" Thrusting his right forefinger into the air, then raising a heavily thumbed Koran with his left hand, he repeatedly chanted the traditional Muslim invocation, "God is Great!" As two court bailiffs moved to hold his arms down, he called one "stupid" and demanded, "Don't twist my arm." Then he mocked the judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman. "Go to hell, you and the court!" he said.

The verdicts were greeted with a similar divide in opinion outside Iraq. President Bush described the trial of Mr. Hussein before the Iraqi High Tribunal, the court set up to try the top officials of the ousted government, as "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

The reaction was negative from some in other Arab countries and from Western legal-monitoring and rights groups, which had been critical of procedures at the trial, saying they were loaded in favor of "victor's justice" and that the Bush administration should have insisted that an international court hear the cases.

Before the verdicts, Mr. Maliki had imposed an around-the-clock curfew on Baghdad and other regions with heavy Sunni populations or a volatile mix of Sunnis and Shiites, including Mr. Hussein's hometown, Tikrit. Iraqi security forces were placed on high alert and American aircraft — unpiloted reconnaissance drones flying low, and fighter jets roaring high above — crossed the capital. Around the courthouse, in the former headquarters of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party, American troops tightened the already formidable cordon that has protected the trial, with turret gunners in dirt-brown Humvees watching all approaching traffic intently.

But the curfew was widely flouted. In Shiite areas, including Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, residents flooded the streets, whooping and dancing and honking car horns. Abdul Razzaq Hassan, 43, a casual laborer, shouted his exuberance down a telephone line, straining to make himself heard over the throng. "This is a very great happiness! I will never forget this day!" he said.

Mr. Hassan said two of his brothers had been killed by Mr. Hussein, one in 1982 and the other in 1988. Both were members of the Islamic Dawa Party, one of the Shiite religious groups decimated in Mr. Hussein's purges. The party was the principal target of the repression in Dujail. Now, through their election sweep in January, the Shiite groups control the government. "Because of this happiness," Mr. Hassan said, speaking of his lost brothers, "I can let them go."

But a grim and retributive mood settled over predominantly Sunni areas. Fighting broke out between gunmen and Iraqi soldiers in Adhamiya in northeastern Baghdad, said an Interior Ministry official, but American forces suppressed the violence. Police and military authorities reported no other outbreaks of major violence and no deaths.

But hundreds of demonstrators marched in Tikrit, carrying photographs of the former leader, firing weapons in the air, and vowing to avenge him. In nearby Samarra, protesters chanted, "The ground will be burned." Witnesses said they were escorted — and in some cases, given rides — by officers from the American-trained police.

For Mr. Hussein, the sentencing, nearly three years after American troops pulled him from a stifling earthen bunker that had been his hiding place near Tikrit, the sentencing was rife with ironies. For all his insistence during the trial that he remained Iraq's lawful president, he seemed a shrunken figure, nondescript in the ill-fitting charcoal suit and tieless white shirt provided by his captors.

The Baath Party building, a vast, pillared structure in the imperial style he favored for the hundreds of palaces he built across the country, is only a short drive from the Republican Palace, once the epicenter of his power beside the Tigris River, and now the base for top American military commanders and officials.

Combative throughout the trial, Mr. Hussein seemed to be beside himself with frustration and anger as the death sentence was announced. Judge Abdel-Rahman tried briefly to calm him. "There's no point in this," he said as the former ruler conducted an unbroken monologue, trying to shout the judge down.

But Mr. Hussein, 69, would not be assuaged. As the judge moved rapidly through the counts of crimes against humanity on which the five-judge panel court had found him guilty — willful killing, unlawful imprisonment and forced deportation of hundreds of Dujail's townspeople to a desert camp in southern Iraq, torture and "other inhumane acts" — the last four counts each carrying lengthy jail terms — Mr. Hussein, exhaustion showing in the strained timber of his voice and the heavy bags under his eyes, continued to fulminate.

When the judge came to the critical words — "the court has decided to sentence Saddam Hussein al-Majid to death by hanging" — Mr. Hussein offered the bitter riposte that was the coda for many of his fiery denunciations during the 10-month trial. "You don't decide anything," he told the judge. "You are servants of the occupiers and their lackeys! You are puppets!"

In less than five minutes, the judge ordered the former ruler forcibly led from court. "Take him out," he said. Still, the last words belonged to Mr. Hussein. "Long live the Arabs! Long live the Kurds!" he said as he walked, bailiffs clutching his arms, to the door leading to the courtroom cells, and from there back to custody in an American detention center near Baghdad airport where he will remain, American officials said, until the appeal has been completed.

Court officials who spoke with reporters after the sentencing said a nine-judge appellate court would automatically review the death sentences imposed on Mr. Hussein; Barzan Ibrahim Hasan al-Tikriti, his half brother, who was head of the feared Mukhabarat intelligence agency at the time of the events at Dujail; and Awad al-Bandar, who, as chief judge of Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court, handed down the 148 death sentences against the townspeople. A fourth defendant, Taha Yassin Ramadan al-Jizrawi, a former vice president under Mr. Hussein, was sentenced to life imprisonment, and court officials said that his case, too, would go to appeal.

The Dujail trial was originally conceived as a way of building up to the much bigger cases under preparation, involving the killing of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis under Mr. Hussein. A second trial, involving the so-called Anfal military campaign against Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, and what the prosecution witnesses have said were at least 180,000 deaths, is already under way, with Mr. Hussein again the principal defendant.

But as the pressures of the war here have mounted, so have demands from the country's new leaders, both Shiites and Kurds, for an early execution of Mr. Hussein, to eliminate him as a rallying point for Sunni militants fighting to restore, if not Mr. Hussein personally, at least some form of Sunni minority rule.

A year ago, before the sharp worsening in the killings across Iraq, court officials were saying that they favored deferring Mr. Hussein's execution, if ordered by the Dujail court, until after he had been held accountable for far more catastrophic crimes.

On Sunday, Iraqi court officials made a point of saying that nothing in Iraqi law would prevent Mr. Hussein being executed before the Anfal trial ended. Some said privately they hoped for his execution within as little as three months. The officials said the appeal would begin within 30 days, after prosecution and defense lawyers had time to prepare their submissions. Iraqi law provides that any death sentences the court upholds must be confirmed by the country's presidential council and carried out within 30 days.

In his televised speech, Mr. Maliki compared Mr. Hussein to Hitler and Mussolini, and said "this insulting end" — meaning the death sentence — was fitting for "a man who subjected Iraq to a series of wars and murderous campaigns that ripped the social fabric of the country, wasted its resources and served only his sick dreams and illusions."

Testimony in the Dujail trial described how no more than 10 men fired at Mr. Hussein's motorcade, with most of the gunmen killed almost immediately. Within hours, Mr. Tikriti, the intelligence chief, and Mr. Ramadan, then leader of a Baath militia known as the Popular Army, began a sweeping punishment.

Witnesses said hundreds of people were arrested, taken to Baghdad and tortured, with 46 of the 148 later sentenced to death dying from mistreatment before reaching Mr. Bandar's court. Hundreds of others were sent to a desert detention camp, and tens of thousands of acres of orchards, Dujail's main livelihood, were bulldozed. Mr. Hussein's lawyers said that the would-be assassins were Iranian-backed Shiites, and that he was justified in ordering the crackdown because Iraq was at war with Iran.

Three local Baath party officials from Dujail — Abdullah Kadhim Ruweid, his son Mizher Abdullah Ruweid and Ali Dayeh Ali — were also found guilty of willful killing, forcible deportation, and torture for their role in the repression at Dujail and sentenced to 15-year prison terms. Another Baath party official, Mohammed Ali Azzawi, was found not guilty and ordered released.

A photographer with a clear view of Mr. Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half-brother, said he appeared on the verge of tears when his death sentence was read. As given to tirades as Mr. Hussein during the trial, he seemed to have at least temporarily lost his will to fight. "Congratulations, your honor, for reaching this decision," he told the judge.

Mr. Ramadan seemed stunned, despite being spared the death sentence. He had argued that his role in the Dujail events was limited to overseeing the razing of the orchards. His head dropped as he heard the judge sentence him to life in prison. "May I say something?" he asked Judge Abdel-Rahman. "I am so surprised at this sentence. Tell me, who did I willfully kill?"

In A Divided Iraq, Reaction To Saddam Death Sentence Conforms To Sectarian Lines (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 — The day in Baghdad belonged to the Shiites. Their government had returned. Their dead were resting easier. And the generous humor that used to grace faces here was back.

Saadi Hamid, 63, sat in his photography shop staring up at a television carrying the second broadcast of the sentencing. He cried when he saw it the first time.

But this time, when Saddam Hussein began to shout, "Long live the Iraqi people!" Mr. Hamid looked away and smiled broadly.

"Long life for Iraqi people, and he killed everyone," he said. "No one can help him now."

As the pop of gunfire echoed jubilation in Shiite and Kurdish neighborhoods across Iraq on Sunday, and gloom spread over Sunni ones, a surprise emerged. The death penalty for Iraq's former ruler would be a political blessing for the one now in power.

Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was not in the courtroom when a panel of judges sentenced Mr. Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, but by late afternoon in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhoods, he was the one receiving the credit.

"We have a government now," grinned Fuad Haithem Jassim, a 35-year-old police officer standing near a lively soccer game on a street in central Baghdad, largely emptied by a curfew.

A Shiite man at one of Baghdad's many funerals was similarly reassured. "Saddam was the snake head, and you have to cut that head, and they cut it," he said in English. "The government began the first step. All the people say we agree with you now, we agree."

It was an unexpected boost for Mr. Maliki, whose political fortunes have faltered as he has struggled to meet American demands to stop Shiite militias on one hand, and to stay as close as possible to his increasingly frustrated Shiite base on the other.

Those Shiite supporters experienced a long-awaited moment of release, as thousands who lost loved ones to Mr. Hussein's brutal state poured into the streets like water — laughing, singing, crying, and holding pictures of dead loved ones to their chests.

But the verdict divided Iraqis as well, humiliating minority Sunni Arabs and raising fears among Iraqis that Sunni militants would unleash a harsh new series of attacks.

A brooding bitterness settled into Sunni areas, where residents saw the trial as a fraudulent affair that had followed an American-authored script. Many cited this week's election in the United States as evidence of such a fix.

"It's just like a satirical play," said a 23-year-old named Ali in western Baghdad, who was occupying himself on a PlayStation to take his mind off the day's events.

Though flare-ups between angry Sunnis and Iraqi soldiers and police officers occurred in Baghdad and several other cities, the country was relatively free of violence. This was seen as a credit to the efforts of American and Iraqi security forces, which enforced broad curfews. The United States military reported five American deaths, in Baghdad and western Iraq.

A carefree and celebratory atmosphere settled into Shiite blocks. In Sadr City, the largest Shiite neighborhood in the capital, women, chased by children, handed out chocolates in chanting crowds. Young men sprayed stringy foam at cars.

But there was a bitter edge, too, from the long decades of oppression and the loved ones lost then.

DOJ_NMG_0091084

"I waited for this day for a long time," said Muhammad Hussein Ali, a Shiite in Najaf whose brother's body was found in a mass grave after the American invasion. "I feel sad for my brother. But now I feel satisfied that his blood didn't go for nothing."

Shiites praised Mr. Maliki for taking a tough stand against Mr. Hussein, but said they feared what might come next. Sunnis were angry, they said, and attacks seemed imminent.

"They had good lives before," said Ali Rashid, a police officer leaning against his truck with other officers and drinking a soft drink in Karada, a middle-class neighborhood in central Baghdad. "He treated them well. They'll take their revenge."

News of the verdict caught Riyadh al-Adhadh, a physician and a Sunni city council member from Adhamiya, busily tending to a request for hospital supplies. Six people were killed and 20 were wounded the night before in two mortar attacks, and more blood was needed. He was more tired than angry.

When Mr. Maliki praised Iraqi security forces in televised remarks after the verdict, the words felt particularly hollow to Dr. Adhadh.

"Maliki can't do anything," he said by telephone from his house in Adhamiya. "What is his system? His system is militias." He added, "How can he dissolve them if they are supporting him?"

Mr. Maliki, meanwhile, found fault with Sunni broadcasts, and temporarily closed two Sunni satellite channels for running what a government spokesman said was incendiary programming.

Iraqis are dying at a tremendous rate these days, Sunnis noted. One pointed out that Mr. Hussein was convicted for 148 deaths — a number that is not all that far from the daily death toll in today's Iraq, which hovers around 100.

"He's a murderer, he's a dictator, but now we have many tyrants," said a teacher in Adhamiya, who, like many in Baghdad these days, did not want to give her full name because she was afraid.

Even among the jubilant Shiites, there were shadows that showed just how far apart Iraqis have moved in the past year. "There are no friends between Sunni and Shiites now, just relatives because they were together before," said Samer, 28, a Shiite walking with friends on a quiet block in Karada. Violence had destroyed chances for new mixed relationships, he said.

"Civil war is happening in Iraq," he said before hurrying to catch up with his friends.

Two women walked purposefully down the Karada sidewalk. One was a Christian, who said she was happy if the Shiites were happy because they were the ones with the power now. Another, Haloud, gave a piercing gaze, but not her sect, and grabbed a reporter's hand as she spoke in broken English.

"I'm not happy for anything in Iraq," she said with almost desperate intensity. "I'm very sad for Iraq. For that road. For that woman. For that chair. For that man.

"I'm very sad for my country. That's it. O.K.?" And she rushed off, her black abaya billowing behind her in the wind.

Verdict Was Expected in Mideast

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 5 — As news of the verdict against Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants spread throughout the Middle East on Sunday, many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair.

"There was no mystery or suspense here; everyone knew what the result would be," said Daoud Kuttab, a news media critic and founder of Ammannet.net, an independent internet radio station in Amman. "The only reason people watched today was to see the reactions on the defendants' faces."

Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair.

"This is the first trial of its kind of an Arab president in contemporary history, and it could have had many implications," said Salah Amer, professor of international law at Cairo University.

"They should have been anxious to make sure it adheres to international legal standards," he said. "But there is a huge question about when this sentence was issued and in what kind of conditions in Iraq."

Amnesty International said it deplored Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

Reactions To Verdict Reflect Shifts In Iraqis' Fortunes (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Salih Dehema

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 -- On a momentous day in a locked-down city, two men who live on adjacent streets sat alone in their bedrooms Sunday morning to watch the same televised event, but for different reasons. Husam Muhammad, a Sunni Muslim, ordered his family not to disturb him. Mahmoud Abdallah, a Shiite Muslim, simply closed his door.

"I knew I was going to cry," said Muhammad, 55, a former Agriculture Ministry official. "And it's a shame to cry in front of my family."

"I wanted to enjoy this moment by myself, without interruption," said Abdallah, 26, a merchant who sells electrical appliances.

Less than an hour later, deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein and two co-defendants were convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to death by hanging. Muhammad cried. Abdallah smiled.

"I lost control at that moment," Muhammad said. "Iraq without Saddam Hussein, or a man like Saddam Hussein, will never be Iraq."

"This man is a dictator," said Abdallah. "He insulted this country and its people. He deserved this punishment."

Here in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiyah, Hussein's death sentence evoked strong and divergent emotions, mirroring sentiments across Iraq. They spoke to the dramatic shift in fortunes of Iraq's two major sects that began after the U.S.-led invasion and continues to unfold in this fourth year of war.

For the Sunnis of Kadhimiyah, the verdict drove another nail into the coffin of the man many still see as the leader of their community, which once ruled Iraq but now feels more besieged than ever. The sentence, some said, was the work of a victor's court that was more interested in vengeance than judicial fairness.

"Every honest and free Iraqi person will be very sad about the verdict," said Ali Safar, 52, a Sunni merchant. "And every person who is not honest and free will be happy."

The verdict also deepened Sunnis' fears about their future in an Iraq dominated by a Shiite-led government and plagued by sectarian strife. "You've heard at the airport the term 'The visibility is zero'?" Muhammad asked. "Just like that, for us the visibility is zero. We cannot see what's next for us."

For the more numerous Shiites of Kadhimiyah, after decades of repression under Hussein's government, the verdict delivered the justice they have long sought. Many vividly remember the executions of 148 men and boys in the town of Dujail ordered by Hussein following a botched assassination attempt in 1982. They also remember the Anfal campaign, in which Hussein is accused of ordering the mass killings of ethnic Kurds in the late 1980s.

"We were waiting for this day more than 20 years," said Hani Ismael, 35, a Shiite laborer who lives five houses down from Muhammad. "I do not wish him to be hanged, but I wish him more torture in his grave."

Shiites also rejoiced in the hope that their political future in Iraq and in the region would become more secure. Would the verdict persuade Hussein loyalists to abandon the Sunni Arab insurgency? Would it boost the chances of embattled Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, to stabilize his divided country? "I am optimistic for the future. This will help the Shiite leaders," Abdallah said. "I feel this gang that was controlling the country is now finished. God willing, those people supporting Saddam and his Baathists, when they hear about this decision, they will be finished."

After the verdict was announced, the streets of Kadhimiyah erupted in celebration, despite a government-imposed curfew, as Shiites unleashed their joy. Shiite policemen played religious songs and chanted the names of Shiite martyrs. Some danced, wagging their handguns. Others handed out candy to residents who defied the curfew.

Jubilant Shiites shot guns into the air, so much that representatives of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr were dispatched to houses to order the revelers to stop. The bullets, they told the gleeful gunmen, were needed to strike at their enemies.

Sunnis, however, stayed inside their homes, fearing for their safety. Muhammad, who is bald, with thick eyebrows and mustache, said he is the only Sunni left on his street. Sectarian tensions chased the rest away. As celebratory gunfire popped around his house, he said he spent Sunday listening to news reports. He took some comfort that two human rights groups, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, condemned the death sentence, saying the trial was unfair and marred by serious flaws.

"Saddam was accused of killing 148 people. Now, more than 148 innocent people are getting killed in Iraq every day," Muhammad said. "His era is better than the era we are living in now."

Some Shiites in Kadhimiyah, a bustling community built around a gold-domed shrine and nestled along the Tigris River, agreed.

Naseer Muneer, 25, a Shiite who works in the Social Services Ministry, said that under Hussein's secular government, sectarian divisions seldom burst into the open. The people who support Sunday's verdict, he said, "do not realize the danger and the consequences of what will happen, because the simple fact is that this government has not achieved anything for the Iraqi people up till now."

Muhanned Hussein Okeily, 23, a Shiite working with the Iraqi military, predicted that Hussein would never be executed. "They announced the verdict to distract the people from the lack of social services, security, stability and [from the] sectarian violence," he said.

But Abu Sajad, 34, a Shiite history professor, said the verdict "lets the world know that every tyrant will have a dark end," especially other authoritarian rulers in the Middle East. "I wish for Saddam to be cut to pieces and hanged on the Baghdad streets to be a lesson for the Arab rulers to not repeat what Saddam did to his people."

Abdallah said he worries about the reverse: that Sunni Arab rulers in the region, concerned about the presence of a Shiite government in Iraq, would use their influence to prevent Hussein from being executed, keeping the hopes of many Iraqi Sunnis alive. Or that the Iraqi government, concerned about greater instability, might lack the political will to carry out Hussein's sentence.

"The fear I have is an internal push against executing Saddam," Abdallah said.

Despite their differences, Abdallah and Muhammad share a similar prediction for the immediate future. "I am expecting a big reaction from the terrorists in response to the Saddam verdict," Abdallah said.

Said Muhammad: "The civil war is coming."

Saddam Hussein Sentenced To Hang (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein and two senior members of his regime were on Sunday sentenced by an Iraqi special tribunal to death by hanging for carrying out a campaign of collective punishment against a Shia village where the deposed president suffered a 1982 assassination attempt.

Mr Hussein exhibited more of the defiance he has shown throughout the trial. He at first refused to stand for the verdict and had to be lifted to his feet by guards. He shouted “Long live the people!” and “God is greater!” as the sentence was pronounced.

Awadh al-Bandar, a former revolutionary court judge under Mr Hussein’s regime who sentenced to death more than 140 residents of the Shia village of Dujail after the 1982 incident, and Mr Hussein’s half-brother and former intelligence chief Barzan al-Tikriti were also sentenced to hang.

Former vice-president Taha Yassin Ramadan received life imprisonment, while three comparatively minor officials from the former ruling Baath party in the village received sentences of up to 15 years in prison.

According to Iraqi law, death sentences should be carried out within 30 days of the defendants’ final appeal. The appeals court might not give a final decision until well into next year.

The sentence sparked celebration in Shia areas, and angry demonstrations in Sunni Arab ones.

Immediately following the verdict, Iraqi TV reported that mosque loudspeakers in Baghdad had issued calls not to fire weapons into the air in celebration. Iraqi TV showed crowds dancing in the streets, waving pictures of radical Shia leader Muqtada al-Sadr whose father was killed by presumed regime agents in 1981.

One guard in the heavily-fortified Green Zone, whose said his brother was killed by Mr Hussein in 1981, had little sympathy for the defendants. “They would condemn people to death without any process, no evidence, judgment, then one minute later the grave.” He spat at the screen as the deposed president shouted defiance at the court.

The trial had been plagued by allegations that Iraq's Shia-led government used its influence to affect the outcome. Amnesty International, the human rights group that documented thousands of cases of torture and disappearances under Mr Hussein, said the trial was unfair.

The court is expected to produce a long written explanation of its judgment in the coming weeks, which legal experts say will be crucial in determining whether Mr Hussein and his co-defendants were given a fair hearing.

George W. Bush described Mr Hussein's conviction as a "major achievement for Iraq's young democracy".

Mr Bush, who on Sunday was conducting last-minute campaigning in the US mid-term congressional elections, which take place on Tuesday, said the verdict was a "milestone" on the path to Iraqi freedom.

In what was an indirect rebuke of John Kerry, the losing 2004 Democrat presidential candidate, who last week "botched" a joke that appeared to denigrate the educational achievements of US soldiers serving in Iraq, Mr Bush also emphasised praise for the "young men and women who serve in uniform".

On Sunday Rahm Emanuel, leader of the Democratic campaign for the House of Representatives, reminded voters that Mr Bush had described Mr Hussein's capture in December 2003 as having "turned the corner" in the Iraq war. He said there was as little evidence now, as then, that the former Iraqi president's conviction would change the picture on the ground.

Opinion polls suggest the Democrats, who have campaigned for a "phased redeployment" of US forces out of Iraq, are on course to retake at least one house of congress. It is unclear what, if any, impact Mr Hussein's sentencing will have on voter sentiment in the US.

Margaret Beckett, the UK's foreign secretary, welcomed the judgment: "It is right that those accused of such crimes against the Iraqi people should face Iraqi justice."

Mideast Expected The Verdict But Doubts Whether It's Fair (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 5 — As news of the verdict against Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants spread throughout the Middle East on Sunday, many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair.

"There was no mystery or suspense here; everyone knew what the result would be;" said Daoud Kuttab, a media critic and founder of Ammannet.net, an independent internet radio station in Amman. "The only reason people watched today was to see the reactions on the defendants' faces."

Many analysts and others in the region who followed the trial said that what mattered was how the court had reached its judgment and that the process had seemed highly flawed. But critics and supporters of Mr. Hussein, the former dictator, said they were left with more frustration than closure.

Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair. They said it had seemed politicized, that the judges had not seemed to be in control of the process and that rulings about procedures had seemed contradictory. Almost everyone agreed that the verdict was unlikely to stop the violence gripping Iraq.

"This is the first trial of its kind of an Arab president in contemporary history, and it could have had many implications," said Salah Amer, professor of international law at Cairo University. "They should have been anxious to make sure it adheres to international legal standards. But there is a huge question about when this sentence was issued and in what kind of conditions in Iraq."

Mr. Amer and other analysts said the timing of the verdict, on a day of the week when the special tribunal does not normally hold session, and just two days before midterm elections in the United States, underscored the perception that the proceedings had been politically charged.

"His sentencing now is a deliberate attempt to boost the Republicans in the U.S.," said Imad Shueibi, president of the Data and Strategic Studies Center, a private research organization in Damascus. "They're expecting big losses in the upcoming elections, and they figure maybe this sentence might give an illusion of some success. But of course only the naïve will believe that."

Amnesty International said it deplored Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

Makram Mohamed Ahmed, a columnist with the Egyptian government-backed Al Ahram newspaper, said Mr. Hussein "was a burden to his nation and a burden to the entire Arab world and he might have truly deserved this fate, if only the court's legitimacy was not in question."

The verdict, Mr. Ahmed said, had even failed to send a message to other Arab leaders to loosen their grip and reform. "I don't think any of the Arab leaders will come to think that this can happen again because Bush's administration is losing its popularity, and the democrats may get a majority in the Congressional elections."

On the streets of some Arab cities, some defended Mr. Hussein. "Saddam was only defending himself in the Dujail incident and is therefore not a criminal," said Imad Suadi, 43, a taxi driver in Amman. "If any other leader faced the same ordeal, he would act the same. But this verdict is a blow to Arab leaders, warning that anyone of them who raises his head up will face the same fate."

Not everyone was interested. In Damascus late Sunday night, many cafe patrons tuned in to a local soccer game, hardly discussing the verdict. One shop owner, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want any repercussions, said he was aware of the sentencing, but had not thought much of it. "May God protect us from such things," he said.

World Opinion Divided On Saddam Sentence (AP)

By William J. Kole

AP, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein's death sentence was celebrated by some on Sunday as justice deserved or even divine, but denounced by others as a political ploy two days before critical U.S. midterm congressional elections.

Worldwide, the range of reactions — including a European outcry over capital punishment and doubts about the fairness of the tribunal that ordered Saddam to hang — reflected new geopolitical fault lines drawn after America's decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and depose its dictator.

The European Union welcomed the verdict but said Saddam should not be put to death. At the Vatican, Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues, called the sentence a throwback to "eye for an eye" vengeance.

"This is not the way to present the new Iraq to the world, which is different from Saddam, who was behind hundreds of thousands of deaths as well as death penalty sentences," said Hands Off Cain, an Italian organization working to rid the world of capital punishment.

Islamic leaders warned that executing Saddam could inflame those who revile the U.S., undermining President Bush's policy in the Middle East and inspiring terrorists.

"The hanging of Saddam Hussein will turn to hell for the Americans," said Vitaya Wisethrat, a respected Muslim cleric in Thailand, which has its own Islamic insurgency in the country's south.

"The Saddam case is not a Muslim problem but the problem of America and its domestic politics," he said. "Maybe Bush will use this case to tell the voters that Saddam is dead and that the Americans are safe. But actually the American people will be in more danger with the death of Saddam."

Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

Praising the Iraqi judiciary for its independence, the White House denied arranging for the verdict to be announced just two days before pivotal elections in which Democrats are fighting for control of Congress.

"The idea is preposterous," said Tony Snow, Bush's spokesman.

Yet there was a touch of contempt as well, reminiscent of the international response when the United States failed to find the weapons of mass destruction Bush insisted had made Saddam such a threat.

Intervening militarily was "a grave error," said Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, whose country withdrew its troops from Iraq, contending that conditions there have worsened since the U.S.-led invasion.

Although some voiced doubts that Saddam would actually be hanged, the International Federation for Human Rights denounced the death sentence, warning that it "will generate more violence and deepen the cycle of killing for revenge in Iraq." The Council of Europe called it "futile and wrong" to execute Saddam.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, urged Iraq to ensure a fair appeals process and to refrain from executing Saddam even if the sentence is upheld.

In Pakistan, an opposition religious coalition claimed American forces have caused more deaths in Iraq in the past 3 1/2 years than Saddam did during his 23-year rule, and insisted Bush should stand trial for war crimes.

"Who will punish the Americans and their lackeys who have killed many more people than Saddam Hussein?" asked Hafiz Hussain Ahmed, a senior lawmaker from the Mutahida Majlis-e-Amal coalition, which is critical of Pakistan's military cooperation with the United States.

In the Arab world, some Muslims saw the sentence as divine retribution, but others decried it as a farce.

"Saddam is being judged by traitors, Americans and Iranians, and those who came on the backs of American tanks," said Mahmoud al-Saifi of the Arab Liberation Front.

Iran, which fought an eight-year war against Saddam's Iraq and is a bitter opponent of the United States, praised the death sentence and said it hoped that Saddam — denounced by one lawmaker as "a vampire" — still would be tried for other crimes.

Key U.S. allies — including Britain and Australia — welcomed Sunday's verdict, which had been widely expected.

"Appalling crimes were committed by Saddam Hussein's regime. It is right that those accused of such crimes against the Iraqi people should face Iraqi justice," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in a statement.

"The whole process of the trial is a sign of democratic hope and I believe the world should see it as such," Australian Prime Minister John Howard told the Nine Network television.

Amnesty International questioned the fairness of the trial, and international legal experts said Saddam should be kept alive long enough to answer for other atrocities.

"The longer we can keep Saddam alive, the longer the tribunal can have to explore some of the other crimes involving hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," said Sonya Sceats, an international law expert at the Chatham House foreign affairs think tank in London.

"The problem really is that this tribunal has not shown itself to be fair and impartial — not only by international standards, but by Iraqi standards," she said.

Chandra Muzaffar, president of the Malaysian-based International Movement for a Just World, also voiced concerns that Saddam's trial "violated many established norms of international jurisprudence."

Even so, "Saddam was undoubtedly a brutal dictator, and even though I wouldn't subscribe to the death penalty, he deserves to be punished severely for the enormity of his crimes," he added.

Konstantin Kosachyov, the Kremlin-allied head of the international affairs committee in Russia's State Duma, or lower house of parliament, said the sentence would deepen divisions in Iraq.

But Kosachyov expressed doubts that Saddam would actually be executed.

The verdict, he said, was mostly symbolic — "retribution that modern Iraq is taking against Saddam's regime."

Analysis: Verdict May Not Stop Violence (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, November 6, 2006

The future of Iraq may depend little on whether Saddam Hussein hangs. The Sunni insurgency is so deeply entrenched and sectarian bloodlust so strong that Iraq seems set to continue spiraling into violence — regardless of its former president's fate.

Some fear that the Saddam verdict, by angering the Sunni minority, could intensify the violence once a curfew in Baghdad is lifted. Others say they hope the verdict gives Iraqis a chance "to unite and build a better future," in the words of the U.S. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

But in the end, Saddam's fate is not what's driving the violence in Iraq now. Instead, religious, nationalistic and sectarian passions have taken over and are tearing the country apart.

Even if it causes a spasm of violence, Saddam's verdict is just a symbol of the deeper, underlying problems. Sunnis are alarmed at the prospect of Shiite domination. Shiites are fed up with attacks by Sunni extremists.

Without an effective government to protect them, both communities have become locked in a murderous cycle of reprisal killings that looks set to continue.

The insurgency started with Saddam loyalists.

But it long ago expanded into a multi-faceted conflict waged by different groups with different goals: nationalists seeking to drive foreigners from Iraqi soil; Sunni militants fearing domination by the Shiites; and religious zealots waging a global jihad against America.

The death of Saddam would matter little to religious extremists, for example, willing to sacrifice their own lives for their cause.

Likewise with the sectarian violence that has pushed the country to the brink of civil war. It started when Sunni insurgents began attacking Shiite civilians, considering them collaborators with the Americans.

With U.S. and Iraqi forces unable to stop those attacks, Shiite militias took the law into their own hands, sending death squads to exact vengeance on Sunni civilians. Since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, sectarian reprisal killings have spiraled out of control.

Those hatreds will continue to drive the violence — regardless of what happens to Saddam. Neither the Americans nor their Iraqi partners have found a way to control them.

It's not that Saddam's fate has no effect at all: The sectarian fighting has, indeed, served to boost his image among many of his fellow Sunnis, even those who were happy to see him ousted from power three years ago.

With their minority community under siege since they were ousted from decades of power, many Sunnis have rallied around Saddam, forgetting the abuses suffered by all communities under his hard-line rule.

Thus, Saddam's execution could turn him into a martyr for some Sunnis, who consider the trial simply a smokescreen for the failures of the Americans and their Shiite and Kurdish allies.

"I believe that this trial is politically motivated and not a judicial one," said hardline Sunni cleric Harith al-Dhari. "If Saddam is charged with crimes, then the trial should be postponed until the occupation ends."

But the fact is that Sunnis are likely to remain unhappy even if Saddam were to live. It is their diminished role in the post-Saddam Iraq that most distresses them.

Saddam also matters, without question, to the majority Shiites: The violence has reinforced the determination of the Shiites and Kurds, who suffered immensely under Saddam's brutal rule, to put an end to any chance that the former regime might make a comeback.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, hailed the verdict, proclaiming that it marks "the end of a dark era and a beginning a new epoch" where the rule of law "will be supreme."

Yet al-Maliki's real problem is the burgeoning civil war — and he will make little progress at any unified government, much less a united country, until he can convince Sunnis that they have a future in the new Iraq.

In short, until Iraq's communities reach political agreement on the future of their country, chances for peace appear bleak.

And that could take a very long time.

"You need to look at it in the long term and in the long term, I think the Iraqi people are going to be proud that they gave (Saddam and his defendants) a fair trial," said Christopher Reid, who served as an adviser to the Iraqi court.

But, he adds, acknowledging the current violence: "You can't look at this thing in the short term."

Hussein Trial Was Flawed But Reasonably Fair, And Verdict Was Justified, Legal Experts Say (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The yearlong trial that ended yesterday with a sentence of death by hanging for Saddam Hussein had serious legal flaws that left doubts about whether he was allowed to present a full defense, international legal experts said.

Lawyers and human rights advocates broadly agreed that the Iraqi tribunal's proceedings frequently fell short of international standards for war crimes cases. But even critics of the trial said the five Iraqi judges who heard the case had made a reasonable effort to conduct a fair trial in the face of sustained pressure from Iraqi political leaders for a swift death sentence. American lawyers pointed to substantial evidence offered by the prosecution implicating Mr. Hussein in the crimes against humanity with which he had been charged.

"Did this meet the standards of international justice?" asked Jonathan Drimmer, who teaches war crimes law at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington. "The answer is no. But to look at the ultimate verdict, it certainly is consistent with the evidence presented."

Miranda Sissons, a senior associate at the International Center for Transitional Justice, a group that has severely criticized some of the trial proceedings, said, "This was not a sham trial," and added, "The judges are doing their best to try this case to an entirely new standard for Iraq."

Mr. Hussein was accused along with seven co-defendants in the executions of 148 men and boys in Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, in 1982. The mass killings came after what was said to be an assassination attempt against the Iraqi leader.

Whether the trial is seen to have been fair is a vital issue for the United States-backed Iraqi government. When the tribunal was created in December 2003, American and Iraqi officials hoped that it would advance the justice system in Iraq, left moribund under Mr. Hussein, and would help bring some reconciliation between the majority Shiites and minority Sunnis.

Since then the country has descended into factional strife. The trial was fair enough to justify the elation yesterday among Iraqis who suffered under Mr. Hussein's rule but also had enough defects that Mr. Hussein's Sunni supporters, who dominated his government, could still contend that it had been victor's justice, as Mr. Hussein's defense lawyers, led by Khalil al-Dulaimi, said yesterday.

The trial was troubled by extreme security issues. Three defense lawyers were assassinated.

Critics cited frequent efforts by Iraqi officials to speed up the trial and influence its outcome. The first chief judge, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, an Iraqi Kurd, resigned in January, saying he was tired of criticism from top Iraqi officials of his handling of the case. A second judge who was in line to succeed him was barred from becoming chief judge because he was said to have had ties to Mr. Hussein's Baath Party, said human rights advocates who have been following the trial.

"The message by politicians and the executive has been quite unambiguously that if the judges do not do what public expectation demands, they will be in trouble," Ms. Sissons said. "Iraqi officials have sent the message, 'We can reach into this court.' "

Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, who took over as chief judge and presided to the end, was much less tolerant than his predecessor of outbursts by the defendants, who challenged the legitimacy of the court. The chief judge frequently allowed the prosecutor, Jaafar al-Mousawi, to summon evidence and witnesses without first showing them to defense lawyers, violating a basic tenet of trial fair play.

"There was a certain amount of trial by ambush," said Richard Dicker, who has been monitoring the trial for Human Rights Watch, a New York-based group.

On June 13, seemingly in a fit of impatience, Judge Abdel-Rahman abruptly cut off the defense case. "There was a lack of impartiality and judicial temperament" from Judge Abdel-Rahman, Mr. Dicker charged.

However, several American criminal lawyers said the prosecution marshaled surprisingly convincing documents, including those showing Mr. Hussein's signature on orders of execution. "Saddam was convicted on the strength of his own documents," said Michael Scharf, a professor at Case Western Reserve University School of Law who advised the Iraqi tribunal during the trial.

But many trial observers were withholding final opinions yesterday because the Iraqi judges had not issued their written judgment, a voluminous document expected to come out this week.

American lawyers in Iraq dismissed suspicions that the verdict had been delayed to give the Bush administration a political victory in Iraq close to Tuesday's elections.

Accusations by Mr. Hussein's supporters that the trial was manipulated by United States officials were not borne out, American lawyers who followed the case said. An office organized by the United States Embassy helped the tribunal with the investigation and provided legal and logistical assistance. But the Iraqi judges frequently ignored their advice and generally insisted on sticking with familiar procedures from the Iraqi justice system.

"The U.S. government was not the puppet master of this tribunal," Mr. Scharf said.

Mr. Drimmer said that "the trial conduct was a step back from the kind of international justice we had hoped for," and added, "But ultimately having Saddam Hussein prosecuted in a transparent proceeding is a major step for Iraq."

Saddam Sentenced To Death By Hanging (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi Special Tribunal sentenced former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and two of his co-defendants to death in a case charging that they ordered the execution of 148 innocent people in a botched 1982 assassination attempt.

In their verdict, the court made a clear distinction between high-ranking government officials who ordered the attacks and lower-level officials forced to carry them out.

As his sentence was read, Saddam aggressively yelled "God is greater!" to Judge Raouf Abdul. Rahman read the sentence: death for murder, 10 years for forcible deportation, 10 years for torture.

"Long live the Iraqi people, damnation for the damned," Saddam told the panel of judges. "You are the servants of the colonizers."

His half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, the former head of intelligence, and Awad Hamad al-Bandir, former head of the Iraqi Revolutionary Court, also were sentenced to death by hanging.

Bandir kept shouting "God is Great" repeatedly over the reading of the verdict.

Taha Yassin Ramadan, Saddam's vice president at the time the regime fell, was sentenced to life. Abdullah Kathim Ruwaid, his son, Mizhar Abdullah Kathim Ruwaid and Ali Dayih Ali - all local Baath Party officials in 1982 when someone shot at Saddam's convoy during his visit to the mostly Shiite city of Dujail - received a 15-year sentence.

One defendant, a lower-ranking Baath official in the city of Dujail, where the case centered upon, was released immediately.

Seven guards surrounded Saddam, who wore a suit and carried a Koran, as he entered the courtroom. He initially refused to stand up as the verdict was being read, only doing so after two guards forced him up.

Some of those in the visitor gallery were reprimanded by the judge for cheering too loudly. In Baghdad's mostly Shiite neighborhoods, there was rapid gunfire more than a half-hour after the verdict was read. In Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, protestors immediately took to the streets.

In a statement, U.S. envoy Zalmay Khalilzad said: "Although the Iraqis may face difficult days in the coming weeks, closing the book on Saddam and his regime is an opportunity to unite and build a better future. As the Iraqi people move forward, the United States will support them in their efforts to build a just and democratic society."

The court adjourned immediately after reading the verdicts without elaborating on how it reached them.

The nation braced itself for what some feared would be a new round of violence by Saddam's supporters in an already turbulent nation.

Indeed, all of the nation's security forces were ordered to work, and the government issued a curfew. Others hoped it would rejuvenate hopes in the country's national government and judicial system.

The verdicts were decided by a five-judge panel who read their written statements to each defendant, beginning with Mohammed Azawi Ali, who was immediately cleared of all charges. Many had agreed that prosecution had presented the weakest case against Ali.

The trial, which began in October 2005, charged that Saddam and his cohorts rounded up innocent residents of Dujail, took them off to camps and killed and tortured - all in response to an apparent assassination attempt against Saddam. And they said large parts of the orchards in the city were razed in the search for attempted assassins, in some cases ruining their farming livelihood. Saddam was visiting the town in 1982 when someone fired on his convoy.

In all, Saddam faced seven charges, including murder and crimes against humanity.

While Iraqis were glued to their television sets during the beginning of the trial, they lost almost all interest by the end. Some complained it was a long, drawn-out soap opera, not a swift legal proceeding. Others said the death of 148 people two decades ago now seems insignificant in today's Iraq, where on average 100 people are killed a day nationwide.

In all, 27 residents testified about their ordeal, sometimes retelling their stories verbatim. Some testified while facing the former dictator directly; others from behind a curtain. Another 32 gave their testimony in statements read in court.

In between, the head judge stepped down and three defense attorneys were assassinated. The remaining defense attorneys walked out of the proceedings toward the end of the hearings.

During the trial Saddam and Bazran al-Tikriti often delivered long diatribes, questioning the legitimacy of the court, while sitting in a cage placed in the middle of the courtroom that faced the five-judge panel. The prosecutors sat one side; the defense team on the other.

In one session, Saddam told the judge to "go to hell."

U.S. officials concede the process did not always proceed smoothly, but said overall, it was monumental - the first trial that brought a former dictator to trial in front of his countrymen.

And residents were again glued to their television sets Sunday to see watch the verdict being read, many locked in their homes because of the curfew.

U.S. officials said Saddam's most self-incriminating statements occurred March 1 when he admitted ordering the executions, saying as the leader of Iraq, he was ultimately responsible.

"I demolished the orchards," the former dictator said to stunned courtroom. "That was a Revolutionary Council decision to modernize the orchard, and I signed that order."

He went on to say "nobody forced me to sign that decision" and concluded by asking the court: "Where is the crime?"

Saddam has faced the death sentence before in his life. As an early member of the Baath Party, he was part of a failed attempted assassination attempt of then-Iraqi Prime Minister Abdul Karim Qassim. Saddam fled to Egypt and was sentenced to death in absentia in 1963. When he returned to Iraq a year later, he was jailed, only to escape in 1967. The following year, he was part of a bloodless coup that brought down the government and named him vice president.

Like all things in this country now, the reaction to the verdict fell largely along sectarian lines, only breaking for those who were directly harmed by the former dictator during his three-decade reign.

In Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, residents promised a rise of retaliatory attacks if the former president is killed. And they said that Saddam's crimes pale compared to what is happening now.

"A death sentence is unfair," said Qusai Abdullah, a 30-year-old taxi driver, from Tikrit. "What happened in Dujail in 1982 is happening now, maybe worse. And neither the government nor the Americans are taking responsibility of what's going on."

In the mostly southern Shiite cities of Basra and Najaf, there was not much enthusiasm for the verdict either, namely because residents said Saddam would likely never be executed.

Others charged that the verdict would primarily serve America's political interests, not the Iraqis' need for justice, noting that it came two days before the U.S. elections.

"It will be only an attempt for an electoral gain for the U.S. and they don't care about the price the Iraqis will pay for it," referring to fears of increased violence, said Sumaiya Abdul Wahab, 33, a university lecturer.

In one hearing, Saddam asked that he be killed by a firing squad, saying he is entitled to that as head of the armed forces. But Iraqi law says that, if executed, he should be hung. Minister Nouri al Maliki, said Saturday that Saddam would be hung, already presuming the former dictator would be found guilty in what some took as another sign of his sectarian slant.

But first, there is an automatic appeals process for anyone convicted to life imprisonment or death. And Saddam still is being tried for allegedly gassing thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s. So it could be months before he faces his court-ordered execution.

Iraqis' Emotions Flow After Verdict (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Celebrations and some protests erupted in Iraq on Sunday after Saddam Hussein was convicted of crimes against humanity for ordering the deaths of 148 Iraqis in 1982. He was sentenced to be hanged.

Shortly after the verdict was announced, clashes with police broke out in north Baghdad's Azamiyah district, a mostly Sunni Arab area. Sunnis were Saddam's main supporters.

"This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands," Saleh al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told Al-Arabiya satellite television.

Celebratory gunfire also rang out in Baghdad. In Dujail, the Tigris River city where the 148 Shiites were killed, people celebrated and burned pictures of Saddam.

Saddam's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said his client called on Iraqis to reject violence. "His message to the Iraqi people was, 'Do not take revenge on the invading nations and their people,' " al-Dulaimi said. The lawyer called the trial a "farce" and said defense attorneys will appeal within 30 days.

Fadhil Kadhim, 70, a farmer from a mainly Shiite district in Baghdad, said Saddam's forces killed his son in 1985. "Does the bloodshed of Iraqis stop after today?"

"It is a verdict on a whole dark era that was unmatched in Iraq's history," said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite.

President Bush called it "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

Saddam refused to stand when the judge was ready to read his sentence. He stood after two marshals entered his holding pen. As the sentence was read, he shouted, "God is great!" and "Down with the occupiers!"

The former leader and his seven co-defendants were accused of revenge killings in Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, after an assassination attempt on Saddam. Two others also were sentenced to death, one received a life sentence, three were sentenced to up to 15 years, and one was acquitted and freed.

King Sneer (WP)

By Philip Kennicott

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein, who lost two major wars against the United States, has been a reliable villain in American politics for at least 15 years, longer than Hitler, who ran Germany from 1933 until his ignominious suicide in a bunker in 1945. Yet yesterday's images from Baghdad of Hussein being sentenced to die at the end of rope had little of the visual or emotional impact one might have expected from this late chapter in the tyrant's life story.

A gray-bearded man with deep bags under his eyes gestured impatiently at the camera. The sentence was pronounced. And like some pundit or politician on a Sunday morning talk show, Hussein raised his voice over the cross talk, vilifying, as he has done so often throughout his odd trial, the Americans who forced him from power.

It's a Shakespearean certainty that a deposed king will seem small and even pathetic without his regalia and the surrounding spectacle of toadying courtiers. Yet Hussein seemed less pathetic than angry yesterday, angry just as he's been since he scrubbed off the grime of his spider-hole hideout three years ago. With the exception of some woolly pictures taken just after his capture, the dictator's equivalent of a Hollywood mug shot, Hussein has mostly stayed in character throughout the war and its aftermath. He was angry and imperious when we saw him before the invasion, firing shots into the air from a balcony. He was angry and imperious as he faced news of his execution yesterday.

For Americans, he's always been a figure bristling with lethal energy. He aged over the years, but the gestures and the posture and overheated bellicosity, which always sounded strange in translation, remained mostly unchanged since we first encountered him as public enemy No. 1 during the lead-up to the first Gulf War. Hitler and Stalin killed into the millions. Hussein earned his way into their ranks when he killed tens of thousands of Kurds and invaded Kuwait. He bedeviled his neighbors and terrorized his citizens and earned the epithet "murderous"; Syria's Hafez al-Assad, who also bedeviled his neighbors and killed tens of thousands of his own citizens, was always known as just wily. The crime for which Hussein will die was the killing of 148 men and boys from a town north of Baghdad, where an attempt was made on his life in 1982.

When he was in power, his anger signified danger to America. Throughout his trial, it came to represent the explosive internal dangers of postwar Iraq, every outburst a microcosm of the larger anger of his Sunni supporters, just as the chaos of the trial reflected the larger chaos in Iraq. Images of Hussein's sentencing were anticlimactic on arrival because they offered no real sense of closure. Unlike trials in postwar Germany or post-apartheid South Africa, Hussein's trial didn't seem to puncture history with a new beginning. It clearly brought no reconciliation to warring parties in Iraq and it placed no period after the initial success of the invasion. Even the courtroom, seen in brief snatches on the nightly news, was a place calculated to deflate history. It felt small and was badly lit (at least for the cameras), and justice didn't seem to stare down evil so much as bicker with it.

And yet Hussein managed to remain consistent to his prewar public image throughout it all. The military fatigues came off, but with his Koran in hand and the formulaic and economical arm gestures of an impatient despot he never seemed anything less than entirely convinced that he was still Saddam Hussein, a latter-day incarnation of Nebuchadnezzar. Throughout it all, he had a loyal audience. Even when it was certain that he would lose his case and be sentenced to die, he still found sympathy among some Sunni supporters, and perhaps that audience bolstered him in his defiance.

A broken man doesn't take such care with his cuffs, nor stuff a handkerchief in his breast pocket, as Hussein did for his court appearance. Only the fatigue in his eyes and the gaunt appearance of his face suggested any sign of soul searching -- and even that reading of his visage is probably wishful thinking. Otherwise, Hussein's public presence suggests a man primarily frustrated by his inability to hold forth to a world audience. A man still clamoring for the microphone of history is a man who still feels he has a strong case to make to the world.

In the streets of Iraq, his case -- that age-old argument that a fractious country needs a brutally pragmatic leader -- was being made for him car bomb by car bomb. Violence has been so bad of late that a curfew was called before the sentencing. But there were still demonstrations in the streets. Shiites and Kurds fired guns in the air to celebrate; and Sunnis fired guns in the air to protest the news in Hussein's home town of Tikrit.

Hollywood would do this so much differently. There'd be more clarity about the meaning of it all. There'd at least be a stirring anthem and hugs and tears and general rejoicing. But the reaction was much more mixed. And in that ambiguity, that ambivalence about the war, is the wiggle room of history that Hussein, with his snarling consistency and his natty dark suit, will do his best to exploit to the advantage of posterity.

In the United States, approval was general, though it differed in enthusiasm between supporters and opponents of the war. The president hailed the news as "a major achievement" and "a milestone." Democrats were more guarded, with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid noting both the justice of the verdict and the chaos in the country. And a few people turned straight from the news of Hussein's demise to parsing tomorrow's elections.

"Man, oh man, do I hope that Rove's much-reported giddy confidence about the election wasn't hinged on a hoped-for tidal wave of support stemming from the Saddam verdict," wrote Jonah Goldberg on the National Review Web site. Images of Hussein defeated (symbolically when his statue fell in Baghdad; personally when he was dragged from his hiding spot; and legally, with yesterday's sentencing) have taken their place among the larger collection of images of this war. But they have yet to offer what so many people want: one final image that sums up the conflict in a way that everyone can live with. In a war this politicized, this divisive, this unpredictable, that image may never arrive.

The Saddam Hussein Verdict (NYT)

Saddam Hussein's horrendous crimes deserve exemplary punishment. During his own dictatorship, that would have meant a gruesome death, after a staged trial or no trial.

In an Iraq fully liberated from his evil thrall, it might have been something very different — an exemplary exercise in the rule of law, aimed at holding Mr. Hussein fully accountable, but also at healing and educating a nation he so ruthlessly divided.

Regrettably, yesterday's sentence to death by hanging in a case involving the execution of 148 Shiites in the 1980s fell somewhere short of that goal. Mr. Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

From the beginning, the now dominant Shiite and Kurdish politicians have been determined to use Mr. Hussein's trial and punishment to further their own political ends, as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has continued to do in recent days.

Mr. Hussein, as expected, repeatedly tried to mock the proceedings. More seriously, powerful politicians regularly tried to influence the outcome, judges were not allowed to rule impartially, and defense lawyers were denied security measures and documents they needed.

The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds.

Criminal Against Humanity (WSJ)

By L. Paul Bremer

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

The decision by Iraq's Special Tribunal to convict Saddam Hussein of some 150 murders is a welcome step on Iraq's painful journey toward its more hopeful future.

Without resolving Saddam Hussein's fate -- and the human-rights record of the regime he led -- the Shiites and Kurds can never make true peace with their Sunni fellow citizens. So the verdict should be seen as a necessary, though not sufficient, step in helping Iraq's persecuted majority put behind them the awful years of Saddam's brutal rule. And it is a bright note in the dangerous period through which the country is now passing.

This trial didn't teach Iraqis anything new about Saddam's brutality. They had lived with it for decades. But by casting a light into the depth of his tyranny, the process should remind Americans of how awful Saddam's rule was. And that, despite the difficult events on the ground today, America did a noble deed in liberating Iraq from this evil man.

The strong Iraqi urge to redress Saddam's crimes was made clear on the first day of Iraq's Governing Council -- July 13, 2003. The very first decree the Council passed that day, with unanimous support from its Shiite, Kurdish, and Sunni members, was to demand the establishment of the Special Tribunal to punish Saddam and his top Baath Party officials. This step -- which took the Coalition by surprise given the lack of any prior discussion -- showed how deep the scars were from Saddam's rule.

It is impossible to overstate the psychological and physical damage that Saddam inflicted on his countrymen.

In May 2003, the Coalition found the first of Saddam's mass graves. After the 1991 Gulf War, the Shiites, representing some 60% of Iraq's population, rose up to try to throw off his dictatorship. Saddam ordered his army to savagely crush this uprising. Iraqi army units went into Shiite towns south of Baghdad and rounded up men, women and children indiscriminately, threw them onto flat bed trucks, drove them into nearby fields and machine-gunned them to death. Their bodies were thrown into common graves and covered over.

I visited that first mass grave a few days after I arrived in Iraq. It made a searing impression on me, as it did on all who visited it. In an area about the size of three football fields, bones and clothing had been collected into little piles. Women in black robes, ignoring the sweltering heat, were scrabbling through the dirt and bones with their fingers, desperate to find a scrap of clothing, a faded ID, or a piece of jewelry which would identify the remains as those of their mother, or husband or daughter. Uncounted thousands of bodies were in that grave alone. By the time I left Iraq 14 months later, we had found over 300 mass graves.

Saddam's brutality was not limited to the Shiites. He is also standing trial for the crime of genocide against the Kurds, another 20% of the population. For a decade, Saddam's army tortured and murdered hundreds of thousands of Kurdish men, women and children. On the sunny morning of March 16, 1988, the army used chemical weapons on the peaceful Kurdish town of Halabja, killing 5,000 civilians in only a few hours. A few months after I arrived, Secretary of State Colin Powell and I visited this village and spoke with the horribly scarred survivors of this chemical attack. They were living proof that Saddam had possessed weapons of mass destruction, and had been prepared to use them, even against his own countrymen.

Visiting police stations in towns all over Iraq, I saw that each one had a torture chamber -- because under Saddam torture was legal. Most stations, including the Central Police Academy in Baghdad responsible for training Iraq's police, also had a rape room. I saw the human shredding machines into which Saddam ordered his enemies to be thrown.

Nor did the Sunnis go unscathed under Saddam. Though Sunnis dominated the Baath Party and his vicious security and intelligence forces, they, too, were tortured and killed when it suited Saddam's purposes. Sunnis, Kurds, Shiites, Christians, Turkomen -- no Iraqi group escaped his brutality. The most conservative estimate is that during his regime, Saddam killed over a half-million of his countrymen, though since more than a million and a half Iraqis are still unaccounted for, the actual total is, no doubt, far higher.

Saddam's trial is also another step in establishing the rule of law in free Iraq. The trial certainly had its flaws, as one would expect in a post-conflict country. The first judge lost control of the process and had to be replaced. The correct comparison is not with some illusory perfect system, but with what went before. Saddam made the rules, wrote or tore up the laws, and established or abolished courts according to his wishes, whims or political objectives. The Iraqi people wanted -- and deserved -- better. And the Coalition helped them get it.

Iraqis are proud that theirs is the land of Hammurabi, the Babylonian king who 4,000 years ago created the world's first code of laws. Before Saddam took power, Iraq's legal profession was generally recognized as the best in the region. The Coalition found a large group of able and dedicated Iraqi lawyers ready to serve their free country despite decades of repression.

In my first meeting with the new Iraqi Minister of Justice, Hashim al-Shibli, in September 2003, that respected jurist recounted how Saddam had suborned the justice system and terrorized Iraqi judges. He told me how the independence of Iraq's judiciary, a vital component of democratic checks and balances, had been abolished when the Baathists seized power. He asked that the Coalition re-establish its independence. We did that, and now that independence is affirmed in the new Iraqi Constitution, ratified a year ago.

Of course, no constitution alone can ensure respect for human rights or the rule of law. That must be done by men and women cooperating and compromising in a democracy. Iraq is going through a difficult period now. In his comment on the verdict, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki repeated his call for all Iraqis to unite in rebuilding their country. We Americans should do everything possible to see that they succeed, for failure in Iraq would endanger the lives of every American. And establishing a democratic Iraq, in the heart of a deeply troubled region would be a signal event for all the peoples of the Middle East.

Mr. Bremer was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in 2003-04.

Verdict For Saddam Hussein (WP)

IT'S BEEN nearly three years since U.S. troops pulled Saddam Hussein from his spider hole, so the justice that came yesterday, in the form of a death sentence from an Iraqi tribunal for crimes against humanity, was not particularly swift. Nor was his nine-month-long trial the model of fairness that the Bush administration and many Iraqis had hoped for: Three defense lawyers were murdered, a judge was pressured into resigning and many of the 39 courtroom sessions were chaotic.

There nevertheless can be little doubt that justice was delivered in the trial of a tyrant who never hesitated when ordering the summary murder of tens of thousands of Iraqis. The prosecution, planned as the first of several, focused on one small example of that record: Saddam Hussein's complicity in the torture and killing of at least 148 people in a single town, Dujail, after an assassination attempt against him in 1982. During the course of the heavily publicized hearings, Iraqis heard their former dictator confess to ordering the arrest of the innocent civilians, and they saw the death warrants he signed. They heard the testimony of townspeople whose lives were destroyed by this savagery and whose pain echoed that of millions of Iraqis who endured one of the bloodiest tyrannies in the modern history of the Middle East.

Tragically, the remediation that ought to come from the verdict has been shaded not only by the tumult of the trial but by the escalation of lawless violence around Iraq. Yesterday Shiites in Baghdad justifiably celebrated the sentencing of a man who carried out indiscriminate massacres against their sect. But Shiite militias, some of them embedded in government security forces, now abduct, torture and slaughter dozens of Sunnis a day. Sunnis in Iraq and in neighboring Arab countries are more likely to see the verdict as an act of vengeance by the Shiite-led government -- or a preelection gambit by the Bush administration -- than as a legitimate judgment.

In the short term, Saddam Hussein's conviction and eventual execution may worsen Iraq's civil conflict. His trials nevertheless may come to be seen as milestones in the slow and painful attempt to construct a more civilized Iraq from the poisonous wreckage of his regime. Like the rest of that enterprise, the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded.

The temptation, and in some quarters the desire, is to dismiss yesterday's conviction of Saddam Hussein for war crimes as a historical footnote. Would that this were possible. While it is certainly a case of justice being done, it should also remind us about the enemy our troops continue to face, and the U.S. could yet lose to, in Iraq.

For even as Saddam will now hang for his crimes, his legacy survives in the vicious insurgency that his former intelligence agents and Baath Party colleagues are prosecuting. This continues to be the main enemy in Iraq, aided by the likes of Syria and Iran. Its assaults are what finally this year caused the Shiites to respond with death squads of their own that are contributing to the "sectarian violence" so evident in Baghdad. And it is one of the main mistakes of the Bush Administration during this war that it has failed to maintain military and American public attention on the nature and strategy of this enemy.

There's an honest debate over whether Saddam planned the insurgency before he was ousted from power. Whether or not it was planned in detail, however, there is little doubt that the Sunni element of the insurgency has long since formed into an organized movement. At its heart is Saddam's old intelligence service, the Mukhabarat. The Baath Party also continues to function in secret and to communicate to the extent it can.

Only last month, newly independent Iraqi newspapers obtained and reported on a terrorist assassination list with the names of 60 government, military and political figures. The document was dated September 5, 2006 and issued from Thi Qar Operation HQ in the name of the "Martyr Qusay unit/Karkh sector," which is Baghdad. Qusay is Saddam's son, who was killed in Mosul in 2003.

Addressed to "comrades" and "commanders of Special Operations," the order translated into English declares that "Approval of deputy combatant comrade, treasure of the country (Baath Party-Iraq branch), and the supreme commander of armed forces was granted, and communicated to us by the letter from the country treasure office . . . Execution punishment regarding criminals, agents, apostates, names below, in addition to their first, second, and third degree relatives. Execution (of the order) by your units is according to the plan and to your suitable timing discretion."

The list includes major Shiite, Kurdish and Iraqi political figures, as well as Sunnis who are participating in the government. And the killings seem to have already begun with the murder of several relatives of men on the list. We keep being told by our own intelligence services that the Sunni insurgency is leaderless. But tell that to those on this list or to their relatives.

The goal of the terrorists who created this list is to intimidate Iraqis from joining the government, and to maintain as much disorder and violence as possible so the U.S. will lose patience and withdraw. Then they will take their chances with the majority Shiites, who they have beaten before. The Saddamists will have won, even if Saddam himself is dead.

None of this is intended to diminish the importance of Saddam's conviction and likely execution after appeal. The verdict reminds the world of his crimes, specifically the 1982 murder of 148 Shiites in Dujail, which in its systematic revenge recalls Hitler's slaughter at the Czech town of Lidice during World War II. That the U.S. and its allies were willing and able to depose, and his countrymen then try and punish, a national leader who ordered those crimes is a warning to other tyrants. The U.N. routinely deplores the Saddams of the world but never has the will to act against them -- whether in Rwanda, Darfur, Kosovo, Bosnia, Cambodia, or Kurdistan. In Iraq, the U.S. finally acted.

Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq. But to make it permanent, the U.S. must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the U.S. commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job.

Cheney: Vote Will Not Deflect Us In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

The Bush administration's strategy in Iraq will remain "full steam ahead" regardless of the outcome of US mid-term elections that take place on Tuesday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said in an interview with ABC news on Sunday.

Opinion polls predict that the Democratic party, which is arguing for a phased redeployment of US troops out of Iraq over the next 12 to 18 months, are on course to win control of the House of Representatives for the first time since 1994 and possibly the Senate, for the first time since 2002.

Mr Cheney, who, along with George W. Bush, has stepped up his election campaign schedule for the final days before voting, said that since neither he nor the president were running for office they would continue to "do the right thing" in Iraq.

Mr Cheney also said that a US withdrawal from Iraq would undermine the "war on terror" by sending the wrong signals to allies such as Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, and Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan.

"You cannot make national security policy on the basis of that [election outcomes]," he said.

"These are people who are running for Congress and they are entitled to their own views ... It may not be popular with the public. It doesn't matter, in the sense that we have to continue the mission [in Iraq] ... and that is what we are doing."

Mr Cheney made the comments at the tail-end of an election in which the unpopularity of the war in Iraq has featured prominently on the campaign trail. Republican leaders, including Mr Cheney, have sought to portray the Democrats as weak on national security and as the party of "cut and run" from Iraq.

However, recent polls suggest that a consistently large majority of the US public believes that the Bush administration is pursuing the wrong course in Iraq. On Sunday leaders from both parties said the conviction and sentencing of Saddam Hussein, the former dictator, in an Iraqi court was unlikely to have any impact on the US elections.

Regardless of Tuesday's outcome, attention is expected to revert to the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission of inquiry into the Iraq war led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker.

According to leaks from the group, which is expected to publish its recommendations next month or in January, it will offer a clear change of course in Iraq, including greater emphasis on achieving stability rather than democracy and a possible redeployment of troops from Iraq into the region.

Mr Baker who is close to George H. W. Bush, the president's father, has already recommended that the Bush administration hold direct talks with Iran and Syria, both of which are allegedly helping to destabilise Iraq.

On Sunday Mr Cheney also said that he would "probably not" agree to appear before Congress to be questioned on the conduct of the Iraq war even if a Democratic-controlled house issued subpoenas requiring him and Mr Bush to do so.

The Democrats have played down rumours that they would try to impeach Mr Bush if they took control of Capitol Hill. But they have pledged to restore "oversight of the executive" particularly on the administration's controversial eavesdropping programme and its alleged misuse of intelligence to launch the war in Iraq.

"I have no idea that I'm going to be subpoenaed," said Mr Cheney. "Obviously, we'd sit down and look at it at the time. But probably not, in the sense that the president and the vice-president are constitutional officers and don't appear before the Congress."

Win, Lose Or Draw, Bush Faces Unfamiliar Terrain (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Nov. 5 — If the balance of political power in Washington changes on Tuesday, will President Bush change with it?

From the moment Mr. Bush took office after winning the election but losing the popular vote, he has governed as if he became president by a landslide. Bad news — legislative losses, plunging approval ratings, chaos in Iraq — seems only to stiffen his resolve. Good news — a dip in the unemployment rate, the conviction of Saddam Hussein — reinforces his confidence that his polices at home and abroad are correct.

On the campaign trail, there is little to suggest that will change. “My vision is clear,” Mr. Bush likes to say. Vice President Dick Cheney echoed that theme on Sunday, giving a hint of Mr. Bush’s attitude when asked by ABC News whether the election would alter Mr. Bush’s Iraq policy. Mr. Cheney replied that there might be some effect in Congress. But the attitude in the White House, he said, would remain “full speed ahead.”

In recent weeks, President Bush, as well, has appeared to dig in his heels on the war in Iraq, saying he would consider changes in tactics but not strategy.

Yet with Mr. Bush facing the likelihood of a remade political landscape in Washington, even if his party holds on to both houses of Congress, the White House is sending signals that Mr. Bush is open to a shift in approach. After six years of virtually ignoring Democrats as he pressed his own party to do his bidding on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush and his aides are charting a course that they say will take the president back to his roots as Texas governor, when he worked in a more bipartisan way with Democrats.

They are piecing together a domestic agenda that includes reviving the president’s failed bid to overhaul entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, White House officials and allies of the administration said. The president has assigned Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to spearhead the effort, and the White House says it is quietly reaching out to Democrats on Capitol Hill.

But it is not clear how much bipartisanship is possible, even if Mr. Bush proves serious about it. His approval numbers remain low, emboldening Democrats, who in any case are distrustful of him. The 2008 presidential campaign is about to start, complicating political calculations on both sides. Members of both parties say Mr. Bush will be unable to accomplish much at home until he gets Iraq under control.

Even so, Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said Mr. Bush was determined not to focus exclusively on foreign policy, as so many presidents have done in the final two years of a second term.

“I think his hope,” Mr. Bartlett said, “is that maybe, maybe we can enter into an era where the president will not be viewed as such a threatening force to Democrats who are more eager to get some accomplishments done.”

Mr. Bush enters the final phase of his presidency knowing his future depends on Tuesday’s election and Iraq, both of which are largely beyond his control. No matter who controls Congress, he will have a more difficult time governing.

The situation is in stark contrast to the one two years ago, when Mr. Bush sounded ebullient about his prospects for a successful second term after defeating Senator John Kerry.

“Let me put it to you this way,” Mr. Bush said at the time. “I earned capital in the campaign, political capital, and now I intend to spend it.”

Today, the political capital Mr. Bush intended to spend is so vastly diminished that one longtime ally, the conservative organizer Paul M. Weyrich, estimated it at “zero” in an interview on Friday.

A sense of poignancy has set in. Jetting about the country on Air Force One, Mr. Bush has been playing hearts and gin rummy with his longtime political adviser and confidant, Karl Rove; Mr. Rove usually wins. At each stop, the men share memories of where they were two years ago, or four, reminding themselves of Texas and happier campaigns gone by.

“Any time we’re on the campaign plane, it’s reminiscent of past elections,” Mr. Bartlett said, recounting the card games. But he insisted that Mr. Bush was looking ahead, not back: “There’s no cruise control into ’08 for this president. He believes that two years is a long time and a lot could get done.”

Even if Republicans keep both chambers, there is universal agreement that they will do so with slimmer majorities, further reducing Mr. Bush’s clout on Capitol Hill.

“Obviously, his power is waning quickly,” said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, a close ally of Mr. Bush. “But it doesn’t have to be that way if we have a bipartisan desire to tackle tough problems.”

On the campaign trail, Mr. Bush has already been calling on Democrats to join him in reauthorizing the No Child Left Behind Act, his signature education legislation, which was passed with bipartisan support early in his first term. But Democrats who joined him the first time are wary, said Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the chief Democratic sponsor of the bill.

"It's all going to be decided by what the president does with the budget," Mr. Kennedy said.

The last two years of a second term are challenging for any president. Bill Clinton, facing impeachment, spent most of his time traveling, devoting himself nearly exclusively to foreign policy. Harry Truman was stuck trying to explain a war on the Korean Peninsula that ended in stalemate, and it took years for his reputation to be restored.

For Mr. Bush, Iraq will loom over everything. His own aides concede they had once hoped that by Tuesday's midterm election, American troops would be steadily withdrawing from Iraq. Instead, 150,000 are still there.

"The fortunes of his last two years, in terms of his own political capital, will very much be a part of what takes place in Iraq," said Senator Mel Martinez, a Republican from Florida who was housing secretary during Mr. Bush's first term.

But one of the biggest guessing games in Washington is whether Mr. Bush will seize the opportunity to act in ways he could not with an election looming. Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, wrote earlier this week that "the preferred European scenario — Bush hobbled — is less likely than the alternative: Bush unbound."

Mr. Bush's first decision may be whether to move on Iraq before a report is issued by a bipartisan group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, the former congressman from Indiana.

Whatever Mr. Bush does, on either the foreign policy or the domestic front, comes with the knowledge that the clock is ticking. As Mr. Bartlett spoke in his West Wing office Thursday afternoon, a digital "countdown clock," distributed to the president's closest aides by Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff, revealed precisely how much time, at that moment, remained in Mr. Bush's term: 809 days, 21 hours, 21 minutes and 42 seconds.

Parties Crank Up Voter Turnout Efforts (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim VandeHei

Republicans seized on signs of movement in their direction yesterday as they unleashed a massive election-eve voter mobilization operation in an effort to stave off potentially substantial losses in the House and preserve at least a slender majority in the Senate.

Democrats answered the Republicans' get-out-the-vote machinery with intensified efforts to contact infrequent and still-undecided voters in a handful of tight Senate races as well as in a dozen GOP-held House districts where races were too close to call.

A Pew Research Center poll showed a significant narrowing in the partisan advantage in House races that the Democrats have enjoyed for much of the year, findings that echoed those of a Washington Post-ABC News poll released Saturday showing the Democrats with a six-point edge.

The Pew poll showed that the Democratic advantage had dropped to 47 percent to Republicans' 43 percent among likely voters, down from 50 percent to 39 percent two weeks ago. The poll found a drop in Democratic support among independents, but Pew Director Andrew Kohut said the most significant change over the past two weeks is that Republicans now outnumber Democrats among likely voters.

Other weekend polls by Time and Newsweek magazines continued to show Republicans at a steep disadvantage, with Democrats enjoying double-digit margins in party preferences for the House.

GOP strategists said they believe their prospects continue to improve as voters digest the guilty verdict against former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, positive economic statistics and the prospect of Democrats taking control of one or both chambers of the legislative branch. "I have always believed that Republican voters in many cases come home later, particularly this year," said Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman.

President Bush campaigned yesterday in two conservative Plains states, Nebraska and Kansas, where there are no competitive statewide races but where Kansas Rep. Jim Ryun (R) is in trouble and where Nebraska state Sen. Adrian Smith (R) is struggling to win an open seat in a heavily Republican district.

A senior GOP strategist said party officials anticipated that the so-called generic vote -- the question of which party voters are likely to support in House elections -- would tighten, but they do not consider the shift significant enough to change the contours of this election. More than 20 GOP incumbents are tied with their opponents heading into the final days. "It is the 50-50 districts that turnout can help," said the strategist, who like others spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to talk about strategy.

Democrats, mindful of the Republicans' success in getting their voters to the polls in the past two elections, expressed nervousness at signs of tightening in some of the national polls. But they said private and some public polling in contested House districts continued to show their party in a position to win enough seats to claim the majority.

"I don't know what to make of it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Senate races in Virginia, Missouri and Montana, all for seats currently held by Republicans, remained among the closest in the country. Contests in Republican-held Tennessee and Democratic-held Maryland looked tight as well, depending on the poll. One survey showed the race in Rhode Island, a state Democrats must take to win the Senate, very close.

Strategists sought solace in any survey that looked good, but with less than 48 hours remaining before the polls close on Tuesday, both parties concentrated on direct voter contact, built on months of sophisticated analysis of the electorate and microtargeting of tens of millions of voters around the country.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee expected to spend roughly $25 million on its voter mobilization efforts; the DCCC was set to spend $10 million. The Democratic National Committee has given the other committees about $8 million for get-out-the-vote activities.

The Republican National Committee planned to expend about $30 million on its operations. While that was less than the Democrats, Republicans began with a significant advantage in technology and information, having spent tens of millions in earlier campaigns building voter lists and modeling the electorate. Democrats have tried to create those models this year.

Democratic strategists said privately that overall, there is less money flowing into key states this year than during the 2004 presidential election.

Democrats and Republicans were both counting on help from outside groups. Conservative groups were contacting their supporters, while progressive groups like MoveOn.org and America Votes were turning up their operations. MoveOn.org members made 800,000 phone calls yesterday and plan another 1.2 million each today and Tuesday. Organized labor said it would put 30,000 volunteers on the streets to contact union members.

Both sides boasted about their turnout operations. Democrats said they have signed up one volunteer for every 21 voters in Montana, while Republicans said they directly contacted one in 10 registered voters in that state on Saturday alone.

In Missouri, Democrats planned to contact several hundred thousand "drop-off voters" -- those who vote in presidential but not midterm elections -- and tens of thousands of undecided voters before Tuesday. Republicans were contacting about 200,000 targeted Missouri voters a day.

GOP officials said their biggest concern is the inability to turn out voters in districts they did not originally consider at risk. "We're able to move financial resources, but it's almost impossible to get human resources" into these newly competitive districts, said the GOP strategist.

It was that reality that took Bush to the Plains states yesterday. In heavily Republican districts, aides said, the president could make up for what the NRCC could not do. But Bush's schedule this weekend also showed that, because he has less sway with independents, there are many districts where his presence could do as much harm as good.

Elsewhere, in New Hampshire, Rep. Charles Bass (R) has seen his 20-point lead evaporate in the past five weeks, leaving the RNC with little time to implement even a bare-bones version of its mobilization plan, known as the 72-hour program. "We are not counting on them," said Matt Hagerty, campaign manager for Bass.

Instead, Bass is using an old-fashioned operation that relies on volunteers calling supporters, knocking on their doors and sending out 40,000 e-mails reminding them to vote. "We are running the same operation the congressman has run for the last six cycles," said Hagerty.

The DCCC identified 40 competitive districts in September and has continued to focus on them, rather than trying to build get-out-the-vote operations in some of these districts that have unexpected opportunities. Bass's Democratic challenger, Paul Hodes, is getting strategic advice from the DCCC but is relying mostly on a network of volunteers to turn out voters.

"You cannot buy G.O.T.V.," said Dana Houle, campaign manager for Hodes, referring to get-out-the-vote efforts. "You have to lay the foundation in terms of volunteer recruitment months beforehand."

Turnout operations can affect only races that are decided by a few thousand votes. With this in mind, the Philadelphia suburbs have become a key battleground. Both sides anticipated that the rematch between Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) and Democrat Lois Murphy could be decided by a percentage point or two, both plowed resources into the race over the summer in preparation for the final 72 hours of the campaign, and both expressed confidence in their operations.

But it is impossible to determine how voters will react. One group of GOP volunteers hit a leafy neighborhood over the weekend to rally support for Gerlach, but they made contact with only five of 73 GOP households they approached.

The NRCC rushed resources a month ago to New York's 26th District, where Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, chairman of the NRCC, was caught up in the finger-pointing over the handling of the Mark Foley House page scandal. Reynolds's team contacted more than 10 percent of the voters there on Saturday, and Democrats have installed some of their best veteran organizers in the district.

Activity has been especially intense in Indiana's 2nd District, where Rep. Chris Chocola (R) faces possible defeat by Democrat Joe Donnelly. Republicans said they contacted 124,000 households over the past few days -- more than half of all households in the district. One Donnelly canvasser visited so many households in the Logansport area that the local marshal forced him to register as a solicitor.

All Signs Point To A US House Run By Democrats (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

If most of the political prognosticators are calling it right, the House of Representatives is poised for a change of leadership: the first Democratic majority in 12 years.

Among the nonpartisan analysts who study the polls and dynamics of each of the 435 House races, the more cautious see the lower range of the Democratic net gain at about 20 seats - more than enough to achieve the 15-seat net gain needed to take control. On the higher end, the Democrats could achieve a more commanding takeover with net gains of 30 to 40 seats, they say.

Some Republicans, citing a superior turnout operation and a tendency among voters to "come home" to their political base on Election Day, are holding out hope that they can minimize losses and even hold on to a sliver of a majority. But privately, many Republicans are bracing themselves for a loss of at least the House, saying that national conditions - frustration over Iraq, scandals, economic insecurity, and an unpopular president - are likely to overwhelm the party's structural strengths. History also works against the GOP: Two-term presidents almost always see a loss of House seats by their party in the sixth year in office.

"If the Democrats can't win under these circumstances, then it's hard to imagine how they can ever win," says Gary Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California, San Diego.

The chairs of the two House campaign committees steered clear of forecasting net gains or losses Sunday, pointing instead to signs of hope for each side.

"Right now the 72-hour efforts by Republicans to turn their vote out will make the difference in what it looks like on Election Day," said Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Mr. Reynolds himself is fighting for his political life in a tough reelection battle, fueled in part by his role in the scandal over Florida Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate messages to male former pages. Reynolds has faced charges of appearing more concerned with holding onto Mr. Foley's seat than for the welfare of pages.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D) of Illinois, the Democratic campaign committee chair, resisted an overt prediction that his party will take over the House, and instead cited the scorecard on the eve of the election.

"There's one or two Democratic seats I'm concerned about, with about 48 Republican seats that we are contesting. I like those numbers," Mr. Emanuel said on "Meet the Press."

In some regions, the House electoral landscape presents a potentially bleak picture for Republicans. Clumps of seats with unfavorable local conditions - such as those of Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania - could go in a wave. The Republican Party of Ohio has been mired in scandal, putting Republicans up and down the ticket in trouble. Democrats are strongly favored to win the governor's and Senate races there, which could depress Republican turnout and boost Democratic House challengers, including some in historically Republican districts.

Rep. Steve Chabot (R) has held onto his seat in Cincinnati for six terms, despite Democrats' efforts election after election to pry him loose, but in this year's "wave" election, he could be swept out. Rep. Jean Schmidt (R), also of Ohio, who won a special election to fill the seat vacated by former Rep. Rob Portman (R) (now White House budget director) made national headlines for her criticism of Rep. John Murtha (R) when he turned against the Iraq war, and she has been in the Demo-crats' sights ever since.

House Republicans from New York also face the potential for depressed turnout, as polls show both the state's gubernatorial and Senate races will likely be blowouts favoring the Democrats. In Pennsylvania, also with strong Democrats topping their Senate and governor's races, at least four Republican-held House seats face varying degrees of vulnerability.

But most striking in this election cycle is how many once-solidly Republican seats have moved into the tossup column - seats in states such as Kansas, Florida, Arizona, Indiana, and North Carolina. The travel schedules of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, and other top administration officials betray a GOP playing defense, despite their rosy predictions that the party will hold onto Congress.

Some of the hard work by Republican officials on the ground may have paid off, making seats once assumed to be a lost cause appear competitive.

In Florida, the Foley seat is back in tossup range, and away from "lean Democratic" in most prognosticators' lists. The local GOP faces the challenge of educating voters that, in order to vote for Republican candidate Joe Negron, they must check off "Foley," since he resigned his seat too late to get his name off the ballot, but Negron is a popular state representative in a Republican district, and could win.

In Texas, the seat once held by Rep. Tom DeLay is also now a tossup, in spite of the fact that voters must write in the name of the replacement Republican - Shelley Sekula Gibbs - tapped to run for that seat after Mr. DeLay resigned amid scandal.

Hopes Run Low For Republicans (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Glenside, Pennsylvania

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

Marcel Groen, the chairman of the Montgomery County Democratic Committee, is feeling good.

“We will be responsible for electing a Democratic House,” he told a cheering crowd of 2,000 at a get-out-the-vote rally on Saturday. “But I don’t just want to win – I want to send a message.”

Parts of the county, just north of Philadelphia, are in three different congressional districts and victories by the Democratic challengers in each would go a long way to ensuring that the Democrats win the 15 additional seats they need to claim victory in Tuesday’s mid-term -elections.

Democrats in the state of Pennsylvania have been buoyed by Ed Rendell, the popular governor who is expected to defeat Republican candidate Lynn Swann by a wide margin. Democrat Bob Casey Jr, the son of a respected former governor, is expected to beat Rick Santorum, the conservative Republican senator and close ally of President George W. Bush.

The three Republican House incumbents in the Philadelphia suburbs – Mike Fitzpatrick, Curt Weldon and Jim Gerlach – have been battered by the unpopular war in Iraq, a series of Republican scandals, and broad voter dissatisfaction with Washington.

The Hotline, a Washington newsletter, includes them in the two dozen seats most likely to change hands.

Support for Mr Weldon, a 10-term incumbent, fell after the disclosure last month that the FBI was investigating whether he helped steer work to a public relations firm owned by his daughter and a long-time political ally. Mr Weldon’s campaign unveiled an unusual advertisement early last week, in which supporters said, “Would you give a friend the benefit of a doubt? Of course you would . . . He’s been there for us, now it’s our turn to be there for him.”

But at the end of the week the campaign cancelled most of its television advertising for the final days of the race, a sign that he is running out of cash and, perhaps, hope.

Mr Fitzpatrick, elected just two years ago, is still hard at work, with John McCain, the popular Arizona senator, set to appear with him at a rally yesterday. At a suburban station on a cold autumn morning, Mr Fitzpatrick struggled to get voters to stop to speak to him.

When they did, he talked about his long experience in the community and answered a few questions about the war in Iraq.

"The truth is, we invaded a country," he said, explaining why he favours a strategy for the withdrawal of US troops but opposes setting a fixed date for the chaos it would leave behind.

His opponent, Patrick Murphy, is one of about a dozen Democratic candidates who are veterans of US operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. He supports a timeline for withdrawal.

At the Saturday rally, Mr Murphy described riding through Iraq in a Humvee jeep "with no doors and no armour", then showed off the holes worn on the bottom of his shoes from weeks of campaigning. "Boots on the ground win elections," Mr Murphy said.

The close races have drawn a host of political celebrities. Al Gore, the former vice-president, and John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential candidate, both potential 2008 presidential candidates, made weekend appearances in the area.

Barack Obama, the Democratic senator from Illinois and another possible 2008 candidate, was the top attraction at Saturday's rally here, declaring Mr Murphy and other local candidates the "standard-bearers for what is going on all across the country".

Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader who is set to become speaker of the House if Democrats win a majority, echoed the theme. "You are the people that can make it happen," she told the crowd.

Republicans have also been rallying their troops. "You're the secret weapon in this campaign," Mr Santorum told a few dozen Republican volunteers in nearby Doylestown before they set out to knock on doors and remind voters to turn out.

Standing at the station, Mr Fitzpatrick said that if Republicans managed to keep control of Congress, he hoped the party leadership does not ignore the message of the past few months. "Things do need to change."

Braced against the morning wind, he seemed to concede that the results might be out of his hands.

"If we lose, it's not going to be because Patrick Murphy was a better candidate. It's because voters just want a change. If that's what happens, I'm OK with that."

Poll Finds U.S. Sentiment Similar To '94 (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — A national USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds remarkable parallels between the congressional elections Tuesday and the watershed elections in 1994 that swept Republicans into control of Congress.

•Then, likely voters by 51%-44% favored GOP congressional candidates. Now, 51%-44% favor Democratic ones.

•Then, 52% said they were paying "quite a lot" of attention to the elections, the highest since the Gallup Poll began asking the question in 1958. Now, 50% say they are paying "quite a lot" of attention.

•Then, disapproval of Congress was at 66%. Now, disapproval of Congress is at 70%.

"Based on history, a 7-point lead among likely voters still suggest Democrats will take enough votes to win a majority of seats in the House," says Frank Newport, editor-in-chief of the Gallup Poll. What gives some analysts pause, however, is the sophisticated redistricting over the past decade that has made most congressional districts less competitive.

What's more, President Bush's last-ditch push for votes and Sen. John Kerry's comments that seemed to denigrate the education level of U.S. forces in Iraq have helped energize Republican voters. A Democratic advantage of 23 percentage points a month ago and 13 points two weeks ago is now down to 7 points.

A Pew Research Center survey released Sunday also showed that an 11-point edge for Democrats on the congressional ballot two weeks ago had narrowed to 4 points among likely voters. "It's gone from a slam-dunk for Democrats to take the House to a pretty good chance," says Andy Kohut, director of the center.

The factors that created a difficult landscape for Republicans through the campaign remain unchanged. Six of 10 Americans in the USA TODAY Poll say they are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country. By 2-1 they say national issues, not local and state ones, are determining their vote. And on the dominant national issue, 56% call the decision to invade Iraq a mistake.

The survey of 1,362 likely voters, Thursday through Sunday, has a margin of error of +/-3 points.

The president and the war in Iraq remain at the center of this election: 36% of likely voters saying that are casting a ballot for a candidate to send a message that they oppose Bush; 20% to send a message that they support him.

What has shifted is the determination of Republicans to vote. The Democratic advantage among registered voters was 11 points, but Republican voters were more likely to be judged as sure to go to the polls, making the edge among likely voters smaller.

A month ago, the Democratic margin among registered and likely voters was identical.

Bush and other Republicans have warned about the perils of electing a Democratic-controlled Congress, and they also accused Kerry of belittling U.S. troops in Iraq with comments he said were a botched joke.

In the Pew survey, 84% of voters said they had heard about Kerry's remark, and 18% of independent voters said it raised serious doubts about voting for a Democrat.

Even so, by 40%-33%, likely voters in the USA TODAY Poll say the country would be better off if Democrats, not Republicans, controlled Congress.

Enthusiasm about voting is high: 58% say they are more enthusiastic than usual about voting and 68% say they are "absolutely certain" to vote — both records.

One reason: Both parties have been in touch. Among likely voters, 15% had been contacted by someone urging them to vote for a Republican, and 15% had been contacted by someone urging a Democratic vote. What's more, 27% had been contacted by both sides.

Parties Pour 11th-hour Cash Into Close Races (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Both political parties are making huge last-minute cash infusions into close House and Senate races, underscoring their traditional importance in endgame spending and the Democrats' new financial competitiveness with Republicans.

Just since Friday, Republicans have put more than $2 million into Senate races in New Jersey, Tennessee and Virginia, federal reports show. Democrats have spent $1.1 million for Senate candidates in Maryland, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia.

On the House side, Republicans spent $1.1 million in a single day to help Peter Roskam in his race against Democrat Tammy Duckworth in Illinois. And in a sign of continuing concern, the Republicans invested $275,000 to help their embattled House campaign chief, New York Rep. Tom Reynolds.

A check of 10 tight House races shows that as of Friday, Democratic party committees had spent nearly as much as Republicans in Indiana, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington. They outspent Republicans in New Hampshire, Connecticut and Arizona.

In GOP Rep. Jim Gerlach's district near Philadelphia, Republicans had spent $3.9 million to the Democrats' $3 million as of Friday. Still, challenger Lois Murphy had more cash on hand as of Oct. 18.

"It's unprecedented that the Democrats have as much money as the Republicans," says Michael Malbin, executive director of the non-partisan Campaign Finance Institute. He says Republicans have spent an average $1.3 million in each of 38 top races involving GOP incumbents, while Democrats have spent $1 million — "not quite as high, but serious money."

The parties aren't the only ones making last-minute investments. Major players for Republicans include tax and abortion opponent groups, the American Medical Association and the National Rifle Association. Unions, environmentalists, backers of gay and abortion rights, and MoveOn.org are helping Democrats.

The latest spending by parties and outside groups is not just for ads but also for get-out-the-vote efforts, including phone banks and canvassing door-to-door.

In the 10 House races analyzed by USA TODAY, candidates on both sides were relying on money from corporate and ideological political action committees in the final week. In the Idaho contest between Republican Bill Sali and Democrat Larry Grant, more than 75% of the contributions of $1,000 or more came from such groups.

According to the Federal Election Commission and PoliticalMoneyline.com, which tracks money in politics, House candidates overall had raised nearly $679 million as of Oct. 18 — 25% more than they raised in 2004. GOP incumbents increased their fundraising 26%; Democratic challengers more than doubled their fundraising, and Democratic candidates for open seats raised 60% more than in 2004.

One source of increased funds is members of Congress. Their campaign committees now account for 15% of money collected by party committees, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. That's three times as much as in 2002.

Small donors are another growing force. Malbin says such contributions, generally defined as less than $200, account for 47% of what parties have raised this year, up from 28% in 2002. The main reason is the rise of online giving.

Both parties use the Internet, but it has been a particular benefit for Democrats. Unlike Republicans, who have long had an extensive direct-mail list of small donors, Democrats once relied on huge contributions from relatively few individuals. That's no longer possible under federal law. New technology has allowed Democrats to "leapfrog" to e-mail solicitations and other online fundraising rather than develop a mailing list, Malbin says.

The overall spending trend is ever upward. In Missouri's tight Senate race, parties are spending close to $10 million each and the candidates have raised about $20 million. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had raised $38 million by Oct. 18 for her re-election campaign. That's about what the federal government estimated it would cost to wage a presidential primary campaign in 2000.

National Issues, Led By Iraq, Dominate Final Appeals In Congressional Campaigns (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON CROSSING, Pa., Nov. 5 — Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick, a Republican in his first term, came here on Sunday to show off what in any other year would have been the perfect symbol of why to re-elect a congressman: a cornfield that thanks largely to his efforts would soon become a national veterans cemetery, close to the place where Gen. George Washington rescued the morale of his troops and the nation with his Christmas attack of 1776.

But this year, with morale sagging in a different war, Mr. Fitzpatrick finds himself in a tough battle of his own, trying to distance himself from President Bush — even on a day when the conviction of Saddam Hussein was announced in Baghdad — without turning off the staunch Republican voters he needs to hold back his opponent, an antiwar Democrat and Iraq war veteran named Patrick Murphy.

So, to rally his troops on the last big day of campaigning for the midterm elections, Mr. Fitzpatrick pulled out a favorite weapon of Republican candidates in the same predicament: Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, whose reputation as an outspoken maverick makes him an appealing attraction here in the Eighth Congressional District, where registered Republicans outnumber Democrats but voters have chosen Democrats for president in recent years.

Mr. McCain hailed Mr. Fitzpatrick as an independent voice, one who "represents the next generation of our party and of our nation" and "an independent who will reach across the aisle when necessary."

But Mr. McCain acknowledged voters' frustration with the war, as well as his own.

"It's long and it's hard and it's tough," he told a group of veterans, as Mr. Fitzpatrick stood behind him in the sunshine of a crisp fall day. "And a lot of mistakes have been made in the conduct of the war, and we're paying a very heavy price for it."

"But my friends, we are there today," he added. "And I'm convinced that if we set a date for withdrawal, as some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle want to do, I think you're going to see chaos in the region."

A few towns away, Mr. Murphy rallied other veterans alongside Representative John P. Murtha, the conservative Pennsylvania Democrat whose turnabout on Iraq a year ago has made him his party's face of opposition to the war.

"They say we're going to win, we're going to have a victory; they say we're going to have democracy," Mr. Murtha said. "Well let me tell you, that's not a strategy, that's a goal. And there's no strategy. The strategy is stay the course. Even though they say it's not stay the course, that's what they've been saying — his opponent has been saying stay the course. That doesn't work."

Both candidates had lost their voices after a weekend of rallies featuring the luminaries of their national parties: Mr. McCain for Mr. Fitzpatrick, and Mr. Murtha, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Vice President Al Gore for Mr. Murphy.

Like Republicans across the country, Mr. Fitzpatrick, a former county commissioner, has tried to make the campaign about local issues. He accuses Mr. Murphy, who grew up in northeast Philadelphia, on the edge of the district, of moving here only to run for Congress. In a debate, he asked him how many school districts Bucks County had, leaving Mr. Murphy flustered when he could not answer.

"Why are we voting for Mike?" an organizer shouted to the veterans at the Fitzpatrick rally. Then he answered himself: "He's one of us!"

At a boilermakers' hall, a busload of Harvard students had come for the weekend to volunteer for Mr. Murphy because he impressed them in a speech last year as a young voice for change. And at 33, he looks younger than some of them. He has no experience in elective office. But by talking about the war he saw up close, and arguing, as he did in a closing advertisement, that "George Bush and Mike Fitzpatrick have no idea how to fix this mess," Mr. Murphy has pulled himself up in the polls.

Sunday morning, he told volunteers he was five points ahead in his own poll.

"But polls don't vote," he reminded them, urging them to motivate other voters. "We're on the crest of greatness. Let's just go execute and make it happen."

At the rally with Mr. McCain, Joe Amodei, a 75-year-old Korean War veteran, lamented Mr. Fitzpatrick's position in a bad year for Republicans. "If it was just him against the other guy, and no outside national issues, he'd walk away with it," Mr. Amodei said. "His opponent has made it about larger issues. If he made it about the county, he'd have no chance to win."

Across the country, candidates clashed Sunday over the war, immigration, the economy, ethics and the Bush administration, seeking advantage in the closing hours of an election that will determine control of the House and the Senate. With Mr. Hussein's death sentence injecting a late new element into the debate, Republicans sought to limit their losses and Democrats argued the need for change in Washington, as tens of thousands of volunteers on each side went door to door to rally voters.

Economy

Receding Gas Prices Quiet a Major Issue

SEYMOUR, Ind., Nov. 5 — There is uneasiness in being a marginal Republican incumbent in a longtime Democratic district.

It surfaced, briefly, at a country restaurant on Sunday when a friendly voice told Representative Mike Sodrel to rest easy about Tuesday.

Mr. Sodrel, a freshman Republican, demurred, replying: "I don't know if we got it made. But I think we're going to prevail."

That cautious note seemed appropriate in one of the tightest races in the country, here in Indiana's Ninth Congressional District, where an important economic concern — high gasoline prices — has been somewhat alleviated in the past few weeks as the price at the pump has edged down.

The district was held for 40 years by Democrats, including Lee H. Hamilton, the former Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, until Mr. Sodrel took it — barely — on President Bush's coattails in 2004. Now polls show the seat as a tossup between Mr. Sodrel and the Democrat he defeated, Baron Hill, who had held the seat for three terms.

The race has been as sharp-edged as the southern Indiana countryside is soft and undulating. Off a pastoral road, a billboard denounces Mr. Hill as a supporter of same-sex marriage, abortion and taking "God" out of the Pledge of Allegiance. Across the way a sign for Mr. Hill answers: "Stop the lies. Shame on Mike Sodrel."

The local airwaves are pulsing with commercials denouncing "Millionaire Mike" — Mr. Sodrel is a self-made trucking magnate — or "liberal Baron Hill."

On Sunday, Mr. Sodrel reduced this grudge rematch to a simple dynamic. "He wants his seat back," he said softly.

Mr. Hill, at a campaign stop in the courthouse square in Scottsburg, was all fire and aggression, denouncing the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, millionaire C.E.O.'s and Republicans caught in scandal.

Mr. Sodrel was sticking to his guns, greeting supporters at Graceland Baptist Church, a sprawling edifice in New Albany, and insisting that flag, marriage and abortion mattered more here than the war: "I always tell people, if Norman Rockwell exists, it is in the Ninth District of Indiana." War

Veterans' Support And Iraq at the Fore

DES PLAINES, Ill., Nov. 5 — Even as volunteers lined up Sunday morning to carry the last sacks of leaflets into a web of suburbs west of Chicago, Iraq loomed over the tense race for the Congressional seat that Henry J. Hyde, a Republican, is leaving.

One volunteer, Henry Nerwin, 81 and a Navy veteran, had a question for Tammy Duckworth, the Democratic candidate in the district, who sat in a wheelchair, having lost her legs when the helicopter she was piloting in Iraq took fire: Would she quit the Veterans of Foreign Wars now?

On Friday, Peter J. Roskam, the Republican candidate, announced that he had received the endorsement of the V.F.W.'s political action committee. It was the latest development in a campaign defined by punches and counterpunches in a flood of television commercials and daily leafleting that some voters complain has literally covered their porches.

Ms. Duckworth, who says the war in Iraq should never have been waged, said that she had never talked to the veterans group about an endorsement and that this was "just politics." Mr. Nerwin said he thought it was "reprehensible" that the V.F.W. had not endorsed her.

"I've been advocating for veterans since I was in my hospital bed," said Ms. Duckworth, who said she would maintain her V.F.W. membership.

A spokesman for Mr. Roskam, Jason Roe, said that Mr. Roskam, who did not serve in the military, had received the endorsement because he had sought it out and his positions on veterans' issues suited the group.

At a diner in Villa Park, Jean Sacco said she had been leaning toward Mr. Roskam until Ms. Duckworth appeared at her table on Sunday. They talked about immigration, but Ms. Duckworth's military sacrifice was also important to Ms. Sacco, who said her son was a service member. "That matters to me," she said.

At a pancake breakfast in Bartlett, Lee Ann Rydosz said she had long voted Republican, as most in this district have for Mr. Hyde's 32 years in office, and would again. Mr. Roskam has said that the troops should leave Iraq, though he is uncertain when the ideal time for that will arrive.

"The job in Iraq has to be done," Ms. Rydosz said. "We need to let the Iraqis get on their feet." MONICA DAVEY

Anti-Incumbency

13-Term Congressman Fights Call for Change

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Nov. 5 — As a new poll suggested that he might be slipping behind his Democratic challenger, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. told volunteers Sunday that they were the "secret weapon" that would deliver him a 14th term.

The poll, which queried 400 likely voters and was published Sunday by The Miami Herald, found that 49 percent said they preferred the Democratic challenger, State Senator Ron Klein, to Mr. Shaw, the Republican, who drew the support of 40 percent of respondents; 6 percent were undecided. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus five percentage points.

For most of the race, Mr. Shaw, who has been asking voters to trust his seniority, has been in a dead heat with Mr. Klein, who has been promoting his status as an outsider.

Mr. Klein spent the day greeting voters at a parade and a festival, changing his schedule as his aides considered and reconsidered the most valuable use of his time.

Mr. Shaw was less frenzied, rallying volunteers at a lunch here with the message that the race was tight but that his turnout operation had more muscle. His spokeswoman said that 50 volunteers had arrived from Washington to join dozens already in the district, which runs along the coast from Fort Lauderdale to northern Palm Beach County.

"No one is organized like we are," Mr. Shaw said before the volunteers set out to walk precincts, run phone banks and wave signs along highways. "You have no idea how important you are. The other side does not have this support, and we are going to go out with our heads high and have a great celebration on Tuesday night."

Mr. Shaw continued to run advertisements attacking Mr. Klein. His latest accused Mr. Klein of siding with insurance companies as a state lawmaker and lobbyist while property insurance rates skyrocketed.

Mr. Klein's most recent advertisement does not mention Mr. Shaw but repeats Mr. Klein's mantra that Washington needs new and independent voices.

On Saturday, while Mr. Shaw and his wife greeted voters, Mr. Klein enlisted former President Bill Clinton to help drill home his anti-incumbency theme at a rally in Pompano Beach. Mr. Clinton said it was time to rid the nation of "the most special-interest-dominated government in my lifetime." ABBY GOODNOUGH

Social Issues

A Race for Every Vote (Left to Cast, That Is)

BELLEVUE, Wash., Nov. 5 — In Darcy Burner's final rush of campaign advertisements, she compares her opponent to President Bush and says he is out of touch with his constituents on the war and social issues. Ms. Burner's opponent, Representative Dave Reichert, is running advertisements saying she lacks experience, dodges difficult questions and wants to raise taxes.

Yet even as the tight race intensifies between Ms. Burner, a Democrat and former Microsoft executive with little political experience, and Mr. Reichert, the first-term Republican she is challenging in the Eighth Congressional District, it is also closer to over than many others across the country.

Both campaigns said Sunday that up to 40 percent of voters here had already sent in their ballots, taking advantage of the state's mail-in voting option, and that more than 70 percent were expected to do so by Election Day, leaving a small fraction to show up at the polls on Tuesday.

"Hitting them all at this point just annoys them," Ms. Burner said Sunday as she visited homes in this affluent suburb of Seattle that her campaign had pinpointed as potentially supportive. "So we're trying to be considerate and productive."

Mr. Reichert spent part of Sunday ringing doorbells but said he had also worked lines at the many Starbucks in his district, which pushes south and east from the more politically moderate Bellevue to rural areas where Republicans are strongest.

Mr. Reichert, who holds a narrow lead over Ms. Burner in most polls, said voters had told him they were concerned about the war, immigration and the federal budget.

Ms. Burner, however, said Mr. Reichert was "fiscally irresponsible and socially conservative," out of step with his well-educated, technologically savvy constituents on social and economic issues like abortion, stem-cell research and the minimum wage.

The congressman, after initially opposing embryonic stem-cell research, changed his position this year, going against President Bush. A campaign spokeswoman, Kimberly Cadena, said the shift was not politically motivated, adding, "It's based on his heart and what the science he found told him." WILLIAM YARDLEY

Immigration

In a Border State, a Bottom-Line Topic

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Nov. 5 — As Harry Mitchell, a Democrat who has been giving Representative J. D. Hayworth a tough challenge, sought to energize the volunteers about to knock on doors for him in Phoenix on Sunday, he invoked the word that he believed summed up his campaign: change.

"We reflect the mood of the country," said Mr. Mitchell, a state senator and former mayor of Tempe. "And the mood of the country is 'We want change.' "

With that, the volunteers set out, hoping to deliver on his prediction in the predominantly Republican Fifth Congressional District, where Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Hayworth have argued over taxes, health care, their personalities and, of course, this being a border state, illegal immigration.

On Sunday, neither Mr. Mitchell, who appeared at get-out-the-vote rallies, nor Mr. Hayworth, a six-term Republican, focused on specifics in the illegal immigration debate, which originally drove the campaign. Instead they made more general pleas for voters to get to the polls on Tuesday.

Mr. Hayworth is known for an uncompromising approach to illegal immigration — he emphasizes building a border fence and vehemently opposes any program that would lead to citizenship for illegal workers — and often delivers fiery rhetoric on talk shows.

Mr. Mitchell brought in a supporter, Representative Xavier Becerra, Democrat of California, to increase turnout among Latinos angry at Mr. Hayworth's hard-line stance.

"Are we the party of fear?" Mr. Becerra called out at one rally.

"No!" he and supporters yelled.

Mr. Hayworth, meanwhile, had a morning interview on the Fox News Channel, walked through precincts and rallied supporters at a cowboy-themed steakhouse.

In the interview on "Fox and Friends," Mr. Hayworth dismissed Democrats and pundits in Washington who were speculating on, and in some cases predicting, his political demise.

"I am going to hang on to my seat," he said, "and I think there are going to be a lot of surprises on Election Day."

And at the restaurant here, Mr. Hayworth said his top concern was to secure the border. "National security," he said, "is border security." RANDAL C. ARCHIBOLD

Scandal

Using Abramoff Case, and Waving It Off

STOCKTON, Calif., Nov. 5 — On a warm, cloudless morning, Lawrence Talbot, a volunteer coordinator for Jerry McNerney, stood beneath a stand of palms, briefing his troops on the day's plans — and his candidate's positions.

"It's all about accountability and bringing integrity back to Washington," said Mr. Talbot, 35, who works in public relations. "And that's what we want to emphasize."

Mr. Talbot was one of hundreds of volunteers canvassing California's 11th Congressional District this weekend for Mr. McNerney, the Democrat locked in a tight campaign against the incumbent Republican, Representative Richard W. Pombo. On Sunday, both men crisscrossed the district, which sprawls over four counties east of San Francisco.

Mr. Pombo moved from a rally to a veterans event and then planned to call voters into the evening. Mr. McNerney hit a festival devoted to cranes (the birds, not the machinery), visited with volunteers and was scheduled to have dinner with a group of Native American voters.

Mr. McNerney, who was soundly defeated by Mr. Pombo in 2004, has based much of his campaign this time on his environmental credentials (he is a wind energy expert) and the tinge of scandal hanging to Mr. Pombo, who accepted tens of thousands of dollars in past campaign contributions from the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Pombo, who hails from a successful Central Valley real estate family, has denied any wrongdoing. And he counters questions about his tenure by saying that Mr. McNerney is little known in the district where the Pombo name adorns buildings and for-sale signs.

At an event in Pleasanton, Mr. McNerney's hometown, Mr. Pombo spoke briefly to a crowd of veterans even as McNerney supporters across the street waved signs paid for by the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund, one of several environmental groups that have spent heavily to try to defeat Mr. Pombo. Several amputees in wheelchairs echoed the theme of a McNerney campaign advertisement, which attacked Mr. Pombo for voting against prosthetic devices for soldiers in Iraq.

But Roy Huskey Jr., a Vietnam veteran, said he had decided to support Mr. Pombo, saying he thought he was an honest man. "The Democrats and Republicans both took money from Abramoff," Mr. Huskey said. "What do you expect? He's a lobbyist." JESSE McKINLEY

Bitter Campaign Boils Down To Party Turnout (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Both Democrats and Republicans say that after months of ugly battles, tomorrow's election will come down to which party does a better job of getting its voters to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0091112

"We are feeling very good," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "This election has evolved into a national referendum on change."

But to take control of the House and Senate, Democrats must overcome a Republican ground game that exceeded nearly all expectations in the past two national elections.

Republican leaders, meanwhile, continued warning yesterday that Election Day could be bleak for them and urged their conservative base to turn out. Also, Republicans defended in the starkest terms possible the war in Iraq, which polls show has been a tremendous drain on their popularity during this election.

"We need to win the war, and it would be disastrous to lose," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, during an appearance with Mr. Schumer yesterday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"To pull out and withdraw is losing," she said. "The Democrats appear to be content with losing."

Mr. Schumer called her charge "outrageous" and said voters no longer trust President Bush and congressional Republicans to run the war.

"Democrats want to win the war, which is why we want to change the strategy," he said.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, ticked off five elections in the past 50 years where voters broke heavily to throw incumbents out of office.

"Every decade, the American people have a big election where they say no to the status quo and yes to a new direction," he said. "And this election is yes to a new direction, which is what Democrats are offering."

Mr. Emanuel said Democrats are defending one or two of their seats with hopes of capturing 48 seats held by Republicans. Democrats must score a net gain of 15 seats to assume control of the chamber.

Even Republicans have acknowledged privately in recent weeks that they expect Democrats to win the House or come within a handful of seats of doing so. But polling in recent days also suggests a shift in favor of Republicans.

Republican hopes were boosted by three separate polls released this weekend showing the party rapidly closing a gap in the so-called "generic ballot question," a measure of overall partisan trends.

Democrats' advantage in the generic ballot shrank from 14 percentage points to six points -- 51 percent to 45 percent -- in two weeks, according to a Washington Post/ABC News poll released yesterday. Similar results were reported in a Pew Research Center survey, showing that a 13-point Democratic advantage (53 percent to 40 percent) among likely voters in early October had dwindled to just four points (47 percent to 43 percent) in the first four days of November. And the latest Gallup/USA Today poll shows that a Democratic advantage of 23 points a month ago had tightened to seven points (51 percent to 44 percent) in the latest survey, conducted Thursday through yesterday.

"We're in a tough political environment," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said on "Fox News Sunday" yesterday. "But I've been on the road for these last five weeks. I've been in all these tough districts, and our candidates are doing what they need to be doing.

"They're running their grass-roots operation, the get-out-the-vote effort," he said. "And they're talking about the issues the American people care about, whether it's keeping taxes low, securing our borders or making sure the president has the tools to fight the terrorists."

Republicans say that Democrats have not offered viable alternatives for fighting the war on terror and accuse Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a liberal Democrat from San Francisco, of keeping a low profile in recent weeks so as not to ruin her party's prospects of seizing control of the House.

In an interview Friday with the San Francisco Chronicle, Mrs. Pelosi said she expects to pick up 22 to 26 seats and said her only concern was that Republicans will rig the election.

"That is the only variable in this," she said. "Will we have an honest count?"

Democrats are determined to "take back the country for the American people -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- because it's been held hostage by the radical right wing of the Republican Party," Mrs. Pelosi said. "This is a freak show, and it has to come to an end."

While Mrs. Pelosi has steered clear of toss-up races in conservative districts across the country, she campaigned over the weekend for Democrats in the Philadelphia suburbs and Connecticut.

Mr. Bush yesterday campaigned in Grand Island, Neb., where he delivered his carefully crafted campaign speech for a seventh time. The president urged a packed house of supporters to turn out the vote.

"I really do want to thank the grass-roots activists, the people who worked hard to get these candidates to where they are. And I just urge you to keep working for the next 48 hours," he said to cheers.

As he has done repeatedly during his six-day, 10-state effort to energize Republicans before Election Day, Mr. Bush took issue with inside-the-Beltway "prognosticators."

"I'm sure you've heard the same predictions I've heard," the president said. "The prognosticators have already decided the outcome of this election before the good people of Nebraska have voted. But don't worry about it, the same thing happened in 2004.

"Some of them up in Washington had already picked out their new offices in the West Wing," he said, provoking laughter from the Republican crowd. "They listened to the prognosticators. Then the people showed up to the polls, and the movers were not needed."

Later yesterday, Mr. Bush delivered his eighth rally speech, this time in Topeka, Kan. And today, Mr. Bush will make campaign stops in Florida and Arkansas before ending his campaign, as he always does, with a rally in Dallas.

Campaigns Implore The Party Faithful To Bring Their Loyalty To The Polls (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The season of persuasion is over. This is the season of motivation.

From Nashville, Ind., where Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R) was urging business owners to help him stop Democrats from seizing the House and raising their taxes, to Nashville, Tenn., where Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) were suggesting to black churchgoers that God wants Ford in the Senate, candidates around the country spent last weekend preaching to their choirs.

In the campaign's final weekend, candidates weren't trying to turn out voters who might not vote their way. They were chasing the "ones and twos," political-junkie shorthand for the most likely supporters on their computer-generated lists, and firing up their volunteers.

President Bush stumped for red-state Republicans in Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska. Former president Bill Clinton rallied the Democratic base in New Jersey, Michigan, Florida and Maryland.

Republicans warned that if House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) becomes speaker, Democrats will impose hippie values on the heartland. Democrats warned that if Bush gets another rubber-stamp Republican Congress, America will "stay the course."

"This is our chance to finally -- finally! -- say no to George W. Bush," House candidate Diane Farrell told a breakfast of Democratic activists yesterday in Norwalk, Conn.

It's too late to raise money, win debates or unveil six-point health-care plans. Now it's time to get out the vote. So at a campaign rally in Blue Bell, Pa., Sen. Rick Santorum was telling Republican diehards to ignore polls showing big leads for his Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr. "Democrats have polls," he declared. "We have workers at the polls!"

A few minutes later, at a rally with Pelosi and the ubiquitous Obama in Norristown, Pa., Gov. Edward G. Rendell urged the Democratic faithful to ignore those same polls. "The only way we lose is if we ease up," he said.

Meanwhile, at the Owl Cafe in Laurel, Mont., Democratic Senate challenger Jon Tester was telling supporters to play close attention to polls that showed momentum shifting to the GOP incumbent, Sen. Conrad Burns. After leading in polls for months, while Burns was defending his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and making a series of foot-in-mouth blunders, Tester admitted yesterday that the race is now tied and begged the sympathetic diners to get five of their friends to the polls. "If you can do that, you'll have voted five times," he said.

In general, Democrats are trying to exploit widespread disapproval of Bush and the GOP Congress, while Republicans are arguing that Democrats would be worse. So the closing days of the campaign, like the rest of the campaign, have made "The McLaughlin Group" look like "Masterpiece Theatre."

Burns is making "robo-calls" claiming that Tester hasn't bought a hunting license in 15 years. Former representative Baron Hill (D-Ind.) is running ads attacking Sodrel as "Millionaire Mike," as in, "Millionaire Mike voted to cut veterans' benefits while accepting pay raises." Supporters of Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) are distributing leaflets with a photo of Farrell under the headline "Coffee Talk with the Taliban," because one board member of one organization that endorsed her favored negotiations over combat in Afghanistan.

"It's tough all around, I'd be lying to say anything else," Connecticut Republican activist Chuck Stango said with a shrug. "You never want to leave any stone unthrown."

Often, those stones are directed at politicians who won't be on the ballots in question. In Ohio, Republicans printed thousands of flyers with grainy black-and-white photos of Pelosi, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), warning that the "Hollywood values" of a Democratic Congress would make America "a haven for terrorists." At a meeting with supporters in Helmsburg, Ind., Sodrel warned that Pelosi "represents San Francisco very well."

"Scary!" one volunteer called out.

But while nasty ads and famous surrogates get the attention, activists expect the midterms to turn on voter outreach -- knocking on doors and working the phones. In 2002 and 2004, Republicans dominated the ground game, and they hope that will save them in 2006. "There's no secret to how I will win," Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) told a crowd of campaign workers crowded into a Waterbury storefront. "Three words: work, work, work."

Of course, reaching voters is not the same as mobilizing them, and Republicans are clearly nervous that the current political climate will keep their base home. In Missouri, one of numerous states where Obama was pumping up Democrats yesterday, Republicans were so desperate to find ones and twos that they risked calling voters while the Kansas City Chiefs were playing the St. Louis Rams.

In Ohio, they recruited door-knockers from a temp agency for $12 an hour. They gave Bush a raucous reception at his "Victory in the Heartland" rally yesterday in Grand Island, Neb., but even in friendly territory, they didn't fill the hall.

Still, turnout is a relative thing. You don't need to turn out everyone -- just more than your opponent.

"If we get out the ones and twos," Indiana Republican activist R. Dale Cassiday told a group of Sodrel's campaign workers, "we'll win this election."

Two Parties Far Apart In Turnout Tactics Too (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

BOCA RATON, FLA. — Jewish voters received a pamphlet about Israel's fight with Hezbollah. Spanish speakers heard radio ads about Fidel Castro. Seniors got recorded telephone calls from crooner Pat Boone, now 72, about Social Security.

As Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) fights to keep his seat in Congress, he is drawing heavily from the Republican playbook of dividing voters by their backgrounds and interests and appealing to them with tailored pitches. His success — along with his party's hopes for hanging onto its congressional majorities — relies in part on databases and search tools used to identify sympathetic voters and move them to the polls.

Shaw's Democratic challenger has a far different strategy. Instead of specialized appeals, state legislator Ron Klein repeats a simple message to nearly every audience: Iraq is a mess, and it is time for a change.

That contrast underscores a central question to be answered Tuesday in this South Florida House district and other competitive races across the country: Which political force will prove stronger — the niche-marketing effort, led by GOP strategist Karl Rove and powered by computerized outreach methods, or the classic "throw the bums out" mood of an electorate uneasy with the Iraq war and unhappy with one-party rule?

"We'll find out soon," said Klein as he walked through one of the many affluent neighborhoods in this seaside district, trying to persuade voters to oust an incumbent who has served in Congress for a quarter-century.

As the two campaigns make their final appeals, the differences suggest that many of the advantages that have boosted Republicans to victory in the past — more money, redrawn congressional districts and the superior voter targeting demonstrated by Shaw's courtship of Jews, Latinos and seniors — may be less potent this time.

The moderate 22nd District is one of three in Florida alone considered vulnerable for the GOP. Nationwide, about three dozen House races are competitive. To control the House, Democrats need to gain 15 seats; for the Senate, they must pick up six.

Shaw began the campaign with an arsenal typical of GOP incumbents, including a head start on fund-raising. But voter anger and a sense among donors that Democrats could control Congress have put Klein close to financial parity.

Now, the race is considered winnable for the Democrats, and Shaw's best hope comes from the GOP strategy of narrow-casting and voter identification.

On Friday, as in GOP campaigns across the country, the Shaw team's "72-hour plan" got underway — its final effort to reach people who, according to their profile in the party's national database, are likely to favor Republican candidates.

At a field office in Boca Raton, dozens of volunteers turned up to knock on doors and talk to voters. A staffer distributed clipboards with printed pages of names, addresses and detailed maps.

The printouts came from the "Voter Vault," the GOP's national database, which tagged voters with labels showing why they were worth contacting: Some were dubbed "socos" (social conservatives) or "fiscos" (fiscal conservatives) or "soft Dems" (crossover voters). Each had already been identified as ready to favor Shaw. The goal was to persuade each one, using hints from the database, to make the effort to go to the polls.

Party leaders have built a 72-hour plan for every significant GOP race in the nation. The effort was developed by Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman after the 2000 election, in which Democrats outpaced the GOP in grass-roots activism and nearly won the presidency.

The "Voter Vault" is a central element of the plan, and the party invested more than $15 million to update the system this year. So far this election cycle, it has guided 24 million phone or in-person contacts to conservative voters.

Following the plan, over the campaign's final three days, GOP field offices in Shaw's district must file updated spreadsheets every three hours to the state GOP in Tallahassee, showing how many voters have been personally contacted. State party officials report that data to national headquarters, where staff members make sure that individual campaigns are meeting their goals.

By contrast, Klein believes that his broad appeal on Iraq and the need for change in Washington hold the keys to victory. Still, he too has scrambled to reach targeted groups.

Klein acknowledges that the GOP has an advantage in voter turnout, but said his campaign has spent a year building a field organization and a competing database. However, his database received only limited help from the national Democratic Party, and it has less detail than the GOP's.

Despite fewer resources, Klein's field director developed a program to reach seasonal residents, or "snowbirds," at their homes outside Florida. Klein's campaign has tried to identify residents of gated communities that are off-limits to candidates and canvassers, and to recruit volunteers within the walls. It also used a visit by former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland, disabled in Vietnam, to reach out to veterans.

Klein says he has employed enough canvassers to contact 60,000 backers in the final three days; on Friday alone, the campaign says, it reached 7,000 people by phone or in person.

And Democrats are counting on additional help from an ambitious voter-contact program by labor unions, though it is not coordinated with Klein's campaign.

Yet Klein's campaign appears to be behind Shaw's, whose workers say they reached 15,000 people Friday and have a goal of contacting at least 100,000 in the campaign's closing days.

But for all of the sophistication of the GOP plan, there are signs it could fall short.

As one of Shaw's teams made its rounds Friday, carrying GOP door-hangers and dressed in T-shirts advertising the Republican candidate for governor, a voter identified as a Shaw supporter said she had no intention of supporting the Republican Party this year.

"I just don't know about the war," said Karen Rossen, 48, a dental office manager from Delray Beach. "I think the Democrats would be easier to deal with." A mountain of mail has arrived promoting Shaw and other Republicans, Rossen said, but she throws it all away, calling it "a waste of money."

Several voters targeted on one three-hour walk agreed to back the GOP ticket. But of 99 households assigned to this particular team of home-schooled teenagers, only 15 people were contacted directly. Many on the list had moved, or lived in buildings that banned solicitors. Two reacted angrily when asked whom they were voting for.

Nori Lapes, a longtime GOP volunteer, said she sensed a change in attitude this year as she canvassed. Some voters complained about the war and the House page scandal involving former GOP Rep. Mark Foley, who represented an adjacent district.

"Some people are more subdued," said Lapes, a clothing designer from Boca Raton.

But strategists say the power of the 72-hour plan is its ability to reach voters who might be hesitating. Lapes said she would spend 10 minutes or more standing in doorways, urging people to stick with the GOP.

"One man was so confused, he wasn't going to vote," she said. "But by the time I left, he had a smile on his face. I think he was convinced."

In addition to talking to individual voters, Shaw has used targeted messages to reach specific groups. He sent Jewish voters a pamphlet featuring pictures of him with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and wounded soldiers. He produced two radio spots in Spanish, even though the district has a minuscule Latino population.

Klein did not reach out to either group with specialized mailings, illustrating how the GOP remains more meticulous in searching for every possible vote. It also reflects the party's experience in 2000, when Shaw won by fewer than 600 votes.

After 2000, Shaw's district was redrawn by Florida's GOP-led legislature to include more Republicans. But this year, even some Democrats have heard from Shaw about his opposition to President Bush's stance on stem-cell research.

By Tuesday night, voters here and across the country will show whether such precision tactics can withstand the broader wave of anger that Klein hopes will send him to Washington. A poll in Sunday's Miami Herald showed Klein with a 10-point lead, suggesting that Democrats may soon be celebrating.

But there's another election in just two years, when Iraq and GOP scandals may not dominate the debate. So what would Democratic incumbents, forced to combat all of the Republican advantages, do then?

"Maybe we can learn from them in the future," Klein said of the Republicans' tactics.

If not, even Democratic strategists concede, their party could soon find itself relegated again to the back bench.

In Campaigns' Last Hours, A Get-out-the-vote Contest (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

BETHESDA, MD.

Fueled by cans of Dr. Pepper and tubs of candy left over from Halloween, volunteers at the Democratic phone bank in a storefront here are deep into calls by mid-morning Saturday - an effort that could seal a victory for their party on Nov. 7 ... or not.

The question they're asking is the same across America: Can we count on your vote on Tuesday? If the answer is yes, there will be a follow-up call on Election Day: Have you voted?

Nothing is more basic in a campaign than getting out the vote. The Republican Party is famous for its well-oiled mechanism for identifying, finding, and prodding its voters all the way to polling sites, but this year, Democratic leaders say, they're ready to match the GOP's vaunted "72-hour plan" call for call.

Note: In the Bethesda office - campaign headquarters for US Rep. Benjamin Cardin, who is running for Senate in a tight race against Lt. Gov. Michael Steele (R) - no one is dialing a phone. Calls to targeted voters are automated, allowing volunteers to talk to as many as 100 probable supporters an hour. Instead of recording responses on sheets of paper, volunteers punch "1" (for "yes") on their phone keypads, and that voter's file is automatically updated.

These automated voter files can match data from other sources, revealing information such as an individual's ethnicity, race, religion, income, financial data, subscriptions, buying habits, and political history, even from states where a voter has formerly lived. Routes for volunteer canvassers are integrated with mapping software.

"Our use of data has become much better and more efficient," says Artie Harris of the Maryland Democratic Party. "We have thousands of volunteers and paid canvassers on the streets working very, very hard, contacting hundreds of thousands of voters."

In Maryland, polls show that the GOP's Mr. Steele, an African-American, could take a bigger bite out of the black vote in neighboring Prince George's County than Democrats had expected. It makes the get-out-the-vote effort here in Montgomery County all the more crucial for Mr. Cardin. Republicans turn on the jets

Until the 2002 campaign, Democrats, backed by labor union supporters, typically had the edge in turning out their voters. But the "72-hour" get-out-the-vote (GOTV) program developed by Karl Rove, President Bush's adviser, and Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee (RNC) chairman - which includes microtargeted voter lists and a nearly year-round mobilization effort - gave Republicans a strategic and technological edge that helped them hold onto the House and Senate in the past two elections. This year, the RNC promises "the biggest midterm GOTV operation in history."

Since then, Democrats have scrambled to catch up. By 2004, the Democratic National Committee had improved its automated voter files, but the operation was prone to glitches. Some state GOTV teams couldn't access the files until days before the election. After that campaign, the DNC launched an $8 million overhaul of its voter-file system and invested in training in all 50 states.

"Through Governor Dean's 50-state strategy, we put field staff on the ground in all 50 states a year ago," says DNC communications director Karen Finney.

"A lot of people criticized [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean for his 50-state project. They wanted him to focus on a small number of battleground states," says Kim Gandy, chair of the National Organization of Women and its political action committee, who is spending her vacation helping to organize the phone bank here. "But what has happened in the last month shows the wisdom of what he has done, because there are competitive races in states we never thought there would be, and now there is a mechanism that could put these Democratic candidates over the top." Rebuilding in West Virginia

In West Virginia, the state Democratic Party started rebuilding its precinct captain structure in June 2005. With help from the DNC, it set up an automated, updated voter file accessible down to the precinct level. Volunteers can now see prospective voters' party identification, gender, age, how they voted in the past six to eight elections, whether an absentee ballot was used, plus appended microtargeting data such as estimated household income, occupation, magazine subscriptions, whether they have kids in school, and what they told previous party canvassers.

"Twenty years ago, Democrats here had an excellent get-out-the-vote system, and we're trying to get back to that ... and to branch out to traditional Republican areas," says Derek Scarbro, field director for the West Virginia State Democratic Party. "Our ability to track and manage that data has come a long way in West Virginia, and that's helpful. We even think we have an edge," adds Mr. Scarbro. The number of Democrats casting votes early is up 3 percent from the level in 2004. "Republicans are down a bit, and that's encouraging," he says.

Still, top GOP campaign advisers say the party's turnout plan can give Republicans the edge they need to win close races this week. "There are about 30 hotly contested [House] races, within the margin of error, and our 72-hour effort will make the difference on what it looks like on Election Day," said Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, on Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Some voting experts say the get-out-the-vote arms race is less than meets the eye.

"The Republican turnout machine is a myth," says Robert Richie, executive director for FairVote - The Center for Voting and Democracy, based in Maryland. "There's very little to indicate from the results that the Republicans are doing a better job at mobilizing people," he says. Republicans won in 2002 and 2004 not because they had higher-tech turnout toys, but because they persuaded people.

"Voter turnout is not very complicated. It's identifying voters, reminding them to vote, reminding them again, then making sure they vote," adds Mr. Richie. "You can call new techniques something fancy, but at the end of the day it's the most basic thing you do. Both sides do it."

The Green Card (WSJ)

By George Ball

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

After closing our fiscal year at Burpee Seeds, I noticed some intriguing figures in the sales of flower and vegetable seeds to home gardeners that, while displaying great differences, also show affinities that would warm a compost heap. Politics, in my opinion, is not so much a contest between different states of red and blue as between different shades of green -- a comforting reality in today's frosty political climate.

Let's first examine garden flowers. Both red-state Republicans and blue-state Dems grow sunflowers, zinnias and marigolds. However, the differences quickly bloom. Blue states buy many more impatiens, snapdragons and columbines -- expensive and sophisticated sun or shade flowers with varied and subtle colors. On the other hand, red states favor overwhelmingly boisterous morning glories, traditional nasturtiums and inexpensive four o'clocks. The sunny red states like to keep it plain and simple; the dappled blues like to make it diverse and edgy.

But wait -- in vegetable veritas. First, the comfort zone consists of a big garden with both Democrats and Republicans happily weeding squashes, cucumbers, peas and basil -- everyone grows a lot of them. But blue states grow a surprisingly wide range of tomatoes, along with both sweet and hot peppers and a fair amount of cilantro and dill. Think homemade salsas, poached salmon and heirloom vegetable collections. Yet red-staters are equally surprising and almost exotic in their preferences for green beans, onions, potatoes, carrots, sweet corn, parsley and oregano. When they do grow tomatoes, they choose only big slicers and paste types -- no fancy heirlooms. Again, they like vining in both vegetables and flowers, and easy-to-sow crops, half of them to be dug from the ground. To call red-staters "earthy" and blue-staters "well-branched" would be accurate.

Like a gardener with arms full of sweet corn, "green state" preferences run straight into the kitchen. Blue Dems are gourmet and fashion-conscious cooks; they like a few of every kind of tomato and pepper that exists, while their herbs tend to be diverse and savory. Red GOPers favor traditional cuisine, picnic fare, lots of stews and relishes, and enormous crops of green beans.

So, green is good. All gardeners agree on a patch that includes the basic "squash-cuke-pea-basil-tomato" requirement. But they also literally distinguish themselves in the backyard, just as in the voting booth. The Republican is a sun-drenched, green-bean, elbows on the table, vine-loving gardener, while the more passionate Democrat picks and chooses from a wider range of cultivars of spicy and savory peppers, European tomatoes, and flowers that prefer afternoon shade cast by mature trees. Let's rejoice that there are 50 states where we make up a mosaic of gardeners and gardens -- daring and avant-garde blue or tried and true, risk-averse red. But in the end, we are all still deep in the green.

Democrats Focus On Pennsylvania (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

LANCASTER, Pa. -- Top Democrats at several rallies in suburban Philadelphia this weekend worked to push their party's voters to the polls in a state where Democrats feel poised to sweep key races and oust the Senate's No. 3 Republican, Rick Santorum.

Gov. Edward G. Rendell joined Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Democrat Bob Casey Jr., who leads Mr. Santorum in polls, to declare the year of the Democrats here.

"Once again, Pennsylvania will lead the way you did at the beginning of our country," Mrs. Pelosi told a crowd in Glenside, where the group stumped for Democratic House candidate Patrick Murphy.

"I want to see [Mr. Casey] as our senator for the next 30 years," Mr. Rendell said, telling the screaming Glenside crowd that if they work hard to turn out the vote, "November 7th is going to be a great day for Pennsylvania, a great day for the Democratic Party."

Polls show that five Republican-held House seats in the state are within reach of Democrats -- so much so that Mrs. Pelosi spent the final campaign weekend here stumping for Democratic challengers.

Mr. Murphy and fellow Democrat Lois Murphy have gained ground in two Republican-held suburban Philadelphia districts, where they are challenging Reps. Michael G. Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach, respectively. Republican Reps. Don Sherwood and Curt Weldon are entangled in high-profile scandals that have helped Democratic challengers in their districts.

In the Senate race, Mr. Santorum has spent the past week arguing that Mr. Casey, the state treasurer and son of a former governor, will be soft on national-security issues at a time when decisiveness is needed. Mr. Casey has condemned Mr. Santorum as a rubber stamp for President Bush, who has just a 36 percent approval rating in Pennsylvania, according to a Survey USA poll.

"We've had too much of them, and on the morning of November 8, we're going to be headed down a new road," Mr. Casey told a crowd Saturday in Norristown.

"If we put in the wrong people ... we will take our country in a direction that will harm our national security," Mr. Santorum said yesterday in Lancaster.

Mr. Santorum cited a "botched joke" last week by Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, who implied that students who aren't smart wind up in the military. Mr. Kerry's remark has incited the Republican base here, one party operative said.

Republicans said the Democrats are claiming victory far too soon. Mr. Santorum has trailed in the polls before but enjoys a strong ground operation, said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

"Anyone ready to count him out doesn't know the man," he said.

"If Democrats turn out at 38 percent and we turn out at 50 percent, you can take any polls and throw them out the window," Mr. Santorum said yesterday.

Mr. Santorum, a leading social conservative in the Senate, has fought his hardest battle yet against Mr. Casey, a pro-life Democrat.

University of Pennsylvania political science professor Jack Nagel said liberal Democrats are willing to accept Mr. Casey's more conservative stances.

"They're realizing they might have to sacrifice on some social issues," Mr. Nagel said.

Matt Cooley, a pro-choice Democrat from Ambler, gave Mr. Casey a tepid endorsement as a "thoughtful guy," but said Mr. Santorum is "way too extreme for me" and predicted the Republican will be "toast" on Election Day.

For Lana Hopkins of Glenside, the election is all about unhappiness with the war in Iraq.

"This seems like a presidential election year," she said of Democrats' excitement level.

Still, Republican State Party Chairman Robert Gleason Jr. said Friday that he expects victory for Mr. Santorum as well as House Republicans and gubernatorial candidate Lynn Swann because of the party's get-out-the-vote effort.

Some Democrats are worried. A man at the Democrats' rally in Norristown lamented, "All of us are wondering what Karl Rove's going to pull on us."

Party leaders warned their faithful against overconfidence.

"Polls never cast a vote," Mr. Rendell said.

For Republicans (USAT)

By Ken Mehlman

USA Today, November 6, 2006

From the narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the USA to North Korea's nuclear detonation to last week's missile test by Iran, we are constantly reminded of the threat against free nations by terrorists and despotic leaders who support them. The war we fight today is not a new war. For a generation, terrorists have attacked free nations, from the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich, to the U.S. hostages in Iran, to Beirut, to the World Trade Center in 1993, Riyadh in 1995, Khobar Towers in 1996, the U.S. Embassy attacks in 1998, and the USS Cole in 2000. Too often, free nations responded weakly or not at all, so the enemy grew emboldened, leading to 9/11.

Today, the Republican Party has learned the lessons of Sept. 11, and understands the importance of using every single tool at our disposal to win this war — but some Democrat leaders would take those tools away. Democrats in the House and Senate voted against re-authorization of the USA Patriot Act. The overwhelming majority of House Democrats voted against legislation to make it easier to intercept terrorist communications. Democrats voted against tribunals that will help us get the information we need, and have time and again voted against missile defense.

Even more dangerous is that Democrats truly seem to believe that Iraq is completely separate from the greater war on terror. Al-Qaeda's leaders are not confused about the importance of Iraq to their goal of global jihad. Osama bin Laden's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has said his goal is to use Iraq as a base to launch further attacks, with the goal of creating a new caliphate in the Middle East. On Tuesday, we must ask ourselves: Would surrendering Iraq to the enemy so they can use it as a base from which to launch attacks make us more or less safe?

Voters face another choice Tuesday: Republicans have cut taxes every year since George W. Bush was elected president. Democrats, on the other hand, have said outright that they plan to raise your taxes. If you're a typical American family with two kids earning $30,000 a year, the Democrats would raise your taxes by more than $2,000. They'd raise your gas taxes just as gas prices are finally coming down. Where would it end? Well, the man who would be in charge of tax policy in a Democrat-controlled House came right out and said it: No tax increase will be out of bounds.

Republicans want to eliminate the death tax once and for all. Democrats want to bring it back. Republicans want to explore new sources of energy to bring gas and heating prices down. Democrats want to block domestic exploration. Republicans want small businesses to be able to band together to provide health care to their employees at a reasonable cost. Democrats don't believe entrepreneurs and their employees should have that freedom. Republicans want all parents to be able to choose where they send their kids to school. Democrats would limit that choice to the rich and powerful. The list goes on and on.

There is one more choice voters face Tuesday: The Senate has approved two superb new Supreme Court justices, John Roberts and Sam Alito. Republicans supported Justices Roberts and Alito because they understand that judges need to interpret the law, not invent it. Many Democrats, on the other hand, vocally fought — and then voted against — Justices Roberts and Alito. Why? Because they depend on activist judges to hand them the victories they can't win at the ballot box.

Tuesday, Americans will have the opportunity to choose between a party that wants to use every tool to keep us safe, or one that would take those tools away; between a party that wants to let you keep more of your own hard-earned money, or one that believes that money belongs to Washington; between a party that understands judicial restraint, or one that wants activist judges to fight its battles.

Two very different visions for America, and one very strong reason for the American people to help Republicans make history and maintain our majorities in Congress.

For Democrats (USAT)

By Howard Dean

USA Today, November 6, 2006

Tuesday, Americans have a choice between staying the course and a new direction for our country. After six years of Republican leadership, some Americans may be considering doing something they haven't done in a long time. Vote for a Democrat.

If you vote for a Democrat on Tuesday, we will honor the trust you put in us with a new direction for America.

Isn't it time for a new direction in Iraq?

The American people deserve political leaders who will ask the tough questions and make smart decisions about our foreign policy and homeland security, not just tough talk around election time. Sixteen intelligence agencies agree that the Bush administration's failed Iraq policy is increasing terrorism around the world. Our brave troops have become occupiers caught in a civil war. Democrats are united behind a strategy of phased redeployment and benchmarks that make it clear to the Iraqis that they must take responsibility for the future of their country.

Isn't it time for a new direction in fighting the war on terror?

Osama bin Laden is still on the loose, and al-Qaeda has moved to a new location in northwest Pakistan. Afghanistan has seen a resurgence of the Taliban. Democrats want to increase the size of our Special Forces to destroy bin Laden and terrorist networks such as al-Qaeda. We want to ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools to stop future attacks. And we won't take our eyes off of the growing threats in Iran and North Korea.

We also need to keep our streets and communities at home safe. We will enact the bipartisan 9/11 Commission recommendations because it's time to inspect all cargo and lock down loose nuclear material and ensure our nation is prepared for disasters such as Hurricane Katrina — and the aftermath. We will ensure we properly equip our National Guard and first responders.

Isn't it time for a new direction for our economy and the middle class?

The harmful policies of the GOP have failed hard-working Americans. Republicans have waged a war on the family. The Bush economy has failed 80% of Americans, benefiting only the top 1%. For most Americans, wages and incomes have slowed; health care costs and personal debt have increased. Home mortgage foreclosures are up; college tuition has skyrocketed.

We will end Republicans' deficit spending and restore pay-as-you-go discipline. We will restore the Republican cuts to Pell grants and other programs that make it easier for our kids to afford to go to college. We will protect, not privatize, Social Security.

Democrats respect hard-working families and the work it takes to make ends meet. We believe that strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, opens the door of opportunity to all, and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. We will ease the burdens on middle-class Americans with middle-class tax fairness, increase the minimum wage and reverse Republican health care cuts. We want to make a down payment in ensuring affordable health care for every American, and fix the Medicare prescription drug program. We will protect Social Security so that every senior is ensured a retirement in dignity.

We will enact real ethics reform in Congress.

Isn't it time for responsible, competent leadership and an end to the politics of deficits, divisiveness and deceit?

Our nation has become more divided and polarized with rhetoric and campaign tactics designed to drive wedges rather than find common ground. From Iraq to the economy to the aftermath of Katrina, we've seen incompetence and mismanagement. The Republicans' culture of corruption time and again has put the interests of their party and their cronies ahead of doing what's right for our children, our communities and our families.

Isn't it time for a new direction? Democrats have a unified agenda to restore hope and opportunity, competence and responsibility. So on Tuesday, if you want to change what's going on in Washington, vote for Democrats.

Limiting The Damage (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

President Bush isn't on the ballot tomorrow. But this election is, nonetheless, all about him. The question is whether voters will pry his fingers loose from at least some of the levers of power, thereby limiting the damage he can inflict in his two remaining years in office.

There are still some people urging Mr. Bush to change course. For example, a scathing editorial published today by The Military Times, which calls on Mr. Bush to fire Donald Rumsfeld, declares that "this is not about the midterm elections." But the editorial's authors surely know better than that. Mr. Bush won't fire Mr. Rumsfeld; he won't change strategy in Iraq; he won't change course at all, unless Congress forces him to.

At this point, nobody should have any illusions about Mr. Bush's character. To put it bluntly, he's an insecure bully who believes that owning up to a mistake, any mistake, would undermine his manhood — and who therefore lives in a dream world in which all of his policies are succeeding and all of his officials are doing a heckuva job. Just last week he declared himself "pleased with the progress we're making" in Iraq.

In other words, he's the sort of man who should never have been put in a position of authority, let alone been given the kind of unquestioned power, free from normal checks and balances, that he was granted after 9/11. But he was, alas, given that power, as well as a prolonged free ride from much of the news media.

The results have been predictably disastrous. The nightmare in Iraq is only part of the story. In time, the degradation of the federal government by rampant cronyism — almost every part of the executive branch I know anything about, from the Environmental Protection Agency to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, has been FEMAfied — may come to be seen as an equally serious blow to America's future.

And it should be a matter of intense national shame that Mr. Bush has quietly abandoned his fine promises to New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast.

The public, which rallied around Mr. Bush after 9/11 and was still prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt two years ago, seems to have figured most of this out. It's too late to vote Mr. Bush out of office, but most Americans seem prepared to punish Mr. Bush's party for his personal failings. This is in spite of a vicious campaign in which Mr. Bush has gone further than any previous president — even Richard Nixon — in attacking the patriotism of anyone who criticizes him or his policies.

That said, it's still possible that the Republicans will hold on to both houses of Congress. The feeding frenzy over John Kerry's botched joke showed that many people in the news media are still willing to be played like a fiddle. And if you think the timing of the Saddam verdict was coincidental, I've got a terrorist plot against the Brooklyn Bridge to sell you.

Moreover, the potential for vote suppression and/or outright electoral fraud remains substantial. And it will be very hard for the Democrats to take the Senate for the very simple reason that only one-third of Senate seats are on this ballot.

What if the Democrats do win? That doesn't guarantee a change in policy.

The Constitution says that Congress and the White House are co-equal branches of government, but Mr. Bush and his people aren't big on constitutional niceties. Even with a docile Republican majority controlling Congress, Mr. Bush has been in the habit of declaring that he has the right to disobey the law he has just signed, whether it's a law prohibiting torture or a law requiring that he hire qualified people to run FEMA.

Just imagine, then, what he'll do if faced with demands for information from, say, Congressional Democrats investigating war profiteering, which seems to have been rampant. Actually, we don't have to imagine: a White House strategist has already told Time magazine that the administration plans a "cataclysmic fight to the death" if Democrats in Congress try to exercise their right to issue subpoenas — which is one heck of a metaphor, given Mr. Bush's history of getting American service members trapped in cataclysmic fights where the deaths are anything but metaphors.

But here's the thing: no matter how hard the Bush administration may try to ignore the constitutional division of power, Mr. Bush's ability to make deadly mistakes has rested in part on G.O.P. control of Congress. That's why many Americans, myself included, will breathe a lot easier if one-party rule ends tomorrow.

'It Didn't Have To Be That Way' (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

Republicans face the prospect of losing a substantial number of Senate and House seats in the midterm election tomorrow, but it didn't have to be that way. For sure, the war in Iraq was always going to be a drag on Republicans. And an election in the sixth year of a presidency is often perilous for the president's party, a pattern that's held true in year six of the Bush era.

But Republicans have made matters worse by abandoning the reform agenda that animated their capture of Congress in 1994 and helped George Bush win the White House in 2000 and keep it in 2004. With scarcely a fight, Republicans gave up on Social Security reform in 2005, immigration reform in 2006, and never really got started on tax reform. Mr. Bush also cast aside the overarching theme for his domestic policy -- the Ownership Society -- without an explanation.

The consequences have been dire. Republicans have little to boast about in Mr. Bush's second term except the strong economy -- and it's largely the result of tax cuts enacted three years ago. When Democrats bring up Iraq or corruption, Republicans have no countervailing issues. The president has made a strong case against Democrats on national security and taxes. But voters have been unresponsive and it's easy to understand why. It's Mr. Bush himself who causes them to feel safe from lax security and tax hikes. Whatever happens in tomorrow's election, he'll be in the White House for two more years to protect them from Democratic excesses. But what if Republicans had followed the president's lead last year and tried to overhaul Social Security and enact personal investment accounts? If they'd succeeded, voters would now be perusing the stock tables to decide how to invest their payroll taxes. Had Democrats blocked reform, Republicans would be pointing out the gains voters were missing in the bull market. Either way, Republicans would be ahead. So would the country.

Instead, they balked at Mr. Bush's modest reform proposal. House Speaker Dennis Hastert thought it too risky, though the president had trumpeted his idea, with impunity, in two national campaigns. Another Republican leader told Mr. Bush that House Republicans would line up behind him -- but only after he'd drummed up a strong national majority in favor of entitlement reform. In truth, it already existed. Private accounts financed out of payroll taxes, while controversial, have long been popular. Left alone in the drive to fix Social Security, the president, disappointed and exhausted, finally gave up the fight.

For Republicans, 2006 was going to be the year they bravely took on America's immigration problem. Despite a division among Republicans on a solution, an ultimate agreement seemed quite possible. House Republicans would get beefed up security along the border with Mexico well beyond what Mr. Bush wished. In return, Mr. Bush and Senate Republicans would get what they wanted: additional security plus a program to bring foreign workers here temporarily and a plan for illegal immigrants in the U.S. to "earn" citizenship.

There were (and still are) many ways to reconcile the two positions. The simplest was to stagger the implementation of the three parts of immigration reform by requiring a secure border first, followed a few years later by the guest workers' program and citizenship scheme. Hispanic Americans and their influential lobbying organizations were willing to go along. And Democrats, faced with mass defections, would have been forced to accept the GOP compromise.

For lack of leadership, the compromise never materialized. Mr. Bush balked at taking charge of the issue. Mr. Hastert, cautious to a fault, declined to take a firm position. Roy Blunt, the House Republican whip, opposed the compromise. Another Republican leader assured me that House Republicans were in an ideal position. They could boast of having "blocked a bad Senate bill" -- a bill backed by the White House -- and that would serve them well in the election.

It hasn't. Nor has the last-minute border security measure authorizing 700 miles of fence that Mr. Bush signed in October. And opposition to "amnesty" in any form has failed to immunize Republicans. A good example is popular congressman J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, one of the loudest foes of letting illegals become citizens. He faces an unexpectedly strong Democratic challenger -- in the state with the biggest influx of illegal aliens in the country.

In the end, Republicans raised the immigration issue, touted it as a national crisis, stirred the nation's interest, then failed to come to grips with it. But imagine if Republicans had agreed on a compromise and enacted a "comprehensive" -- Mr. Bush's word -- immigration bill, dealing with both legal and illegal immigrants. They'd be justifiably basking in their accomplishment. The American public, except for nativist diehards, would be thrilled.

Tax reform could have had a similar effect. It may be hard to achieve, but it's both important and favored by the vast majority of Americans. Here again, however, Republicans were anything but bold. A tax panel commissioned by Mr. Bush concentrated on easing the burden imposed by the Alternative Minimum Tax at the expense of fundamental tax reform. Not surprisingly, the panel's timid recommendations produced little enthusiasm. And the tax issue quickly faded away.

The White House didn't have to acquiesce. It could have pressured the tax commission to come up with a sweeping reform plan. Or it could have proposed its own blueprint for reform. There's no secret about what's needed: lower rates, fewer deductions, a broader tax base, simplification of the tax code, elimination of double taxation of dividends, and a lot more. Instead, the White House let the moment pass.

When I interviewed Mr. Bush a year ago, I asked him about his concept of an "ownership society." He had been using the phrase as the theme for his domestic program (with the exception of immigration) and it was beginning to catch on. It included health-care reform and "lifetime" IRAs, a reform of retirement instruments, as well as tax and Social Security reform. The president was so enthusiastic about this that he cited it in his second inaugural address.

He saw ownership as a boon to personal responsibility, accountability and independence, especially from government. "Government sometimes, because you're dependent on it, undermines the sense of personal responsibility," he said. It was a spur to the poor "not to remain poor and to have that dream of owning something," he told me. And it gave an owner "a vital stake in our country."

Mr. Bush inexplicably dropped the phrase from his speeches this year. Perhaps it didn't poll well. Perhaps it was too radical. An "ownership society" represents a sharp new direction in domestic policy designed to encourage citizens to be more self-reliant and less dependent on government. It's a kind of demand-side conservatism with citizens gradually asking for less and less federal assistance.

Now, an "ownership society" is all but forgotten, Republicans as reformers a thing of the past. The party unity that would have come from settling differences on immigration is absent. As a result, Republicans have bickered throughout the 2006 campaign. If they have an agenda for the next two years, they haven't told voters. Democrats don't have an agenda either, they're the "out" party. They can get away with it. Republicans can't.

Reform is appealing to voters because they sense, quite correctly, there's much in need of reform. Besides Social Security and immigration and taxes, there's Congress itself. By skimping on congressional reform, too, Republicans made themselves all the more vulnerable to exaggerated charges of corruption. Reform, of course, is the opposite of corruption.

It's unknowable how many Senate and House seats might have been saved had Republicans championed reform. But surely Republicans would have been better off with a program of reform to flaunt. The campaign would have been elevated. And win or lose, Republicans would have something vital to talk about for the final years of the Bush presidency.

Hastert May Face Post-Election Unrest (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's future is in doubt even if the Republicans retain control of the House because of unease among GOP lawmakers about his handling of the Foley page scandal and what a House ethics committee investigation might conclude about him, according to several Republican aides.

House Chief Deputy Whip Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.) said last week that the House Republican leadership elections scheduled for Nov. 15 should be postponed until the ethics committee delivers its final report. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) confirmed yesterday on "Fox News Sunday" that he and Hastert have discussed that possibility. "We'll see how Tuesday goes and then we'll make some decisions."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared before the House ethics committee last month to answer questions on the congressional page scandal, but concerns about his leadership run deeper. He is likely to be challenged for the speaker's job regardless of election results. (By Manuel Balce Ceneta -- Associated Press)

But if Democrats seize control of the House in tomorrow's election, as many political analysts and pollsters are predicting, then Hastert is widely expected to exit the leadership stage and allow a new generation of Republican leaders to try to recapture the majority. Hastert, 64, the longest-serving Republican speaker, remains personally popular with House Republicans, but the discontent with his often lackadaisical, hands-off style is palpable.

"I believe that members have the highest regard for the speaker, his honesty, his integrity and his high ethical standards," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.). "But the last two years have been very tough for us as a majority. There's no doubt about that. Certainly we need to have a better direction, vision and drive than we've had during the 109th Congress."

The speaker and his top aides' response to warnings that former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had for years been pursuing teenage male pages is part of an emerging pattern that is troubling Republican lawmakers.

In early 2004, as House Appropriations Committee investigators prepared to launch a sensitive audit of highly classified Capitol Hill security upgrades, Hastert's chief counsel made a surprise visit to the first meeting of the auditors.

His message was clear, according to participants: The speaker's office was not happy about the probe and would keep investigators on a tight leash. In September 2005, despite growing evidence of sweetheart deals, kickbacks, wasteful contracts and shoddy work, the probe was suddenly shut down.

Critics of Hastert say the incident -- reported by Congressional Quarterly last month -- is emblematic of a speaker's office dominated by powerful senior aides that has repeatedly thwarted aggressive policing of the inner workings of Congress. Two of Hastert's top aides -- chief of staff Scott Palmer and chief counsel Ted Van Der Meid -- had been warned about Foley's unimpeded pursuit of male pages long before ABC News broke the story Sept. 28. Hastert and his aides orchestrated a purge of the ethics committee in February 2005, after the committee admonished then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for misconduct. And there have been massive cost overruns at a Capitol visitors center known derisively as "Hastert's Hole." A project once slated to cost $265 million now is expected to cost as much as $596 million.

All of these actions point to serious failures on the part of the speaker's office, critics say.

"All of the mechanisms that should be in place and used to protect the speaker and the House itself have been abridged because they just don't want to look," said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee.

Lisa C. Miller, a spokeswoman for the speaker, strenuously objected to the premise that Hastert has been a reluctant self-policeman or that there is growing dissatisfaction with Hastert's leadership within the Republican ranks. "Since Republicans have come into office, this House operates in a highly professional manner," she said. "We have vigorous oversight with annual auditing by an independent inspector general."

The turmoil has been mounting with Hastert largely off the stage. The speaker had expected to maintain a vigorous campaign schedule, but since the Foley scandal erupted, the former high school wrestling coach has kept largely out of sight. Boehner said that while Hastert has not granted many interviews, he made campaign appearances last week in Texas, Arizona and Florida. His Democratic opponent, a little-known challenger named John Laesch, has tried to capitalize on the swirling controversies. On Friday, Laesch posted a Web site, http://www.therealdenny.com , to raise questions about Hastert's leadership.

Meanwhile, some Republican lawmakers, such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) have been quietly putting out calls suggesting they might throw their hats in the ring for leadership posts. On Saturday, House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Tex.) announced that he, too, would be seeking a leadership post if a slot is available.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared before the House ethics committee last month to answer questions on the congressional page scandal, but concerns about his leadership run deeper. He is likely to be challenged for the speaker's job regardless of election results. (By Manuel Balce Ceneta -- Associated Press)

"It sounds like this is coming from folks who want the speaker's job," she said, "and when we win back the House on Tuesday, the speaker will run again."

The Foley scandal is foremost in members' minds, but what critics see as a lax attitude toward self-policing goes well beyond the Foley incident. The security investigation may be equally serious, Lilly suggested.

Since the Cold War days of the Kennedy administration, a highly secret organization has watched over the security of what is known as the Capitol campus, which includes the Capitol, the House and Senate office buildings and the Supreme Court. That organization got a renewed mission after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when hundreds of millions of dollars were channeled to it, mostly through the classified "black" budget of the House and Senate defense appropriations subcommittees.

In 2004, the chairmen and ranking Democrats on the House Appropriations Committee and House defense appropriations subcommittees tasked contract investigators to look at contracting on highly classified security upgrades, especially air filtration systems being installed to protect the campus from chemical and biological attack. The scale of the upgrades is unprecedented, and so is the cost, likely to run more than $100 million, according to three different sources close to the project.

Concern had been raised that contracts were being steered to unqualified bidders, who were wooing the secret organization's management with Redskins tickets, expensive lunches, even golf clubs, said Ronald Garant, one of the investigators. But the more pressing issue was sheer waste and incompetence, he said. Another former appropriations committee investigator familiar with the probe said the team was told by a Lockheed Martin contractor that the filtration system being installed in the Ford House Office Building was so shoddy that the children in the building's day-care center would not stand a chance in the event of a chemical or biological attack.

In early 2004, Garant and other investigators went to Arlington to meet with the organization. To their surprise, Van Der Meid, the speaker's chief counsel, made the trip, too. Van Der Meid made it clear from the start that he did not want the probe going forward, according to Garant, a retired, former high-ranking auditor for the Defense Department's comptroller with more than 30 years of experience in government oversight.

Investigators were prevented from talking to key personnel, had access blocked to key facilities and could not inspect the equipment they were supposed to be assessing. After hitting roadblock after roadblock, Robert H. Pearre, the appropriations committee's chief of investigations, delivered the news last September that the investigation had been shut down and its offices in CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., were to be closed.

"We were told, 'Lock the door, change the combination, take your papers, bring them over here. It's all over,' " Garant said.

House Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said some investigators were taken off the probe, but he said the study is ongoing. Republican aides familiar with the issue say Van Der Meid was not concerned about the investigation's findings but the investigators' cavalier attitudes toward a super-secret security effort. Former FBI agents did look at some of the charges of contractor abuse and determined they were inconsequential.

The Republican aides say the problem was with the investigators' attitudes. They said the fact that former investigators are discussing the probe of so secret a matter with reporters is proof that Van Der Meid's concerns about the investigators were warranted.

And those audits have produced eight consecutive clean bills of health, she said.

Senate Control In Play, Polls Find (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats, poised to score gains in the U.S. Senate, are struggling to pull ahead in the final seat they need to win control, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states find.

Democratic challengers are leading Republican incumbents — in some cases narrowly — in Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, according to the USA TODAY surveys. Other polls show Democratic challengers ahead in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Even if Democrats sweep those five races, however, they would fall one seat short of the six needed for majority status. Two GOP targets, in Tennessee and Virginia, now lead by 3 percentage points among likely voters.

"It says to me the Senate is still very much in play and could go either way," says Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report.

In a separate nationwide USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44% among likely voters. That edge of 7 percentage points had narrowed from a 13-point margin two weeks ago.

"Republicans are back in the game; they're engaged," says Andy Kohut of the Pew Research Center, which had similar results in a survey released Sunday.

In the House, Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control for the first time since 1994. Rothenberg and other non-partisan analysts predict they will.

In the Senate, the USA TODAY state polls show the Democratic incumbent considered most at risk, Democrat Robert Menendez of New Jersey, is now 10 points ahead of Tom Kean. Among GOP incumbents, however, Conrad Burns trails Jon Tester by 9 points in Montana, Jim Talent trails Claire McCaskill by 4 points in Missouri, and Lincoln Chafee trails Sheldon Whitehouse by 3 points in Rhode Island.

Republican Sen. George Allen leads Jim Webb in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker leads Harold Ford in Tennessee by identical 49%-46% margins.

Several races remain fluid. In Rhode Island, where Whitehouse's lead has tightened from an 11-point margin a month ago, 16% of likely voters say they made up their minds within the last week and 13% are still undecided. In Missouri, 7% remain undecided.

By big margins, voters across the board say most of the TV ads they've seen have been negative. In Tennessee, an overwhelming 74% disapproved of a GOP ad that showed a sexy blonde saying, "Harold, call me."

But in Missouri, voters approved by 49%-38% of an ad that showed actor Michael J. Fox, visibly affected by Parkinson's disease, speaking in support of embryonic stem cell research and McCaskill.

How The Senate Could Turn Blue (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, November 6, 2006

BY ROBERT NOVAK Sun-Times Columnist WASHINGTON -- To achieve the net gain of six seats needed for Democrats to win control of the Senate on Tuesday once seemed an impossible mission. Now it is clearly in sight.

In the weekend before the mid-term elections, two Republican seats seem definitely lost and two more are in serious trouble. If the Democrats win those four, they have to win only two of three more precarious Republican seats while keeping the only two Democratic incumbencies in any kind of danger.

That adds up to nine seats that will determine control of the Senate for the next two years:

OHIOSen. Mike DeWine (R) vs. Rep. Sherrod Brown (D)

This once seemed an unlikely place for a Democratic pickup, with Brown seemingly much too liberal for Ohio. But torn by scandals and a sub-par economy, Ohio in 2006 is a nightmare for Republicans, where big wins are expected by the Democratic ticket from top to bottom.

DeWine is an experienced candidate who works hard and has skillfully separated himself from an unpopular president. Nevertheless, Republicans have privately put this race on the hopeless list.

RHODE ISLANDSen. Lincoln Chafee (R) vs. state Atty. Gen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D)

Chafee is the most liberal Republican in the Senate. He did not even vote for George W. Bush for president in 2004. He survived a conservative challenge in this year's Republican primary, but he cannot count on vigorous GOP support, and he is an in- effective speaker.

Whitehouse, a former federal prosecutor, is not much of a candidate, either, but he should glide home in one of the country's most Democratic states. Still, strange things happen in Rhode Island, and Chafee has an outside chance to win a second term.

MONTANASen. Conrad Burns (R) vs. state Sen. Jon Tester (D)

When the year began, four-term, 71-year-old Burns looked a sure loser. The only Montana Republican elected to the Senate over the past half-century was down by double digits after he returned $150,000 in contributions related to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Tester's support has declined under a barrage of TV ads branding him a high-tax liberal, and the Democrat now holds only a small lead with a huge undecided vote.

MISSOURISen. Jim Talent (R) vs. state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D)

This is a classic conservative-vs.-liberal standoff between two professional office-seekers in a traditional weathervane state.

Complicating matters, the candidates are on opposite sides of a constitutional amendment on cloning for embryonic stem cell research (Talent against, McCaskill for). The large turnout of social conservatives against the bill is a plus for Talent, but Republican division on the issue is a minus.

Missouri may well be the single contest that determines control of the Senate.

VIRGINIASen. George Allen (R) vs. James Webb (D)

Allen, considered a major presidential prospect for '08, was 16 points ahead of Webb a month ago when he started committing one blunder after another.

Webb, a taciturn Reagan administration secretary of the Navy, is relatively conservative for a Democrat but campaigns hard against the Iraq war. While he is an unappealing candidate, he appears to have a small lead against Allen in what would be a bonus win never expected by party leaders.

TENNESSEEChattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) vs. Rep. Harold Ford (D)

Ford has run a brilliant campaign and out-dazzled Corker, but one question remains: Can an African American -- even one as handsome and ideologically moderate as the 36-year-old Ford -- really be elected to the Senate from a Southern state?

Recent polling data suggests "no" is the answer. Corker is not a dazzler, but he has jumped out to a lead against Ford after trailing earlier. The Republicans have been accused of racist tactics, and Ford finally lost his cool.

NEW JERSEYState Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) vs. Sen. Robert Menendez (D)

This is the best Senate race for a Republican pickup. The 38-year-old Kean, son of the popular former governor, actually led against Menendez, an appointed senator, through the summer. Since then, Menendez has been hit by one scandal after another.

But Menendez leads and may be increasing his lead. He has a money advantage that is rare for a Democrat, but a loss by a candidate as attractive as Kean would suggest no Republican can win in New Jersey anymore under any conditions.

MARYLANDLt. Gov. Michael Steele (R) vs. Rep. Ben Cardin (D)

Steele, the first African American elected statewide in Maryland, is a long shot in an overwhelmingly Democratic state in a Democratic year. However, the latest poll shows only a six-point lead by Cardin, a respected but dull professional politician.

The same poll gives Steele just 12 percent of the state's large African-American vote. Steele's own polls give him much more black support -- perhaps enough to eke out a startling Republican victory in an otherwise dismal election, which incidentally might save GOP control of the Senate.

PENNSYLVANIASen. Rick Santorum (R) vs. State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D)

Santorum, a national favorite of conservatives, is third-ranking in the Senate leadership and will move up to the second-ranking whip's position if re-elected. But he is unpopular in Pennsylvania, stuck at 42 percent in the polls for two years. Casey, son of the late governor, is a pro-life Democrat who is not popular in Philadelphia and a weak candidate. Nevertheless, Casey looks like a cinch.

Sen. Dole Says Dems Content To Lose War (USAT)

USA Today, November 6, 2006

The head of the Republican Senate campaign committee, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, said Sunday that her party will retain its majority partly because “Democrats appear to be content with losing” the war in Iraq. Her Democratic counterpart, Charles Schumer of New York, said his party wants to win the war, “which is why we want to change the strategy.”

Dole also said voters will be more focused on local issues. On Iraq, she said: “To pull out and withdraw is losing. The Democrats appear to be content with losing.” Schumer cited polls showing voter dissatisfaction with President Bush's war policy. Democrats need to add six Senate seats to have a majority.

Cheney plans first hunt since accident

Vice President Cheney will spend Election Day on his first hunting trip since he accidentally shot a companion last February on a private Texas ranch.

Lea Anne McBride, his press secretary, said it was an annual hunting outing and said Cheney spent Election Day in 2002 at the same lodge. On a Feb. 11 quail hunting trip, Cheney shot attorney Harry Whittington in the torso, neck and face with his shotgun. Whittington was hospitalized for six days.

Governor tailors campaign to football

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle worked his campaign schedule around the Green Bay Packers. Doyle, challenged by Republican Mark Green, met with Democratic Party workers in Marathon County two hours before kickoff of the Packers game against the Buffalo Bills in Buffalo. His second stop in Eau Claire started during halftime. His final stop at a sports bar in La Crosse was set for after the game. “The only thing the governor schedules during Packer games are Packer games,” spokeswoman Melanie Fonder said.

Candidates Making Final Push To Break Out (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And John Wagner

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

Two of the Washington region's top Republicans -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- spent yesterday fighting off fierce electoral challenges that could stall their political careers and reverse GOP successes in their states.

DOJ_NMG_0091129

Allen returned to the folksy approach that has endeared him to Virginians for almost two decades, tossing a football at FedEx Field before the Redskins game as he schmoozed with potential voters at a tailgate party. Later, he ditched a pair of brown Wranglers for a suit at an Ashburn event with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Ehrlich mingled with volunteers at a Republican call center in Prince George's County yesterday afternoon, appearing relaxed and upbeat about his prospects. Afterward, he, too, campaigned with Giuliani, whom he called "wildly popular within the [Republican] party and with many independents and Democrats."

The Democratic challengers in those races also used the last weekend of the campaign to stir their supporters. In Virginia, James Webb campaigned in the southwest region. In Maryland, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley appeared with former president Bill Clinton -- something Webb is scheduled to do today.

Public polls showed both men locked in dead heats. Surveys by Mason-Dixon published yesterday had Allen trailing Webb by one percentage point and Ehrlich tied with O'Malley. Previous polls, including a Washington Post poll last weekend, showed O'Malley ahead.

The reelection bids by Allen and Ehrlich, along with the Senate race in Maryland between Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.) and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R), are crucial to national and local political efforts. The Senate races could decide which party controls that chamber of Congress. But the election tomorrow also will offer fresh evidence of political trends in the Washington region, where Allen, Ehrlich and Steele have created a resurgence in their states' parties. Losses by any of them -- particularly incumbents Allen or Ehrlich -- would raise questions about the future of the GOP in their respective states.

Webb, for his part, finished a two-day swing through the rural communities of southwest Virginia with former Nebraska senator Bob Kerrey (D) and the president of the United Mine Workers union. The last-minute blitz in the "Fightin' Ninth" congressional district has become a Democratic tradition in Virginia.

Webb will wrap up his campaign with a rally in Alexandria with Clinton.

O'Malley also was betting on Clinton's popularity in the largely Democratic Free State. He held a boisterous, late-night rally with the former president that drew more than 1,000 people to Prince George's.

Earlier, O'Malley was joined on the campaign trail by Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, the latest big-city mayor to testify to O'Malley's national reputation as an effective reformer. Today he is scheduled to appear with former vice president Al Gore in Montgomery County.

Steele campaigned in churches and gave an interview on Fox News Channel, hoping to catch up to Cardin in what polls suggest is a tightening race. Cardin joined O'Malley at the Clinton rally and also campaigned at churches yesterday.

The former president and former New York mayor were the top draws this weekend, helping to swell crowds and whip passions for an election that voting officials say already promises larger-than-usual turnout.

"This isn't a time for experimentation and for turning back the clock, which is what George's opponents want to do," Giuliani told the crowd of about 200 in Ashburn. "President Bush and the Republican Party have decided we're going to be on offense, and George Allen understands that."

Giuliani had a similar message for Ehrlich supporters: "He is a darn good governor, and he's doing a very good job," Giuliani, a possible 2008 presidential contender, told a crowd of about 200 at a firehouse in Prince George's. "You don't turn the clock back."

Hours later, on the other side of the partisan divide, Clinton arrived at an ornate reception hall of a church in the same county, a majority-black jurisdiction that is home to more Democrats than any other county in Maryland.

"I wanted to be here because I know Ben Cardin, I know Martin O'Malley, and I know what's going on in this country," Clinton said. "There are people all over America who would give anything to have people like this to vote for."

In two days, the candidates will know their fate: Win or lose. In or out. Staying or leaving.

With all three races very close, political parties in both states wonder what message voters will send tomorrow. Wins by Cardin and O'Malley in Maryland would confirm basic assumptions about the state's Democrat-leaning electorate. Victories by Ehrlich and Steele would go a long way toward ushering in a true two-party system in a state where registered Democrats have long outnumbered Republicans 2 to 1.

Conversely, a victory by Webb in Virginia would cement his party's resurgence in a state that has been considered a conservative stronghold since the early 1990s -- when Allen won the gubernatorial election. A win by Allen, despite a bruising campaign, would offer a reminder of the state's core leanings.

"You have this changing dynamic in Virginia that the Democrats have been pretty good in adjusting to," said Robert D. Holsworth, director of the Center for Public Policy at Virginia Commonwealth University. "Even if Allen wins, the very close nature of this race will have to lead them to think about how they adjust the message."

In Virginia yesterday morning, Allen taped a two-minute paid television spot that will air tonight in major markets across Virginia. In it, Allen will appear with Sen. John W. Warner (R), one of the state's most respected politicians, and talk about the war in Iraq.

Then, it was onto FedEx Field for tailgate festivities before the game between the Dallas Cowboys and the Washington Redskins. Allen's father and namesake was a Super Bowl-winning Redskins coach.

"I think he's gotten a bum deal on all of these ads criticizing him," said Ryan Travers, 32, a sales manager from Richmond. "They've been crazy negative."

"Good luck! Go get 'em!" another man yelled. Thomas Robinson, 33, a businessman from Haymarket, said he's voting for Allen, too. "I like to deer hunt, and I like his views," Robinson said.

Allen used football analogies to describe his fight against Webb. "We're focused," Allen said. "In football you learn that if you get knocked down, you get back up."

Hundreds of miles away, Webb sounded increasingly confident as he hammered his campaign themes of creating a diplomatic solution to the Iraq war, bridging the gap between the rich and poor, raising the minimum wage, closing corporate tax loopholes and fighting for fair trade.

"You have given your loyalty, and you will have my loyalty, and I will work to bring fairness back to the economic system," Webb told about 150 supporters in Grundy, including dozens of current and retired coal miners.

Kerrey, who like Webb is a Vietnam War combat veteran, told the crowd that Webb "will put the law on the side of wages, health benefits and pensions."

"Jim has never forgotten it's important to live by those three words: family, honor, country," Kerrey said. "It's not phony for him."

In Big Stone Gap, Webb also sharpened his critique of Bush's policies and predicted the White House will face aggressive questions from a Democratic Congress.

"If you all help us, if we get out the word, on Wednesday morning the White House is going to wake up, and they are going to look out over the Capitol building and say, 'We've got a problem,' " Webb said.

In Maryland, O'Malley said he hoped the Clinton rally and an ad featuring the former president would help counter months of attacks on his record.

"With the Republican Governors Association coming in and spending all that money, going negative and trashing a record of accomplishment in Baltimore, it's nice to have someone who's known and respected come in and tell it like it is," O'Malley said.

Both races in Maryland could hinge on turnout in Prince George's -- a point several speakers tried to drive home at last night's rally.

"It's not about strategy anymore," Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D) told a racially diverse crowd waving O'Malley and Cardin placards. "It's about your heart. Do you want this victory more than they want it?"

In Maryland's Senate race, Steele made time Sunday for an interview on Fox News, in which he continued to present himself as a populist, in touch with "real life" and independent of both parties.

When asked by host Chris Wallace why blacks in Maryland should vote Republican when the balance of power in the Senate is at stake, Steele said, "I'm not asking them to vote Republican."

"I've not come to them as a Republican or a Democrat, as an African American or anything other than who I am," Steele said from the parking lot of the First Baptist Church of Glenarden. "Someone who believes in public service, who wants to go to Washington to try his best to make a difference in a town that has forgotten where people live and how they live."

Cardin and his wife, Myrna, traversed Prince George's yesterday morning, attending services at three African American churches.

Later in the day, he spoke at a Potomac synagogue before heading back to Prince George's to pump up volunteers at a VFW hall and to meet up with Clinton and O'Malley.

In the District, candidates for the competitive race for the Ward 6 seat on the D.C. Council concentrated most of their efforts in and around Capitol Hill, where turnout is usually high on Election Day.

Democratic nominee Tommy Wells hit the church circuit, knocked on doors and held a rally with volunteers. Will Cobb, who is running as an independent, met voters outside Eastern Market in the morning. Republican nominee Tony Williams could not be reached for comment.

Protectionist Stance Is Gaining Clout (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

DUBUQUE, Iowa -- Bidding for a congressional seat held by a free-trade Republican for nearly two decades, Democrat Bruce Braley has gained an edge by taking the opposite view: bashing globalization.

In one of the most closely watched congressional races, Mr. Braley has made opposition to the Bush administration's free-trade agenda a centerpiece of his campaign. He has run ads blaming the state's job losses on President Bush's "unfair trade deals." He has urged more focus on labor rights in national trade policy and talked of using economic sanctions to keep America competitive. "Our workers aren't on a level playing field," he says.

Mr. Braley's stance has helped propel the 49-year-old lawyer, who is running against an unabashedly free-trade Republican, into position to reverse recent trends and secure a Democratic win in Iowa's First District. His strong showing not only underscores how trade concerns have emerged as a central issue in many of this year's races but also suggests a more-protectionist U.S. trade policy if Democrats take Congress.

Even if Democrats don't win control, the campaign rhetoric may have a lasting effect, because some Republicans are finding it more painful politically to defend free trade.

The trend is worrying the business community. Top financial-services executives identified "protectionism" as the biggest threat to continued economic growth, after terrorism, according to a recent Financial Services Forum survey. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is spending about $10 million nationwide in the final days of the campaign to rally supporters for candidates sympathetic to business priorities, including free trade.

Democrats must pick up 15 seats to regain control of the House, and in more than a dozen districts up for grabs, trade issues are giving them an edge over Republicans damaged by Iraq and the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley and messages he sent congressional pages. Similar forces are roiling the fight for the Senate, where six additional seats would put Democrats in charge.

In western New York, Tom Reynolds, head of the Republican House campaign committee, is fighting a protectionist businessman and may lose. Richard Pombo, a California Republican who cruised to victory two years ago, is facing an eleventh-hour challenge from a Democrat pledging to "change our trade policy" so American farmers can better compete against foreign producers. In the Senate, which approves many trade treaties, Democrat Sherrod Brown is poised to unseat Ohio Republican Mike DeWine by capitalizing on worker resentment over globalization.

Pew Research data show the sense of vulnerability among workers. A recent poll shows low-skilled U.S. workers are over 40% more likely to believe their jobs could be sent offshore.

Trade is a perennial political dividing line. But the issue is taking on importance this year, amid increased public anxiety over globalization and activism by trade opponents. The political committee formed by the Citizens Trade Campaign, a labor, farm and environmental coalition, dispatched organizers after Labor Day to a dozen battleground districts to rally free-trade opponents. Protectionist sentiments and economic nationalism appear to be emerging as symbols of a broader but less well-defined sense of economic unease, which is particularly apparent in the Midwest this year.

The Republican-controlled Congress has already showed its sensitivity to the issue, helping derail a deal by Arab-owned Dubai Ports World to purchase the commercial operations at five U.S. ports and approving millions of dollars to build a wall to stem the tide of illegal immigrants from Mexico. Republican leaders have put aside initiatives on the Bush free-trade agenda, delaying action on a trade pact with Peru and pushing the White House to commit to a plan to possibly curtail imports from Vietnam.

The trend may become more pronounced if Democrats take one or both houses of Congress. In the 1990s, a bloc of House Democrats regularly supported free-trade initiatives like the North American Free Trade Agreement. These numbers have fallen as doubts increase about globalization, with only 15 Democrats backing the Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005. The emergence of candidates like Mr. Braley could accelerate the Democrats' transformation.

Trade policy may be the biggest issue in which a Democratic majority in the House could make headway against the president in the next Congress. That is because President Bush's ability to send trade deals to Congress for a vote without amendments will expire in July. Congress will decide whether to renew his authority, with action beginning in the House.

That would give Democrats leverage to seek Bush commitments to help U.S. workers, such as putting labor rights and environmental protection alongside corporate concerns like patent protections in negotiations with other countries. Democrats might seek an overhaul of programs to help workers who lose jobs to foreign competition.

In Iowa, Mr. Braley's antiglobalization theme is striking a chord among voters in this rural district, which wraps from Davenport up the Mississippi River to Dubuque and west to Waterloo, Mr. Braley's hometown. Since 1990, the district has been represented by Republican Rep. Jim Nussle, a supporter of free trade who is now waging an uphill battle for governor.

Mr. Braley's own story has helped frame the populist themes of his campaign against his Republican opponent, businessman Mike Whalen. Mr. Braley grew up in a small farming community, where his parents struggled to make ends meet after his father shattered his leg on the job. The younger Mr. Braley washed dishes and drove a dump truck to help pay for college.

Iowa's uneven economic performance has warmed voters to Mr. Braley's message, which also emphasizes protecting Social Security and raising the minimum wage. While pockets of the state are prospering, the number of manufacturing jobs remains far below its 2001 peak, as companies have pared work forces in the face of foreign competition. A May announcement by Iowa icon Maytag, a unit of Whirlpool Corp., that it plans to lay off 2,000 workers in the state added to residents' unease.

Even Mr. Whalen, who scoffs that Mr. Braley is living in a "protectionist fantasyland," concurs that "deep down, there is that kind of angst" over trade and the economy.

This is the first bid for public office by Messrs. Braley and Whalen. The race is tight, but Mr. Braley's stance on trade appears to be winning over swing voters like Ken Brimeyer, who could make the difference tomorrow.

Mr. Brimeyer runs the loading dock at Flexsteel Industries Inc., a furniture maker in Dubuque. He twice voted for Rep. Nussle, but now plans to vote Democratic. One reason: President Bush's free-trade agenda. In the past four years, the number of jobs at Flexsteel has fallen 60%, to 250, as much of the upholstering work once done at the plant has been shifted to China, where labor is cheaper. "It makes you angry," Mr. Brimeyer says.

Messrs. Braley and Whalen have aired dueling ads that sharpened their differences on trade. In mid-October, a Braley television ad focused on the state's job losses and accused Mr. Whalen of supporting Bush-backed "trade deals that ship Iowa jobs overseas" and being "out of touch with working families."

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, campaigning in the district for Mr. Whalen, issued a rebuke several days later. "These trade agreements work," Mr. Gutierrez said. "We're talking about real jobs here, and we should not be playing with protectionist polices that put these jobs at risk."

Mr. Whalen's radio ad alleged Mr. Braley's approach would harm Iowa farmers and manufacturers who depend on exports. He pointed to the Alcoa Inc. plant in Davenport, where 2,000 workers make aviation parts for Boeing Co. and Airbus. "Without international trade, those Iowa jobs would be gone," Mr. Whalen, who toured the plant in mid-September, said in his ad.

Last week, a U.S. Chamber of Commerce team canvassed the district and blanketed it with mailings touting Mr. Whalen's free-trade credentials. But chamber strategist Doug Loon acknowledges the race is tight and frets about the effect on trade policy if Mr. Braley wins. The seat "is clearly in jeopardy," he says.

Politics Gone Mild For Investors The Prospect Of Shift In Congress Doesn't Carry Much Of A Threat; Popular Theory: 'Gridlock Is Good' By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- The prospect of big losses for business-friendly Republicans in tomorrow's midterm elections is eliciting more shrugs than fears on Wall Street.

At first blush, this seems strange. A Democratic triumph that included winning one or both houses of Congress could undermine Republican economic policies such as tax cuts and deregulation that Wall Street tends to favor.

Amid the drumbeat of scandals and discouraging news from Iraq, futures traders in the Iowa Electronic Markets have raised the likelihood that Republicans will lose control of the House of Representatives to nearly 80% from 40% six months ago. The Iowa markets indicate that the Republicans ought to hold the Senate. That, plus a Republican president, may be one reason investors have taken a sanguine approach to the election.

As the Iowa markets have spent the past half year increasing their bet on a Democratic house, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has surged to a nearly 9% gain, even after last week's losses. "The equity markets are sort of shrugging it off," said Smith Granade, an associate economist who tracks election markets for Moody's economy.com. "We think they'll continue to do so, although there will probably be a little dip if Democrats actually win the House."

The first and most frequently cited rationale for Wall Street's nonchalance at the specter of a Democratic triumph is the old "gridlock is good" maxim. In other words, Democratic control of at least one chamber of Congress would mean divided government, making it less likely adverse legislation or excessive spending would pass.

This theory has holes, but it still carries great weight among many economists and investors. In the most recent WSJ.com survey of economists, 37% said the economy would perform best if Democrats win control of the House, versus 34% who said it would if Republicans maintain their grip. The most frequently cited reason was the potential for fiscal restraint at a time when the U.S. government is running large deficits.

William Niskanen, a former member of President Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers who now serves as chairman of the libertarian-leaning Cato Institute, said federal spending in the U.S. since 1949, after adjusting for inflation and population growth, has been roughly three times as low during periods of divided government as when one party runs the show.

That suggests gridlock could lift bond prices, as less government debt would tend to curtail the supply of bonds, but it might not help stocks. A recent study published in the Financial Analysts Journal that examined the monthly inflation-adjusted performance of 10 indexes found that stocks rose 6% per year during months of gridlock but soared 22% per year during months of one-party rule.

"The evidence doesn't back up the gridlock-is-good argument," said Tom Gallagher, senior managing director at ISI Group, a brokerage firm. It is more likely, Mr. Gallagher said, that investors seize on divided government as an easy outlet for their frustration with Washington. That enables them to return their focus to traditional drivers of stock prices like profits, economic growth and inflation. "People in the markets are inherently frustrated with politics. It's a way of dismissing politics and moving onto other things."

Another reason investors may be ignoring the potential reordering: history. Since 1946, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has almost always rallied in the fourth quarter following a midterm election. "I think it's just the markets wanting to get past the negative news flow of the campaigns and the uncertainty," said Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Financial Services Group.

The two exceptions to this rule were in the fourth quarter of 1978, when inflation was jumping, and 1994, right after Republicans swept into control of Congress.

In the year after midterm elections, the S&P 500 has posted a whopping 23.1% average annual gain since 1946, according to Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America Corp. By comparison, the S&P 500 has increased by an average of 7.8% in the year following a presidential election over the same period. Many economists said they expect the markets to be much more interested in 2008 when, as Mr. Kleintop said, "everything will be up for grabs."

The strong performance of stocks in the 12 months after midterm elections coincides with the third year of the presidential cycle. Many analysts said they expect a similar pattern this year, although gains may be muted given the tepid pace of economic growth. "We expect the markets to grind higher in the coming months, although robust gains are not likely given the effects of the U.S. housing recession on the U.S. economy and the fact that many indices are already priced for perfection," Mr. Quinlan wrote in a recent research note.

Futures markets aside, it is hard to predict the outcome of the midterm elections because it depends on the aggregate result of so many close races. Some observers just may not be convinced Democrats will gain the 15 seats they need to retake the House.

If Republicans pull off an upset and hold onto both houses, it could occasion a short-term bounce in stock markets. "Let's face it. The people that hold [equity] assets are Republicans, by and large," said Kurt Karl, chief U.S. economist at Swiss Re. "There might be some euphoria in the short term."

While stocks may be unscathed by Republican losses, many analysts caution that some could come under pressure. Drug stocks could suffer because Democratic leaders might push to have Medicare negotiate lower prices with pharmaceutical companies. Oil companies could face renewed calls for a "windfall profits" tax. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. could face pressure from efforts to boost unionization.

As Drug Prices Climb, Democrats Find Fault With Medicare Plan (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

For big drug companies, the new Medicare prescription benefit is proving to be a financial windfall larger than even the most optimistic Wall Street analysts had predicted.

But those gains may come back to haunt drug makers if Democrats take control of Congress this week.

Democrats, who have long charged that the drug industry is profiteering at taxpayers' expense, say they want to introduce legislation to revoke the law that bars Medicare from negotiating prices directly with drug makers like Pfizer for the medicines it buys.

Medicare now pays for drugs indirectly, through the private insurers that administer the prescription program — and those insurers typically pay higher prices than government agencies, like the Veterans Administration, that buy medicines directly from drug makers.

The government is expected to spend at least $31 billion this year on the drug benefit, which provides partial drug coverage for people over age 65, according to the federal agency that runs Medicare. Next year, the program is expected to cost almost $50 billion — almost 20 percent of overall American drug spending.

Democrats say that directly negotiating with drug makers could save taxpayers tens of billions of dollars annually, though some independent analysts say those projections are probably exaggerated.

Republicans, and the pharmaceutical industry, say that the benefit program is working and has cost less than initially projected. More than 38 million Medicare beneficiaries are enrolled in the program, and most say they are satisfied with their coverage, said Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services.

"It's very clearly working," Mr. Leavitt said. "We now have 90 percent of seniors in this country who have prescription drug coverage."

But Wall Street analysts say they have little doubt that the benefit program, called Part D, has helped several big drug makers report record profits and exceed earnings forecasts made earlier in the year.

Companies have raised prices on many top-selling medicines by 6 percent or more this year, double the overall inflation rate. In some cases, drug makers have received price increases of as much as 20 percent for medicines that the government was already buying for people covered under the Medicaid program for the indigent. Medicare also pays more than the Veterans Administration, which runs its own benefit program.

"Part D was a good thing for almost everybody," said Les Funtleyder, an industry analyst at Miller Tabak, a research firm in New York.

Drug makers have tried to play down their gains from the program because they do not want to be seen as profiteering in an election year, Mr. Funtleyder said. "You don't want to draw too much attention to how good it's been."

Democrats claim the government could save as much as $190 billion over the next 10 years if it negotiated directly. Those savings could help shrink the "doughnut hole," the gap in Part D coverage that forces many beneficiaries to pay about $3,000 a year for drugs, said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader in the House.

"What we're planning to do is give Medicare a chance to negotiate prices, and we'd use some of the savings to close the doughnut hole," Mr. Daly said.

Republicans say the savings estimates offered by the Democrats are vastly inflated. They note that Medicare has already cut its 10-year projection of the program's cost by $117 billion, though the program is still expected to cost taxpayers $516 billion over the next decade. Republicans also note that, in independent surveys, most seniors say they are happy with the benefit.

"The competitive marketplace has saved much more money than anyone has ever anticipated," said Leslie Norwalk, the deputy commissioner of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Ken Johnson, senior vice president at Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the main lobbying group for drug makers, said that allowing Medicare to negotiate directly would be unfair because the government had too much market power.

"The government doesn't negotiate prices — it dictates prices," Mr. Johnson said.

Also, the Veterans Administration and Medicare plans are not directly comparable, he said, because the average Medicare drug plan covers 4,300 medicines, while the V.A. covers only 1,300.

The structure of Part D is complex. Medicare does not directly provide coverage. Instead it subsidizes plans offered by private insurers. Insurers negotiate prices with drug makers and create menus of different plans, some with high premiums and broad drug coverage and others that offer basic coverage at low premiums. All plans have to follow certain basic rules, like offering at least two medicines in every drug category.

Medicare then calculates the cost of the average plan and pays every insurer a subsidy of about 75 percent of that cost. Beneficiaries cover the rest, with the amount they pay depending on what plan they choose.

For example, if the average plan costs $100 a month, Medicare will pay all plans a $75 subsidy for everyone who enrolls, and a person who enrolls in the average plan will pay $25. In most states, beneficiaries can choose from among 40 to 60 plans, Ms. Norwalk said.

Part D has raised profits for drug makers both by increasing the prices they receive and by encouraging beneficiaries to fill prescriptions they might otherwise have been unable to afford, analysts say.

The biggest gains have gone to companies that make drugs widely used by the Medicaid program, which covers the indigent. Poor people over 65, known as "dual eligibles," previously received drugs through Medicaid.

Drug makers were legally required to give Medicaid a discount of at least 15 percent, and sometimes significantly more, from their list prices. Now Medicaid recipients over 65 are covered through the Part D program, which does not require the same discounts. As a result, drug makers are being paid as much as 20 percent more for the same drugs that they had already been providing to recipients under the Medicaid program.

The biggest gainer, analysts say, is Eli Lilly, which makes Zyprexa. Zyprexa, used to treat schizophrenia and other severe mental illnesses, is widely prescribed to Medicaid patients.

Lilly, the sixth-largest American drug maker, reported two weeks ago that its third-quarter sales had risen 7 percent, to $3.9 billion, and its profits were up 10 percent, to $874 million, compared with 2005. According to Lilly's published review of the quarter, the sales gains resulted almost entirely from Lilly's prices rising 11 percent in the United States, while actually falling in Europe and Japan.

"We are experiencing a one-time sales benefit resulting from a shift of certain low-income patients from Medicaid to Medicare," a company spokeswoman, Terra Fox, wrote in an e-mail response to questions about Part D. Ms. Fox declined to quantify how much Lilly had gained from the shift.

But Lilly is hardly alone in benefiting. Pfizer, the world's largest drug maker, said its sales soared 14 percent in the United States in the third quarter, while rising only 3 percent internationally. Over all, Pfizer said its profits more than doubled, to $3.4 billion from $1.6 billion, though part of the difference came from high one-time charges last year.

Pfizer did not disclose how much of the sales growth came from price increases and how much from new prescriptions, but earlier this year Pfizer raised the list prices of some of its biggest drugs by 5.5 percent or more, well above the inflation rate.

Tony Butler, an analyst at Lehman Brothers, said both volume growth and price increases had driven the industry's rising profits. But he said he did not expect major changes in the Part D plan even if the Democrats took over Congress, since President Bush would probably not sign any legislation that would allow Medicare to negotiate prices directly.

"It's our belief that the White House will veto it," he said.

US Joblessness Ebbs To Rare Historical Low (CSM)

By Ron Scherer And Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

NEW YORK AND BOSTON

It is not often that the nation's unemployment rate sinks to 4.4 percent.

It did in 2001, when dotcom entrepreneurs were still writing checks that didn't bounce. Jobs were also plentiful in the early 1970s, when the nation was at war in Vietnam. Ditto for 1957, when the economy had fewer women, teenagers, and minorities in the workplace.

Now, add October 2006 to the list.

In the last major economic report before Tuesday's showdown at the ballot box, the Labor Department says the unemployment rate is now at that level, down from 4.6 percent in September. It is a piece of good news for an embattled president and suggests the economy is stronger than many recent estimates. The downside is that the Federal Reserve, which has not raised interest rates in its past three meetings, may have to think about a rate increase early next year - which would keep inflation in check but could cause unemployment to rise.

"By its first meeting in 2007, the Fed will have to give active consideration to raising interest rates," says Lyle Gramley, a former Fed governor who is now a consulting economist at Schwab Washington Research Group. "The odds are that rates are going up, not down."

In the past, the Federal Reserve has stomped on the monetary brakes - pushing the economy into a recession - when the unemployment rate has dropped this low. But this time, Mr. Gramley says, the financial backdrop is different: Long-term interest rates are at the same level as June 2004, the stock market is up 15 percent, and the dollar is down 5 percent.

"Normally, when the Fed is raising short-term rates, you expect the stock market to weaken and the dollar to rise. [But current] financial conditions are still quite accommodative, and as a result [raising interest rates] is not likely to drive the economy into a recession." Dip in productivity

The latest economic numbers, while positive for workers, may indicate a shift is taking place in the economy, says Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks in Atlanta. "More people are working, but we produced less. This suggests productivity is no longer a dominant force," he says. "Strong productivity is good for sustainability."

The buoyant job market is not a surprise to employment specialists. At Spherion, a staffing company based in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., demand remains strong in accounting, information technology, the legal field, sales, and marketing. "One of the exceptions is interest-sensitive areas like mortgage banking," says Brendan Courtney, senior vice president.

Layoffs normally increase at this time of year, says John Challenger of the Chicago outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas. But layoffs last month were down 15 percent compared with a year ago and 30 percent lower than September's rate. "It indicates the labor market is strong now."

One reason the unemployment rate has fallen so low is an increase in the number of self-employed people, according to Mr. Challenger. "The economy has really changed. People want to work for themselves."

One such person is Moira Madell of Madell Consulting in Chicago. Ms. Madell, who worked for a benefits consulting firm for nine years, used to consider her human-relations consulting job temporary. But now, she says, it allows her the flexibility to raise a family. "It's very satisfying, a nice fit for me."

Many low-skilled workers are finding many job openings, but very few that pay well or offer decent benefits, says Barney Oursler, co-director of the Mon Valley Unemployed Committee in Homestead, Pa.

While the boom in the healthcare industry has given new hope to some low-skilled workers, Mr. Oursler warns them that without training they'll wind up changing bedpans for about the same pay as working at the local Target. Two years of training are typically needed for higher-paid healthcare work.

In fact, when Betty Mesler of Fairchance, Pa., was laid off last year from a nearby Sony television factory, she knew right away that she needed to retrain. Retail jobs wouldn't pay enough, and as for factory work, it wasn't realistic.

"I knew that, especially in our area that's so depressed, factory work was just not ever going to be an option, and I knew that the healthcare field is a lot more stable," she says.

She enrolled in a 14-month course to train as a surgical technician. She expects starting pay to be $11 to $14 an hour - not as much as Sony paid, but over time, a decent wage. "Working in a factory was fine, but you don't really have a skill," says Ms. Mesler. 15,000 applications for 300 jobs

Even in hotter economic regions like the South, there's still a scrum for jobs. When Toyota announced it would hire 300 new assembly-line jobs at its Huntsville, Ala., plant in 2002, the company received 30,000 requests for applications. Some 15,000 people ended up applying. In the past 12 months, the company has hired an additional 350 workers from a pool of 10,000 applicants in an area with an unemployment rate of about 3.5 percent.

"We found a lot of people wanting to improve their standard of living, or wanting to find a job that they know is stable and going to be here for the long haul," says Stephanie Deemer, spokeswoman at the Alabama facility.

Some parts of the country are actually experiencing labor shortages. In Fargo, N.D., which has the lowest unemployment rate in the nation at less than 2 percent, some local businesses are having trouble keeping workers on the production floor because they're job-hopping for signing bonuses, says Adrienne Olson at the local Chamber of Commerce.

Among workers with college degrees, the unemployment rate in October is at 1.9 percent. Arizona State University in Tempe has moved away from recruiting fairs in favor of letting employers come on campus at short notice to try to hire from the 51,000-student pool. The boom both in Tempe and statewide has made it one of the best times for graduates in the past 10 years, says Ray Castillo, director of Career Services at ASU.

"It certainly is a much more positive experience than what it might have been a few years in the past," he says. "A lot of it has to do with where we are physically located. We're in a [location] where there is a lot of expanding."

The Fed's Confession (WSJ)

When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said "never complain, never explain." So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004.

Speaking to bankers in New York, Mr. Fisher issued a mea maxima culpa that deserves wide attention: "In retrospect, the real fed funds rate turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time and was held lower longer than it should have been." As the nearby chart shows, a Fed worried about possible "deflation" moved the overnight interest rate it charges banks in June 2003 to an extraordinarily low 1% and kept it there for another year.

Mr. Fisher blamed this mistake on "poor data" that underestimated inflation, leading "to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today, as anybody not from the former planet of Pluto knows, the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country." In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations.

Mr. Fisher was careful to say he was speaking only for himself. But we'd sure like to know what his Fed colleagues think of his argument -- not least current Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who was a Fed governor for much of that time and had been one of those fretting loudest about the risks of "deflation." We can only assume that former Chairman Alan Greenspan is also preparing a chapter on this era for his memoirs.

Readers of these columns will not be surprised to learn that we think Mr. Fisher is correct and deserves credit for his candor. But the real import of his remarks isn't 20-20 hindsight so much as a chance for the Fed, and much of the economic establishment, to rethink its inflation models. Mr. Fisher bluntly concedes that "most economic data are inherently backward looking, often to a disconcerting degree." Thus the data the Fed was watching in 2003 suggested that prices were falling even as they were beginning to rise.

But this lets the Fed off the hook a little too easily. Throughout this period, and especially into 2004, there was plenty of other "data" flashing yellow and then red about rising inflation. The dollar was weak, both against other major currencies and especially against gold, which began a price surge not seen since the 1970s. Commodity prices across the board -- notably oil -- also began a rise that to our mind couldn't be explained merely by an increase in relative global demand. And there were also rising price pressures in dollar-bloc countries overseas, notably in China.

The question for Fed governors is why they discounted this evidence of real-time rising prices. Instead, Mr. Fisher says they were watching their own alphabet-soup of price indexes, such as the CPI and PCE, all of which look through the rearview mirror. That's assuming they were even watching prices at all, rather than the job market or the "output gap," or other measures that are dubious guides for monetary policy. The best guide for maintaining stable prices is to watch actual prices, or what economists call a price rule.

To be fair to the Fed, its policy decisions in the wake of the stock-market collapse were stellar through 2002. And in the years since it has had plenty of company in chasing "poor data." Most Wall Street economists and Beltway politicians were only too happy to cheer on the Fed as it kept its foot on the money accelerator. Some of our supply-side friends also claimed to see no evidence of rising prices, even as home prices rose by double-digits year after year and second homes became investment plays. Inflations are always popular at the beginning, and this was no exception. * * *

Which brings us back to the present. The Fed did finally recognize that inflation was a problem, and the consequences of its own policy correction are now being felt in the economy, especially in housing. As Mr. Fisher conceded last week, the housing slump "is complicating the task of achieving our monetary objective of creating the conditions for sustainable non-inflationary growth." Translation: We may have to tighten money further to restore stable prices, but we're afraid we'll tank the economy if we do. This is the dilemma the Fed's easy-money mistake has made for itself, and for the rest of us.

The good news is that the economy entered this rough patch with considerable momentum that may yet avoid a Fed-induced recession. The incentives from the 2003 tax cuts remain in place and have helped to boost investment and corporate profits. As last Friday's blowout October jobs report showed, the labor market remains strong and wages are increasing. If we're lucky, rising incomes will keep consumers spending even if their home values decline. Also if we're lucky, Tuesday's election results will not produce a reversal on tax policy; if anything, we may need another tax cut in the next year or two if the Fed tightens further.

As for the Fed, our reading of history is that the sooner it acts to restore price stability, the better the prospects for long-run growth and prosperity.

Once Safe, Public Pensions Are Now Facing Cuts (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

After losing a leg in the line of duty, Dan Toneck, a San Diego police officer, spent nearly a year in rehabilitation before returning to work, doing his job for another five years with an artificial limb.

Mr. Toneck, 37, was granted a disability retirement last year after 16 years on the job. Some of his fellow officers wept as he left headquarters for the last time.

Then, 10 months later, the impossible happened. San Diego cut his pension by about 10 percent, along with those of about 180 other disabled city retirees. "They're trying to pay the bills on the backs of the employees," Mr. Toneck said.

Across the country, government workers' pensions are protected by guarantees even stouter than those on pensions in the private sector. The legal promises, often backed up by union contracts, cover more than 15 million people.

Years of supporting court interpretations have enshrined the view that once a public employee has earned a pension, no one can take it away. Even during New York City's fiscal crisis 30 years ago, no existing pension promises were reduced.

But now a number of state and local governments are quietly challenging those guarantees. Financially troubled San Diego is the highest-profile example, but a handful of states, cities and smaller government bodies have also found ways to scale back existing promises and even shrink some current payments.

While still only scattered cases, these examples may be an early warning sign of what could be coming elsewhere. As local officials take stock of unexpectedly large obligations to retired public workers, some are starting to question whether service cuts, sales of government property and politically acceptable tax increases can ever go far enough to bring things into balance.

"This is a real-life problem," said Paul S. Maco, a partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins who advises municipalities on the disclosure of these obligations.

Mr. Toneck said that years ago, while he was still on the police force, he saw signs that San Diego was cutting corners. He recalled having to go to Kmart to buy jumper cables for his squad car. He was not surprised to learn the city had shortchanged the municipal pension fund. But he never dreamed his pension could be reduced.

"It was guaranteed, written in stone — when I retire, I make this much and they're not going to be able to touch that," he said.

His pension was set at about $35,000 a year. But last May, he received a letter saying he would start getting about $31,000 instead.

He and the others on disability pensions fell victim to an ambiguously written pension statute that lawyers noticed while combing through San Diego's financial records in the wake of a pension scandal. But there do not have to be accusations of wrongdoing for a government to start looking into whether its obligations to retirees can be reduced.

Some places, including Oregon, Rhode Island, Milwaukee County and several cities and towns in Texas, have already cut public workers' pensions on the basic argument that their pension funds had gone disastrously out of balance. Whether because of investment losses, faulty calculations or other factors, these places have declared that they can no longer sustain a level of benefits that had looked affordable just a few years ago.

Beyond the sheer political difficulty of removing an existing benefit, an array of legal guarantees — some in statutes, some in state constitutions, some in city charters — were supposed to prevent such reversals. But lawyers have been finding chinks in the armor.

In Texas, the pension guarantee in the state constitution has an unusual clause, giving towns and cities the chance to hold referendums on whether to opt out.

Voters in Houston made that choice after learning that pension sweeteners issued there in 2001 were allowing some people to retire in their 40s. Others, who participated in a special program that let them simultaneously work and collect pension money in high-interest accounts, got an even better deal, sometimes walking away with one-time payments of a million dollars or more on top of their regular pensions. The city raised the eligibility requirements for retirement and cut some of the biggest sweeteners.

Oregon rolled back $6 billion worth of public pensions in 2003, but the cuts have been snarled in legal challenges. In October, a federal appellate panel affirmed that Oregon could stop paying a guaranteed rate of 8 percent a year to participants with individual accounts. But another measure, freezing some retirees' cost-of-living adjustments, is still unresolved.

"Retirees have been in a state of turmoil," said Gregory A. Hartman, a Portland lawyer representing some of them. "They don't know what their rights are. They don't know what they're entitled to."

In Rhode Island, state workers' pensions take an unusually long time to vest, so the legislature was able to cut the planned pensions of everyone with fewer than 10 years of service, about 11,300 people.

In Wisconsin, Milwaukee County has tried to avoid legal battles by working with its eight public employees' unions after a pension scandal broke in 2001. A recall election was held and angry voters ousted seven county supervisors from office after learning they had jacked up pensions, including their own.

"This was a totally corrupt, venal deal by a bunch of politicians and their friends who figured out how to loot the treasury," said Roger H. Quindel, a county supervisor.

Even so, Milwaukee County has been able to make only marginal trims so far. Money is draining out of the pension fund so fast that the county has been contemplating the sale of some parks and an airport, along with cuts in government services. And it plans to ask for pension cuts when its labor contracts come up for renegotiation in January.

"We won't survive if we don't," Mr. Quindel said.

Wisconsin's state constitution does not specifically protect public pensions, but the county's lawyers have warned that a constitutional protection of property rights may cover pensions. The supervisors asked whether the county could shed some of its pension obligations by declaring bankruptcy, as airlines, steel companies and others have sometimes done. The lawyers said no.

In the private sector, a uniform federal pension law bars companies from reducing pensions that employees have already earned. Since pensions are built up over time, this means that if a company freezes or reduces the growth of benefits at some point, workers will earn smaller benefits going forward, but they cannot be stripped of anything they earned before the change. The only way around that rule today requires a bankruptcy judge to approve a default.

In the public sector, the protections often go further. About half of the 50 states have constitutional or statutory guarantees, said Robert D. Klausner, a lawyer in Plantation, Fla., who represents state and municipal pension plans in more than 20 states. "The day you're hired, your benefits are locked in at a minimum level," he said. If a government wants to cut pensions, it cannot apply the cuts to people already in the work force, as a corporation can. It can only apply them to new hires, he said.

Governments are also studying the guarantees on retiree health benefits because of a new accounting rule that is now requiring them to calculate, for the first time, the total value of the health benefits they have promised to retirees.

The numbers now being disclosed are daunting. Mercer Human Resource Consulting estimates that when all the calculations are done, the nation's states and cities will find they have promised a total of about $1.4 trillion, said Derek Guyton, a senior consultant.

Little, if any, money has been set aside to fulfill these obligations.

Mr. Maco, the Vinson & Elkins lawyer, said he feared that many towns and cities, particularly in places like upstate New York and along the Great Lakes, were about to discover that years of factory closings and job losses had eroded their tax bases so much that they had no realistic way to pay their full bills.

"The steel industry can shut down and close its plants, but that's hard for local governments," Mr. Maco said. After industries move away, the retired teachers and firefighters will still be there.

Pension funds can normally operate for many years with a shortfall, because they have investments to call upon and pensions are paid out slowly. But health claims, with little or no money set aside to pay them, can come due right away.

Some government agencies, like Chicago's municipal bus and rail authority, have set up a potentially explosive situation by arranging their retiree health claims to be paid directly out of their pension funds. "The taxpayers need to understand the seriousness of our situation," said Laurence Msall, president of the Civic Federation, a nonpartisan research group in Chicago. "It's not a far-off crisis."

San Diego's municipal pension fund was also responsible for retiree health care. But when the city's pension scandal broke, officials separated the health obligations.

"Now we're looking at a $3.1 billion debt, and $1.4 billion is health and $1.7 billion is pension," said Michael Aguirre, the city's independent attorney.

He is now in court, leading an unusually aggressive initiative to cut the city's pension obligations, arguing that benefits granted in 1996 and 2002 were issued illegally and must be annulled.

California law protects public pensions, but Mr. Aguirre is arguing that those protections conflict with other laws that govern the actions of public officials, which he says San Diego pension trustees violated. If the court agrees with him, the benefits owed to San Diego's roughly 15,000 city workers and retirees could go back to the level before the 1996 increase — a total reduction of some $500 million to $700 million.

Mr. Toneck, the disabled San Diego police officer, is not directly affected by Mr. Aguirre's case. He has petitioned the San Diego city council to reverse the cut in his pension, arguing that workers disabled on the job are the last people who should pay for a mistake that was caused by an ambiguity in the law.

The council has referred his petition to Mr. Aguirre, who is busy with the broader case.

Meanwhile, Mr. Aguirre said San Diego still had not developed a plan for paying all of its obligations, whatever the courts ultimately rule. He said he might ultimately have to try bankruptcy court.

"There's no good option," he said. "It's only painful."

Houston Missed The Real-Estate Boom Of East And West Coasts, But Now It's Payback Time (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

HOUSTON -- This sprawling city missed the real-estate boom that sent home prices soaring on the East and West coasts. Now, with much of the nation's housing market in retreat, it has yet to feel even a tremor.

In September, local sales of single-family homes and condominiums were up 17.7% from a year earlier, logging their 32nd straight month of increase, according to the Houston Association of Realtors. The median price of an existing single-family home: $143,400, up 3%.

By contrast, nationwide sales of residential real estate fell 14.2% in September, according to the National Association of Realtors. Home prices nationally were down 2.2%, retreating in such former hot spots such as Washington, Boston and San Francisco. The national median sales price for September for existing single-family homes was $219,800, according to the Houston Association of Realtors.

Houston's gains are nothing like those seen in the past decade in the Northeast and California, but that may be the secret to Houston's success and the reason a bubble is unlikely to develop here. Land here is abundant, and the city has some of the least-restrictive land-use and construction rules in the nation. Those factors help supply to keep pace with demand and keep prices within reach of a broad range of potential buyers.

"We haven't had a bad year in the past decade," says Lorraine Abercrombie, chairwoman of the local Realtors group and marketing director for Greenwood King Properties.

Houston's model is in stark contrast to cities such as Boston and San Francisco, which have strict zoning, exacting building codes and laws governing historical preservation. Some economists, including Edward Glaeser of Harvard University, say excessive regulation in such cities has slowed construction to the point where demand has outstripped supply, fueling a run-up in home prices.

In the once-sizzling markets where home prices are falling, housing costs are double, triple or even quadruple those of Houston. The danger, says Dr. Glaeser, is such places have priced out today's highly skilled "knowledge workers," forcing them to live in a more affordable locale where their contribution to the economy might not be as great. "These are places where only the elite can live," Dr. Glaeser says.

Not so Houston. Confined by neither oceans nor mountains, the Houston metropolitan area has plenty of room to spread out. What is more, the city has no zoning, weak historical-preservation rules and few tools to preserve open space.

The result is unfettered growth. For that, too, there is a price to be paid.

Houston lacks the historical charm of a city such as Boston and the natural beauty of a place such as San Francisco. In recent years an increasing number of Houston residents have warned that the city's affinity for strip malls, freeways and endless subdivisions may be putting it at a disadvantage in attracting talented workers.

Even so, Houston's economy is humming, thanks in part to a sustained boom in oil and gas and the city's burgeoning medical industry, which attracts patients from all over the world. In addition, the Hurricane Katrina evacuation in 2005 brought tens of thousands of refugees here, pushing up retail sales and lowering apartment-vacancy rates. Most of the Katrina refugees weren't wealthy enough to buy homes, however.

The Houston metropolitan area has added 420,000 jobs since 1995, according to the Greater Houston Partnership while the 10-county metropolitan statistical area topped 5.2 million people in July 2005, up about 11% from the 2000 Census count, according to the Texas State Data Center.

Affordable housing has played a significant role. James Gaines, an economist at the Texas A&M University's Real Estate Center, says a Houston developer can be "cutting roads and building houses" within a year of buying 500 acres. The same project would take a developer in Florida three years and as many as eight years in California, substantially pushing up the price, says Dr. Gaines.

The Houston Association of Realtors reported total property sales -- everything from single-family homes to country homes to lots listed on the Multiple Listing Service -- numbered 7,163 in September, up 17.8% from a year earlier. Sales of new and existing single family homes were up 19.3% to 5,954. The pace of home sales is also picking up. The trade group says the area has a 5.5-month supply of unsold homes, down slightly from August.

The national outlook isn't so bright, with some economists forecasting that sales of new homes are unlikely to start rising again before early 2008. A joint survey by consulting firm Global Insight and Cleveland bank holding company National City Corp. showed that 67 metropolitan areas experienced price declines in the second quarter this year, and not just those that enjoyed the boom. The Midwest, for example, showed the highest concentration of falling prices.

The survey also showed slower home-price increases nationally in the past year, with the most rapid slowdown coming in high-price markets such as California, Florida and the Northeast corridor. Nearly 70% of the 317 metropolitan areas surveyed showed a decline in appreciation during the period.

Texas had six markets where home prices rose at a rate of between 6% and 12% and another nine markets where prices increased 12% or more, the survey showed. Richard J. Dekaser, chief economist for National City, says, "It's like revenge of the nerds."

A Program That Works (WT)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

While there are differences in the priorities people assign to the different aspects of immigration reform, nearly everyone agrees that there are three parts to really solving our immigration problems: security, economic participation and civic integration.

By authorizing a more secure fence along some of the most frequently trespassed parts of our border, Congress made a first step on the security issue. But, without some way of monitoring immigrants within the country, this is only a partial answer to the security issue. Moreover, economic participation and civic integration remain untouched.

On their return, members of Congress have the opportunity to expand and improve a relatively small but highly successful part of our immigration policy that meets all three challenges. The H1-B visa program allows companies to bring in workers from overseas who possess skills that are not available domestically. The main users of the program are technology and health-care companies, although a number of highly skilled people in finance also work here under this program.

The H1-B program meets all three parts of the immigration policy challenge. First, it provides security within the country. The companies hiring these workers have already gone through a vetting process sufficient to justify their employment. Moreover, the employer naturally has a detailed and working knowledge of the whereabouts and day-to-day activities of the people involved.

Second, the program obviously involves economic participation by the immigrant. In many cases, particularly in technology, America has the choice between allowing these immigrants to work in America for American companies, or forcing our country and its businesses to compete with these workers in their homeland. We can either import these workers and export at least a part of their production or import the goods that they will produce if they remain at home.

Moreover, these workers are overwhelmingly net contributors to the economy and to the government's fiscal position. While a low skilled worker earning about $8.50 an hour will receive Social Security benefits $65,000 greater than the taxes paid, the great majority of H1-B workers will contribute at least as much in taxes as they ultimately receive in benefits. So, the economic participation of H1-B workers is an unambiguous gain for America.

Finally, there is the issue of civic participation. In the broad scheme of things, this must start with an immigrant having appropriate documentation. It should include the full panoply of rights and responsibilities that come with residing in America, and in some instances, it might end with citizenship. Congress wrestled with this issue earlier this year. But, the H1-B visa program is a working model of an approach to immigration that provides an opportunity for civic integration for those who participate.

Ideally, the H1-B visa program could be a model for broader immigration reform. But, in the meantime, Congress should extend and enlarge the program enough to meet the current and pressing needs of our economy for these workers. The current H1-B quota is full through the end of the current fiscal year, or until October 2007. Few government programs work this well, particularly regardingimmigration. When they come along, Congress should take full advantage of them.

Don't Abort Precedence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

ON WEDNESDAY, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. If law and not politics guide the justices, they will declare this blanket ban unconstitutional.

Opponents call this procedure, performed in the second or third trimester, "partial-birth abortion." Neutral commentators use the term "dilation and extraction." Whatever you call it, the procedure is extraordinarily rare and distasteful even to many supporters of abortion rights. It involves a physician partially extracting a fetus from the uterus into the birth canal, where he then collapses the skull by suctioning its contents.

By large majorities in both houses, Congress banned this procedure in 2003. That might have been an acceptable exercise of congressional power if the legislation had also contained an exception to protect the mother's health, a concern that the Supreme Court emphasized as early as 1973 in its landmark Roe vs. Wade decision.

Yet Congress rejected any exceptions even though the Supreme Court in 2000 had struck down a Nebraska partial-birth law precisely because it lacked one.

Given the high court's insistence on a health exception, why would the bill's supporters think that the justices might sustain a similar federal statute? One answer is that Congress "did the math." The decision in the Nebraska case was 5 to 4, so supporters gambled that one or more justices in that majority would have left the court by the time the new law came before it.

Indeed, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in the majority in the Nebraska case, retired and has been replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. If Alito were to vote to uphold the federal partial-birth ban, the deciding vote might be cast by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. His predecessor, the late William H. Rehnquist, dissented in the Nebraska case, as he had done in a string of abortion rulings going back to Roe vs. Wade.

Like Alito, the chief justice is a conservative who is widely assumed to believe that Roe vs. Wade was wrongly decided. But, as Roberts noted during his Senate confirmation hearings, Roe not only remains on the books but has been reaffirmed in the court's 1992 Casey vs. Planned Parenthood ruling. "It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Reversing its 2000 decision on partial-birth laws wouldn't cause the same jolt as repudiating Roe or Casey. But it would still upend a precedent and interfere with the settled expectations of women and doctors alike about the availability of this procedure as a medical last resort.

College Sports Get A Warning (NYT)

The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus.

The letter showed that Congress has noticed the recruiting violations and the athletes who sometimes remain eligible to play without progressing or by attending bogus classes. It also implied that the N.C.A.A. might eventually lose its tax exemptions unless it forces athletic departments to conform more closely to an educational mission.

The N.C.A.A. president, Myles Brand, defended the group's reform effort and reaffirmed his commitment to holding athletic programs to higher standards. But an N.C.A.A. report released last week touches on some of the same issues cited in the blistering letter from Congress. The problem is that athletic departments have more influence on university affairs than they should. They often use that influence to undermine the institutional mission.

Run by celebrity coaches who can earn more than $1 million a year — and supported by adoring fans, boosters and trustees — the campus sports machines easily overshadow the college faculties and presidents, some of whom seem frankly fearful of speaking up about abuses. The athletic departments derive much of their power from the widespread but mistaken belief that they pay their own way, and even earn money for their universities, through television revenues and other sources.

The truth, laid out in recent reports, is quite to the contrary. Only a handful of high-end college sports programs earn more than they spend. Among the rest, many struggle to balance their budgets and can do so only through subsidies from their universities. Sports budgets are growing two to three times faster than higher education as a whole.

The N.C.A.A. report calls on college presidents and administrators to rein in the campus sports machines and dial back spending. But the facts suggest that many college administrations have been outflanked by athletic departments that are deeply invested in the bad old ways. If that doesn't change, the N.C.A.A. can expect more scrutiny from Congress.

Iran Says It's Open To Talks With U.S. (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 6, 2006

Iran said Sunday it was open to negotiations with the United States on Iraq and other regional issues but hinted it would not drop its refusal to talk about its contentious nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0091145

As the U.N. Security Council geared up for a protracted debate on sanctioning Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran praised Russia for its "softer" stance on the issue.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Iran would consider talks with the U.S. over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested. He would not elaborate, and there was no immediate response from the United States on the offer.

"If there is any official request about regional issues, we are ready to review it," Hosseini told reporters.

However, he said Iran would not change its position regarding bilateral relations with the U.S., suggesting Tehran would refuse to talk about the nuclear issue. The U.S. has demanded Iran stop enriching uranium — a key step in the manufacture of nuclear weapons — as a precondition to talks about its disputed program.

The United States said in May it wanted to hold direct talks with Iran about its neighbor Iraq — which would have been the most public exchanges by the countries in years.

Iran agreed, and U.S. and Iranian officials said at the time that the talks would focus on the situation in Iraq, not on broader subjects such as Iran's nuclear program.

However, Iran then changed its mind, with Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki rejecting the negotiation on grounds that Americans had raised "other issues" and had tried to use the decision to hold the talks as propaganda.

Iran's statement on Sunday seemed to indicate the government was once again willing to consider the idea of direct talks with the U.S. over Iraq, which is veering ever closer to civil war. U.S. officials have long accused Iran of interfering in neighboring Iraq since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has also said the White House believes Tehran has a role to play in stabilizing Iraq, whose government is dominated by Shiite Muslims like Iran's.

Some Western experts believe Iran is genuinely worried about civil conflict in Iraq and its potential to spill over, although others say Iranian hardliners may have an interest in causing at least some turmoil.

Iranian leaders are believed to have close links to some Iraqi leaders and clerics.

Sunday's announcement came a few hours after an Iraqi court sentenced Saddam Hussein to death by hanging for crimes against humanity in a mass killing of Iraqi Shiites in 1982.

It also came one day after thousands of Iranians celebrated the 27th anniversary of the U.S. embassy takeover by militant students in Tehran, when 52 Americans were held hostage for over a year.

The U.S., which broke off diplomatic relations with Iran over the embassy takeover, suspects Iran's uranium enrichment program is a front for developing weapons. Tehran denies the accusations and says its program is for peaceful purposes.

Tehran state-run radio said Sunday the International Atomic Energy Agency officials inspected Iran's nuclear facilities in Isfahan and Natanz including a new enrichment cascade.

The inspection was the first since Tehran announced it had successfully stepped up its uranium enrichment activities in October.

Iran has repeatedly rejected a package of incentives offered by six world powers because it required it to freeze uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for atomic power or material for a nuclear warhead.

Hosseini said the U.N. Security Council's push to impose sanctions on Tehran to punish it for continuing enrichment would delay any possible compromise.

"Back to negotiation is the best amendment. Nothing else will be effective and will bear desirable result," he said. "Russia clearly has announced that they did not support the current draft."

The five veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council have so far failed to agree on a resolution imposing sanctions, and negotiations could be long and difficult.

Russia's foreign minister said Saturday that Moscow would only support sanctions against Iran if they are limited in time and spell out a clear mechanism for lifting them.

"Russia's stance is better than other ... countries. They have a softer policy. Since the beginning, their stance was different," Hosseini said.

DOJ_NMG_0091146

The European draft resolution would order all countries to cease supplying material or technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs. It would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

Russia and China, which both have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse last month of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks. The United States, meanwhile, has said the European draft is too lenient.

Iran Would Consider New US Request For Iraq Talks (AFP)

By Hiedeh Farmani

AFP, November 6, 2006

Iran has said it was ready to consider requests from its arch-enemy the United States to hold unprecedented talks over Iraq, even though a similar move came to nothing earlier this year.

"If we receive an official request, we are ready to examine it," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters Sunday.

Any such contact would mark a break in a near three-decade pause in open bilateral contacts between US and Iranian officials following the country's 1979 Islamic revolution.

In March this year Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador in Baghdad, made an offer to Tehran to hold talks on quelling the deadly unrest that has been plaguing Iraq since the US-led invasion in 2003.

Emphasising that any such contacts would have no consequence for bilateral relations frozen since 1980, Khalilzad said at the time he was looking to encourage Iran to play a positive role in Iraq and steer clear of interference.

The United States, which accuses Iran of sponsoring terrorism and seeking to manufacture a nuclear bomb, insisted that any such talks would be limited solely to the situation in Iraq.

Despite initial expressions of willingness from Iranian officials, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad rejected that overture, saying that US "behaviour" was not good.

But Hosseini said on Sunday the door remained open for talks.

"At the current time, some American and Iraqi officials have raised the question of a dialogue. If we receive such a request we are ready to examine it again."

Hosseini said that "as far as bilateral relations is concerned, the position of Iran has not changed", maintaining Tehran's refusal to consider diplomatic relations if the US stance towards the Islamic republic does not change.

"We have clearly said that we were ready to examine a request for dialogue on regional issues," he added.

It remains to be seen whether the United States is itself willing to renew the offer, with the verbal war of words between Washington and Tehran as vehement as ever and tension rising over the Iranian nuclear programme.

But Hosseini's comments also come at a time when the US is mired in mounting sectarian bloodshed and deadly attacks on its troops in Iraq, prompting calls for a rapid about-turn in its strategy.

According to newspaper reports, a special panel on Iraq created by the US Congress and led by former secretary of state James Baker is expected to recommend that President George W. Bush bring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting.

Iran has emerged as a major ally of the Shiite-dominated government in Iraq following the fall of Saddam Hussein, and Washington remains deeply suspicious of the Islamic republic's influence in the country.

It accuses Iran of providing assistance to militant groups and interfering in Iraq, charges Tehran denies.

The United States cut diplomatic ties with Iran as a result of the seizure by Islamic radicals of the US embassy in Tehran on November 4, 1979, shortly after the Islamic revolution that toppled the US-backed Shah.

Russia Asks Europe To Revise Its Plan For Iran Sanctions (AFP-Y)

By Herve Couturier

AFP, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091147

Western countries that want to punish Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment are again facing reluctance on the part of Russia and China to grant support, with Moscow demanding a softening of a draft UN resolution.

More than two months after the UN-imposed deadline of August 31 expired, it is still not possible to say when the UN Security Council will act.

The United States is pushing for quick sanctions. But according to many diplomats, the negotiations promise to be long and difficult.

China and Russia are reluctant to impose strict penalties on Iran, with which they maintain important economic and commercial ties.

On Friday, Moscow proposed changes to a European draft resolution that the US Ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, called substantial during an informal meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council (China, the United States, France, Britain, Russia) and Germany.

Consequently, according to Bolton, the United States would also like to propose changes, and ambassadors will have to consult their respective capitals during the weekend to be able to resume discussions probably next week.

The draft, drawn by Europeans in cooperation with the United States, calls for economic and commercial sanctions against Iran.

But it has been rejected by Russia in his initial form.

Russian Foreign Minister Serguei Lavrov, said in Brussels Friday that Moscow was ready to take reasonable measures against Iran, but made clear that Russia believed the European proposal had gone too far.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya, meanwhile, pointed out that penalties proposed by the Europeans were a little too hard.

They would risk putting the Iranians' backs against the wall, he warned, adding that Beijing supported the Russians.

His Russian counterpart, Vitaly Churkin, also said that the purpose of any future Security Council action was to encourage Iran to come back to the negotiating table, not to turn it away from negotiations.

He reminded that the UN resolution must leave the open door to future discussions with the Iranians.

Churkin also expressed his opposition to any mention in the resolution of Russia's help to Iran to build a civilian nuclear power plan in Bushehr.

Bushehr has nothing to do with concerns about nuclear proliferation because it is a peaceful nuclear power plant, he said.

The initial version of the resolution mentioned the plant, but only to point out that it will remain outsided the scope of proposed sanctions.

According to a diplomatic source, Moscow is equally opposed to penalties against Iranian individuals such as a ban on travel and a freeze of financial assets abroad.

Russia would be ready to accept an embargo only on "sensitive" equipment while the current draft calls for an ban on all equipment that could be used for nuclear and ballistic missile programs in Iran, as well as on all technical or financial assistance linked to these programs.

Meanwhile, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed optimism Friday about chanced to reach a compromise.

I think that in the last analysis they will not block us, she told a radio station. We will have a resolution that will punish Iran, even though it may not be as strong as we would have wanted it to be.

Behind China's Stance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King JR.

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

BEIJING -- Shortly after North Korea conducted its first nuclear-weapons test last month, regulators here quietly told China's banks to suspend their dealings with the nation -- a move that has largely severed Pyongyang's most important link to the world financial system.

Beijing made no public announcement. Still, the message to North Korea was clear: China, long averse to imposing any kind of economic sanctions, was willing to go beyond penalties imposed by the United Nations to force North Korea to back down.

The banking measure and other pressure applied by Beijing -- including a cut in oil exports to North Korea and two votes at the U.N. in favor of economic sanctions against the Pyongyang regime -- are widely credited with getting North Korea to agree to return to Chinese-led talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear-arms programs.

China's unusual, if quiet, activism may signal a significant change in its view of the world and its approach to foreign policy since it formally wired itself into the global economy five years ago by joining the World Trade Organization.

Beijing's long-held policy of not interfering in the "internal affairs" of other nations appears to be giving way to a broader definition of its national interests -- one that goes beyond satisfying its fast-growing appetite for oil and other raw materials. China also is showing a greater willingness to embrace global institutions and norms.

"It is an extraordinary thing for China to be now where it is," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a trip to Asia last month. After China supported an Oct. 14 U.N. resolution condemning North Korea's nuclear test, Ms. Rice was so pleased she touted China's more-active stance as almost more significant than the nuclear test itself.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council since 1971, also is planning to send 1,000 troops to reinforce the U.N. contingent in southern Lebanon after the war there this summer, its largest deployment of peacekeepers to date. China also has become a key player in the debate over how to respond to Iran's nuclear ambitions and the crisis in Darfur.

The evolution of Chinese foreign policy may be most apparent in the case of North Korea. For decades, China's Communist Party and military managed the country's relations with its socialist neighbor, though the two countries' ties frayed after China's shift toward a market economy started to accelerate in the early 1990s and the country normalized relations with South Korea in 1992. Now, a rising and more-pragmatic class of foreign-affairs officials are gaining influence. They talk about Beijing's need to develop daguo xintai, or a great-power mentality.

"There is a change in Chinese thinking. They are acting more like a stakeholder" in the international system, says Michael Green, who stepped down late last year as head of Asian affairs for the Bush administration's National Security Council. "North Korea is helping to push them down that path."

China's increasing tendency to work alongside the U.S. -- or at least not openly against it -- stands in stark contrast with Russia, which has stymied the U.S. on several fronts, including the push to impose sanctions against Iran for its uranium-enrichment program.

Even so, some U.S. officials harbor doubts about China's motivations and the prospects for a broad alignment of interests between Washington and Beijing. Skeptics say China's decision to pressure North Korea stems more from worries about the regional power balance than about support for international efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

Chinese foreign policy also remains heavily influenced by the voracious demand of its fast-growing economy for oil and other natural resources. Critics say Beijing has turned a blind eye to actions by the governments of oil-rich countries such as Sudan and Iran. Until recently, China had been reluctant to consider U.N. sanctions against Tehran for its nuclear program.

An immediate test of China's resolve on North Korea will be whether Beijing sticks to its tough stance against Pyongyang now that the North has agreed to return to six-nation disarmament talks. In the past, China has put pressure on North Korea to attend the talks but hasn't used the full weight of its economic leverage to force a resolution.

China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said Thursday that Beijing would continue to enforce U.N. sanctions -- which bar weapons sales and luxury-goods shipments to North Korea -- even after talks resume. "Each country has a duty to strictly and responsibly implement" the U.N. resolution, "and China is no exception," he said.

The Chinese restrictions on bank transactions with North Korea remain in place, and analysts say the curbs could lead to serious economic hardship within months or even weeks. An official of China's largest oil company, state-controlled China National Petroleum Corp., said he expected China's oil exports to North Korea to return to normal when the talks get under way. Diplomats say they expect the talks to resume in Beijing by year end.

Since the six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program began in 2003, China repeatedly has urged Washington to be more flexible in the hopes of making diplomatic progress. Privately, Chinese officials started to lose patience as Pyongyang and its leader, Kim Jong Il, resorted to a combination of brinkmanship and foot-dragging that has left the talks at a standstill since last year.

In 2005, North Korea declared itself a nuclear power. Then, despite objections from China and its neighbors, the North test-launched a series of ballistic missiles.

North Korea's decision to go ahead with its nuclear test in early October -- despite stern warnings from Beijing to desist -- put the country at odds with China's national interests by threatening to spark an arms race in the region that could lead to Japan, China's main regional rival, increasing its military strength.

After North Korea's missile tests, China voted in favor of a U.N. sanctions resolution against Pyongyang, in what may be the first time Beijing didn't veto or abstain from a sanctions vote. After North Korea detonated its atomic device, China voted in favor of even stricter sanctions at the U.N. -- and it is now going beyond that on its own.

The current steps may be temporary and aimed at forcing Pyongyang back to the negotiating table, but they appear to show Beijing's desire to strike a balance between maintaining regional stability and protecting the broader international system for controlling the spread of nuclear weapons.

Some senior U.S. administration officials remain skeptical of China's new posture, arguing that North Korea is a special case in which one of Beijing's few close allies betrayed it by testing a nuclear bomb. "China was humiliated," says one senior administration official. "They had no choice but to support the resolution that the U.S. and others put forward."

Still, there are other signs China is stepping out of its historical role. Chinese officials resent criticism of their country's economic dealings with Sudan, where civil war has spilled over into mass killings of civilians in the Darfur region. The officials say China is quietly working behind the scenes to bring peace to the area. "We use our good relationship and cooperation with the government" to push for a settlement, says Zhai Jun, assistant foreign minister for African affairs. "But we don't have to announce every time we do this."

The next test of China's commitment to its newfound activism may be Iran, whose nuclear ambitions have left it at odds with the U.N. Security Council. Iran's uranium-enrichment program has raised suspicions that the country is pursuing nuclear arms, though Tehran insists the program is for civilian energy purposes.

In July, China joined Russia and the other three permanent Security Council members -- the U.S., Britain and France -- in backing a resolution threatening Iran with sanctions unless it dropped its uranium-enrichment program and returned to negotiations. Now the five countries are trying to hammer out a set of sanctions they can all endorse. Chinese backing for even a limited sanctions package would be noteworthy. Iran is China's third-largest supplier of imported oil. This year, China's imports from Iran are likely to top $12 billion.

U.S. Discusses N. Korea In Japan (WT/AP)

By Hiroko Tabuchi

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

TOKYO -- U.S. Undersecretaries of State R. Nicholas Burns and Robert Joseph were in Tokyo today coordinating with Japanese and South Korean officials before the resumption of long-delayed negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who also is in Tokyo, said the three countries worked closely together in the past and would continue to do so at the six-nation talks expected later this year, according to a Japanese Foreign Ministry official.

Mr. Ban, who takes over as U.N. secretary-general in January, was to meet Prime Minister Shinzo Abe today for further talks. The two Americans were to meet with Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other Japanese officials before traveling to South Korea later today, according to Japan's Foreign Ministry.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, citing unidentified officials, reported that the three countries will hold a meeting of their chief nuclear negotiators in Washington as early as next weekend to discuss strategies to move the nuclear talks ahead.

The North agreed last week to return to the negotiations -- which also include China and Russia -- in the first easing of tensions after its Oct. 9 nuclear test. The talks have been stalled for a year over financial restrictions placed on the North by the United States for suspected counterfeiting and money laundering.

Mr. Aso said, however, that North Korea's return to the talks "is not a goal in itself," according to a ministry official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Aso said North Korea also must comply with the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after its nuclear test and abandon all atomic weapon development.

On Saturday, Pyongyang lashed out at Tokyo, saying Japan did not need to participate in the talks "because it is no more than a state of the U.S. and it is enough for Tokyo just to be informed of the results of the talks by Washington."

Japan is a common target of criticism from the North, stemming from Tokyo's imperial occupation of the Korean Peninsula in the early 20th century. Pyongyang has called before for Japan to be excluded from the nuclear talks.

North Korea said it would return to the talks to seek an end to a U.S.-led campaign blocking Pyongyang's access to international banks because of purported illegal activities such as counterfeiting and money laundering. Washington had said it will discuss the financial restrictions only in the context of the six-nation talks.

The North often refers to its nuclear program as a self-defensive measure against the threat of a U.S. attack. Washington has insisted repeatedly that it has no intention to attack.

The regime's No. 2 leader, Kim Yong-nam, said last week that any progress at the revived talks on the communist nation's nuclear program will depend on the United States' "attitude," an indication that a breakthrough could be difficult.

Little Lost Ones (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

Among a small group of North Korean refugees who have taken sanctuary in the U.S. Consulate in Shenyang, China, are two orphan children, both boys, ages 13 and 16. With luck, if the Chinese authorities allow them to leave and the U.S. government works out the legalities of granting asylum to parentless minors, they will be in the U.S. before Thanksgiving.

Fortune has already shone on these boys by granting them safe passage on the underground railroad that ferries North Korean refugees in China to shelter in embassies or consulates there or in third countries. Korean refugees -- who number in the tens, or even hundreds, of thousands -- are leading desperate lives of hide-and-seek in China. Beijing's policy, in contravention of international law, is to track them down and repatriate them to North Korea, where they face prison camps or worse. It even pays bounties to citizens for turning them in.

The boys were led to safety by Liberty in North Korea (LINK), a Virginia-based nonprofit dedicated to helping the refugees in China. LINK says the boys lost their parents to famine and crossed the border separately, scavenging for food. They met in an underground shelter run by LINK. "What we're trying to do is help these children," says a spokesman. "We house them and protect them and try to get them out to freedom." There are dozens of such secret orphanages in northeast China, operated by local Samaritans and supported by groups based in the U.S. and South Korea.

Unlike the boys at the consulate, most abandoned orphans in northeast China are the progeny of North Korean women who have been captured and deported and their Chinese "husbands," who spurn their children. They are stateless, rejected by both China and North Korea for their "impure blood." Pregnant women deported to North Korea are often forced to abort for the same reason, says Chun Ki Won, a South Korean minister whose organization, Durihana, has helped spirit hundreds of refugees out of China. "I know of many cases myself," he says.

"Diu Diu," or "little lost one," is the nickname given to a three-and-a-half year-old boy that LINK tried, but failed, to help. A year ago he and his mother were captured by Chinese police and taken to the border, where racist North Korean border guards refused to admit the half-Chinese boy, whom they tore from his mother's arms. The police then sold the boy to a circus for $100, where he was severely abused and ended up in a hospital. The photos LINK obtained of the boy are too shocking to print.

"The stories are all so similar," says Tim Peters, an American missionary in Seoul who runs Helping Hands Korea. "A girl comes out [of the North] and either she has been secretly sold into marriage or she volunteers to marry a Chinese man. And then she gets caught and sent back." Mr. Peters estimates there are "thousands" of such abandoned children. Pastor Chun puts the number even higher.

Once in shelters, the children are de facto prisoners. They usually lack the official papers needed to attend school, get medical attention or participate in any other way in local society. "That's the problem," says a spokesman for Aegis Foundation, another U.S.-based nonprofit that runs shelters for Korean children in China. "We cannot send them to normal school and if they don't get any education, they can't be good citizens. That's why we need to smuggle them out."

Crossing Borders, a Christian ministry based in Virginia, takes a different approach. It also sponsors secret orphanages but "we don't do the underground railroad," a spokesman says. "The long-term goal is to see these kids grow up and become productive members of society." Regulation is loose in the areas where its shelters are located, and the children it helps can sometimes attend school. Some of the children have been voluntarily handed over by fathers. "Most fathers have no means or desire of helping take care of their children," the spokesman says. "We go into the village and offer to take the kids. It's a handshake deal."

The U.N. High Commission on Refugees stands ready to help the Korean refugees in China -- if only Beijing would let it. Several countries in the region are prepared to set up transit camps for refugees provided the U.S. helps pay for it and South Korea ultimately accepts them for re-settlement, as its Constitution requires. But even if, in the happiest of worlds, all this were to occur, the stateless orphans could still be left out. According to groups that run the underground railroad, even South Korea, which accepts most of the Northerners who manage to escape, refuses to admit the children on the grounds that they are not true "defectors."

Amid this misery, there are a few stories with happy endings -- of mothers who ride the underground railroad to the South with their Korean-born children or mothers who escape and then go back to smuggle out their Chinese-born kids. The humanitarian workers tell these stories with unflagging spirit. But the vast majority of the orphans remain lost in China, in lives that offer little hope. Most of the South Koreans and Americans working to help the children are Christian, as are many of the ethnically Korean Chinese who care for them. Pastor Chun speaks for many, when he says he takes inspiration from Isaiah 1:17, in which God exhorts the prophet to "Defend the fatherless."

Israel Vows To Hit Gaza Until Rockets Subside (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 5 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Sunday that the military would not halt its offensive in the northern Gaza Strip until Palestinian rocket fire toward Israel was significantly reduced.

On Sunday, the fifth straight day of fighting, Israeli forces killed three Palestinians, two of them militants and the other a security official, Palestinian medical workers said. The fighting, which included an Israeli airstrike, again took place in and around Beit Hanun, the northern Gaza town that has been the focus of the Israeli operation.

Large numbers of Israeli troops have been operating in Beit Hanun since Wednesday, though they have not been able to stop Palestinians from firing the locally manufactured rockets known as Qassams. Palestinian militants fired at least 10 more rockets into southern Israel on Sunday, but they caused no major damage or serious injuries. The Palestinians have launched more than 30 since the Israeli incursion in the area, the Israeli military said.

“We have declared that we will never accept the ongoing Qassam fire and that we will take any steps needed to considerably reduce the fire,” Mr. Olmert said Sunday at his weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem. “The operation is limited in time, but we have no intention of announcing when it will end.”

The Palestinians, meanwhile, have called for international pressure on Israel to halt the offensive.

“I urge members of the international community to take the appropriate response to Israel’s crimes in Gaza,” said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator. “Condemnation is the least one would expect.”

More than 40 Palestinians, including militants and civilians, have been killed over the past five days. One Israeli soldier has died. The Israeli forces have detained 30 people suspected of being militants, the military said.

In another development, a Palestinian lawmaker, Mustafa Barghouti, said that he was brokering the latest attempt at a Palestinian national unity government and that an agreement could be reached in days.

The proposal calls for a government of technocrats not directly linked to any party. Hamas, the militant Islamic group that now leads the government, and Fatah, the secular nationalist movement that lost the elections but whose leader still holds the Palestinian presidency, would approve members of the new government. The Palestinians have been holding talks for months on forming a unity government. Palestinians have expressed hope that a new government can win a restoration of Western aid, which was cut after Hamas came to power. The United States and the European Union, with Israel, have demanded that a Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian pacts.

Also on Sunday, Avigdor Lieberman, a far-right politician in the Israeli cabinet, caused a stir by again supporting a land and population transfer between Jews and Arabs.

Israel Vows To Press Gaza Offensive (AP)

By Mark Lavie

AP, November 6, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to press ahead with Israel's offensive in northern Gaza, brushing off international calls to halt the fighting and Palestinian complaints of dwindling supplies of water, food and other staples.

The death toll in Israel's five-day sweep through the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun rose to 48 on Sunday, when four Palestinians, including two Hamas militants, were killed, according to Palestinian health officials. Israel launched the drive last week to try to stop to daily rocket barrages aimed at Israeli towns.

The Vatican and European Union have expressed grave concerns about the offensive, but Olmert told his Cabinet on Sunday it was necessary to "considerably reduce the (rocket) fire and prevent terror." He said Israel has no intention of reoccupying Gaza after last year's pullout.

"When we reach the conclusion that the effectiveness of the operation is bringing us closer to reaching the goals, we will definitely pull our forces out of Gaza," he said.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh called the Israeli offensive a "massacre," and Beit Hanoun residents warned of a burgeoning humanitarian crisis.

"We have electricity, but no drinking water," said one 28-year-old woman, who declined to be identified because of the military presence in town.

She said there were shortages of staples like milk and diapers and residents were being forced to share food. She also said tanks were visible from her home, and her husband was taken away by Israeli troops for questioning. "I don't know what's happened to him," she said.

Col. Nir Press, head of Israel's liaison team dealing with Palestinian authorities and international aid organizations, said Sunday that shops in Beit Hanoun were open for a few hours Sunday and would be open again Monday.

Press said U.N. agencies and the Red Cross were shipping in food, water, baby formula and other supplies and would continue to do so. He added that Palestinian technicians would be allowed to repair water mains on Monday.

On Sunday, AP Television News showed images of ambulances and taxis rushing Palestinian casualties to the small Beit Hanoun hospital, dodging potholes gouged by Israeli shells. A young man, writhing from a chest wound, was pulled out of a yellow taxi and carried into the hospital.

Despite the offensive, Palestinians fired six rockets at Israel on Sunday, the military said. Nobody was hurt.

Israel said its attacks are focused on militants who launch the rockets. While most of the dead have been militants, several civilians — including a 4-year-old girl, a 72-year-old man and two paramedics — have been killed. Two women who attempted to help a group of militants besieged in a mosque also died.

On Sunday, about 100 paramedics marched through the streets of Gaza City to protest the deaths of their two 17-year-old colleagues, both volunteers. They were killed in an Israeli missile strike last week in the town of Beit Lahiya, next to Beit Hanoun.

The International Red Cross harshly criticized Israel, saying the paramedics and their vehicle were clearly marked. "The ICRC is appalled by this failure to protect personnel engaged in emergency medical duties," a statement released Sunday said.

At the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI said he was worried about the "grave deterioration" in the Gaza Strip, and called on all sides to work to stop the bloodshed and immediately resume "direct, serious and concrete negotiations."

In a weekend statement, the EU called on both Israel and the Palestinians to halt the violence because of the casualties, but aimed its sharpest barb at Israel.

"The right of all states to defend themselves does not justify disproportionate use of violence or actions which are contrary to international humanitarian law," the EU said.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said Israel was doing everything possible to avoid civilian casualties. "We have to get directly to the people who do the shooting and that is what we are trying to do," he told reporters.

Israel withdrew all troops and Jewish settlements from Gaza last year. But it sent forces back into the area after Palestinian militants tunneled into Israel and abducted a soldier in June.

A Palestinian militant group claiming to hold Gilad Shalit, the captured soldier, said it has no plans to kill the serviceman, despite the Israeli offensive.

However, Abu Mujahid, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, said the soldier could be harmed by Israel's military activity. "Gilad Shalit's life is in danger through the incursion and bombing of houses," said Abu Mujahid.

Syria Hints At Resistance Vs. Israel (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, November 6, 2006

Syria could resort to armed resistance if peace negotiations do not lead to Israel's return of the Golan Heights, the country's Information Minister said Sunday.

Mohsen Bilal said international negotiations should lead to Israel giving back the Golan Heights, captured from Syria in the 1967 Mideast war and later annexed. If that does not happen, he warned Syria could resort to "other means, which struggling people have used at various points in history, beginning with legitimate resistance."

But Bilal said Syrians were eager to resume talks.

"The road for peace and stability in the region and the world goes through ending occupation" of the Golan Heights, he said, opening a three-day media forum geared at highlighting Syria's right to the Golan.

Israeli-Syrian peace talks broke down in 2000, with Syria demanding assurances it would get back all of the Golan Heights. Israel wanted slight modifications to the pre-1967 line, conforming to the international frontier, and insisted that issues of security and normalization be spelled out first.

On Sunday, Syrian President Bashar Assad, who was meeting with Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa, called for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Israel has brushed off Assad's previous calls to restart peace talks, saying Syria must first clamp down on the radical Palestinian groups it hosts.

Protecting The Right To Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

No one expects Florida elections to go smoothly, but this year the state got off to an alarming start. Voters reported that after selecting Democratic candidates on electronic voting machines, the review screens registered that they had chosen Republicans. A spokeswoman for the Broward County supervisor of elections told The Miami Herald that the machines often fall out of sync under heavy use, but that they can be fixed when voters complain.

DOJ_NMG_0091154

That snapshot of Florida's early voting is confirmation — as if any were needed — that a great deal can go wrong tomorrow, much of it eminently preventable. Six years after the 2000 election meltdown, voting machines are still unreliable, and there are an array of other obstacles to voters who want their votes to count.

Voting is a right and a responsibility, but it is also, unfortunately, a challenge. As people go to the polls tomorrow, they should be on the lookout for:

ELECTRONIC VOTING GLITCHES In addition to misrecording votes, A.T.M.-style voting machines can provide misleading or incomplete information. (On some Virginia machines, the last name of the Democratic Senate candidate, Jim Webb, will not appear on the summary page.) Voters should check and double-check their votes, and the voter-verified paper trail if one is available, and report anything that does not look right. If the machines do not work, they should insist on casting a paper ballot.

VOTE SUPPRESSION In California, 14,000 Hispanic voters received letters last month falsely informing them that immigrants could be sent to jail for voting. Every election there are attempts to trick voters, especially members of minorities and the poor. Voters should insist on their right to cast a ballot.

VOTER ID CONFUSION Election officials often demand identification even when it is not legally required, or misstate the requirements. Georgia this year sent out letters saying that a photo ID is required even though the courts ruled otherwise. Voters can check the law on their local Board of Elections Web site. If there is a dispute, they should insist at the very least on casting a provisional ballot.

VOTING ROLL PURGES Election officials sometimes wrongly remove voters' names from the rolls. That happened, notoriously, in Florida in 2000, and this year Kentucky lost a lawsuit over a faulty purge. Even people whose names are missing from the rolls may be eligible voters. Voters who have trouble casting a ballot should appeal to the person running the polling place. If that fails, they should call a voters' hot line — like 1-866-OUR-VOTE, run by the National Campaign for Fair Elections — or a political party or campaign. Federal law says a voter whose eligibility is in doubt has the right to cast a provisional ballot, whose validity will be decided later. But regular ballots are more likely to be counted.

Unfortunately, many of the things that go wrong tomorrow may be invisible to the average voter. Machines that appear to work properly may be throwing out or altering votes. Without a voter-verified paper trail and an effective vote audit, this can go undetected. Provisional ballots may be wrongly rejected after the polls close. Some states, shamefully, have laws saying that if a provisional ballot is cast in the correct polling place but at the wrong table, it will not count.

These flaws point to the need to continue to push a reluctant Congress, as well as state legislatures, for meaningful election reform. Tomorrow, though, voters should just focus on getting their votes counted within our current, deeply flawed system.

Ex-Indiana Man Locked Up With Nation's Worst In Lockdown (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran
The Indianapolis Star, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091157

The Indiana truck driver found guilty of conspiring to betray the United States has been secluded in a Colorado super-maximum-security prison under a secret order approved by the U.S. attorney general.

Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on the few conversations he's allowed to have, heavily restricts his access to news reports and prohibits anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him.

Some inmates at the prison, which houses the federal government's worst of the worst, spend at least 23 hours a day in soundproof cells. They cannot speak to or make eye contact with other inmates.

These "special administrative measures," also called "SAMs orders," are meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security.

William Dazey Jr., one of Shaaban's public defenders at the trial this year, said the special order is an unusual step. "I have not seen evidence that would support the notion Mr. Hafed is a threat to the United States," Dazey said.

Shaaban, who also is known as Shaaban S. Hafed, acted as his own attorney at trial, but outside of the courtroom his standby defense lawyers described him as an international con man. They said he offered Saddam Hussein's government "a lot of hot air." Prosecutors could not prove Shaaban actually had access to U.S. secrets.

At Shaaban's sentencing, U.S. District Judge John Tinder recommended placing Shaaban in a federal prison at Terre Haute, closer to his wife and young son in Greenfield.

But the judge had no control over Shaaban's placement nor any say in the secret administrative order quieting him. Assistant U.S. Attorney Sharon Jackson requested the restrictions, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales personally initialed the order.

The Justice Department declined to comment on the order, and the local FBI office referred calls about it to Jackson, who could not be reached. First Assistant U.S. Attorney Timothy Morrison, who helped try the case, declined to say how Shaaban's prison communications could threaten national security.

About 40 federal inmates, most of them convicted terrorists, are facing nearly identical restrictions, according to the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Shaaban was stripped of his U.S. citizenship after being found guilty in January of six federal charges, including illegally acting as an agent of the Iraqi government before the U.S. invasion there in 2003.

He was sentenced to 13 years, four months in prison after an 11-day Indianapolis trial in which prosecutors portrayed him as a clever spy who had offered to sell the names of more than 60 clandestine CIA operatives to Iraqi intelligence officials for millions. Shaaban said in secretly taped interviews he planned to use the money to launch a pro-Arab broadcast station in the U.S.

To impose special administrative measures, the attorney general has to certify a "substantial risk" exists that an inmate's communications could result in death or serious bodily injury to others.

The regulation states the inmate must be notified of the restrictions and the justification. However, Shaaban received an order that laid out the conditions of his incarceration with the reasons behind it blacked out.

Among possible reasons for the order, court observers say:

A jury found Shaaban guilty of threatening his brother with death by decapitation to keep him from testifying. But federal prosecutors produced no evidence he could deliver on the threat or initiate violent acts while behind bars.

While the prosecutors he mocked at trial could not prove Shaaban had access to any government secrets before his arrest, he received access to U.S. intelligence files while he represented himself at trial.

Many of the inmates under such severe restrictions are unsympathetic figures. But there are critics who question the necessity -- and the psychological effects -- of limiting virtually all contact with the outside world for years at a time.

"You're cut off. It's not a whole lot different from being at Guantanamo Bay," the U.S. naval base where the U.S. military is holding people it labels "enemy combatants," said Khurrum Wahid, an attorney with offices in New York and Miami who defends terror suspects.

"A lot of this is show. It's playing to people's fears about terrorism."

Other federal convicts subject to "SAMs orders" include well-known inmates serving life sentences:

Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the blind Egyptian cleric who conspired to blow up New York landmarks, including the World Trade Center, which his followers bombed in 1993.

Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Richard Reid, who tried in 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe to blow up an American Airlines flight bound for Miami as the plane flew over the Atlantic Ocean.

Abdel-Rahman is in a special prison for inmates with medical problems. Moussaoui and Reid are with Shaaban at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex, a prison campus in Colorado about 90 miles south of Denver.

The complex is home to the federal system's only super-maximum-security prison, known in some circles as the "Alcatraz of the Rockies." Security cameras in the most secure areas monitor inmates around the clock. Some never leave their cells because they are subject to body-cavity searches when they do.

Shaaban joined other notorious inmates when he arrived at the prison in August. They include Oklahoma City bombing participant Terry Nichols, "Unabomber" Theodore Kaczynski and former FBI agent and Soviet spy Robert Hanssen.

Shaaban himself protested the restrictions during a phone interview in June from the Marion County Jail. "They treat me like Moussaoui -- worse than Moussaoui," he said. "It's a prison in a prison."

The jail was not enforcing the order. Now that the Bureau of Prisons is restricting his calls, Shaaban's wife, Hanan, is trying to find an attorney who can help challenge the order, said David Dana, the Northwestern University law professor in Illinois handling Shaaban's appeal of his convictions and sentence.

That will be an uphill battle. Published reports show the Justice Department is increasingly using the orders as a tool to incapacitate certain inmates. And federal rulings show judges are reluctant to buck government claims that such steps are necessary to protect American lives.

Federal Authorities Detain 16 Travelers At Houston Airport (HC)

By Armando Villafranca

Houston Chronicle, November 4, 2006

Data submitted by the passengers don't match files

Federal authorities delayed the departure Friday of 16 international travelers, including 15 Mexican nationals, who were boarding a Mexico City-bound plane at Houston's Bush Intercontinental Airport.

A U.S. Customs and Border Protection official said data submitted by the passengers did not match the data on file when they entered the United States.

Under a law that went into effect in June 2005, passenger manifest information for all international inbound and outbound flights must match. Passengers are detained when the exit data, such as passport numbers, do not match those submitted when entering the country.

"The post-9/11 Congress passed a law mandating this manifest information for inbound and outbound flights," said Kelly Klundt, CBP spokeswoman in Washington.

She said Congress passed the law to reconcile exit data with entry data for all international passengers.

The law was part of legislation that led to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security in 2003 and included new requirements to tighten security at airports and along U.S. borders.

Klundt declined to say what information was missing or did not match when the 16 passengers tried to board the 9 a.m. Continental flight.

She could not comment on how frequently this occurs. The problem was discovered during a random check of passenger manifests.

All 16 were allowed to board later flights. No information was available about the passengers or how or when they entered the country initially.

Dave Messing, Continental spokesman, said the airline was unaware of any discrepancy until it was notified by CBP officials. He said the data are submitted to the carrier at the ticket counter and any error is uncovered by CBP officials monitoring international travel.

Senate polls

The latest Rasmussen Reports poll on the Senate race in Tennessee shows Republican Bob Corker with a 53 percent to 45 percent lead over Democrat Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.

The survey of 500 likely voters, conducted Thursday, has a margin of error of 4.5 percentage points.

That result tipped the Tennessee race from "tossup" to "leans Republican" in Rasmussen's "Senate Balance of Power" analysis, which shows 45 Democrat seats, four "lean Democrat," 48 Republican and one "lean Republican" seats. Control of the Senate, according to Rasmussen, now depends largely on two remaining "tossup" seats in Missouri and Virginia.

The latest Rasmussen poll in Missouri has Republican Sen. Jim Talent with a 48 percent to 46 percent lead over Democrat Claire McCaskill. In Virginia, Rasmussen shows Republican Sen. George Allen narrowly leading Democrat James H. Webb Jr., 49 percent to 48 percent.

Spelling contest

"In the 22nd District of Texas -- Tom DeLay's old district -- workers for Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula Gibbs are handing out pamphlets that warn" in screaming all-capital letters, "don't let Nick Lampson and his liberal Democrat allies take away your choice this election," Byron York writes at National Review Online (www.nationalreview.com).

"The handout lays out instructions for writing in Gibbs' name, plus the urgent directive [also in all-caps] 'Remember on Tuesday November 7, vote for Shelley Sekula Gibbs for U.S. representative twice!'

"The twice! part refers to the fact that, to fully support Sekula Gibbs, people who want to vote for her have to first vote for her to finish out the last couple of months of DeLay's term -- she's on the ballot for that -- and then write in her name to vote for her to be the next full-term congressperson from the district," Mr. York said.

"That's where things get complicated. The phrase 'write-in' is not entirely accurate in this race. In most of the precincts in the 22nd District, voters won't write anything. Instead, they will work on a machine -- called the Hart InterCivic Voting System -- in which they will be required to turn a wheel to select letters on a screen."

Mr. York explained that to vote for Mrs. Sekula Gibbs, voters will have to spell the name correctly, including hitting "space" between all three names and "enter" after every character including the spaces.

"It does not take a prophet to see that there will likely be some irregular entries from people trying to vote for Sekula Gibbs. If the race is close, there will be intense fights over every variation of her name entered into the Hart InterCivic system.

"What will be accepted as a legitimate vote and what won't? Texas law says only that 'A vote on an office or measure shall be counted if the voter's intent is clearly ascertainable ... .' What that will mean in practice is not entirely clear. It seems likely that obvious misspellings of Sekula Gibbs's name will count, as will short versions like 'S Gibbs.' On the other hand, in a close contest, Republicans and Democrats might end up fighting over every vote."

Connecting dots

"So, less than a week before the midterm elections, four workers from Acorn, the liberal activist group that has registered millions of voters, have been indicted by a federal grand jury for submitting false voter-registration forms to the Kansas City, Missouri, election board. But hey, who needs voter-ID laws?" the Wall Street Journal said in an editorial.

"We wish this were an aberration, but allegations of fraud have tainted Acorn voter drives across the country. Acorn workers have been convicted in Wisconsin and Colorado, and investigations are still under way in Ohio, Tennessee and Pennsylvania," the newspaper said.

Acorn is the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now.

"The good news for anyone who cares about voter integrity is that the Justice Department finally seems poised to connect these dots, instead of dismissing such revelations as the work of a few yahoos. After the federal indictments were handed up in Kansas City this week, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement that 'This national investigation is very much ongoing,' " the editorial continued.

"Let's hope so. Acorn officials bill themselves as nonpartisan community organizers merely interested in giving a voice to minorities and the poor. In reality, Acorn is a union-backed, multimillion-dollar outfit that uses intimidation and other tactics to push for higher minimum-wage mandates and to trash Wal-Mart and other non-union companies."

Home-grown nuke?

Two leading U.S. nuclear scientists say a team of terrorists with industrial equipment, physics and engineering skills and access to highly enriched uranium could build a crude atomic weapon in the United States for less than $10 million.

Writing in Foreign Policy, the prestigious journal of the Carnegie Endowment, Peter Zimmerman and Jeffrey Lewis add that there is no evidence that al Qaeda or any other terrorist group currently possesses the technical expertise necessary to complete such an effort.

Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden "perhaps has yet to find his Robert Oppenheimer," they conclude, referring to the scientist who led the World War II Manhattan Project to build the atomic bomb.

The article follows revelations that U.S. intelligence agencies posted on the Web documents from ousted Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein's nuclear-weapons program that include detailed charts, diagrams, equations and lengthy passages about technical challenges.

But some analysts told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that they were deeply skeptical of the Foreign Policy article.

Arms-control specialist Milton Leitenberg of the University of Maryland called the scenario "super-optimistic," and said the authors had glossed over the difficulty of finding the kinds of highly qualified specialists the project would need.

"How does that kind of organization find those kinds of people, in the real world?" he asked.

Kerry's dream

"Many months ago, I penned a column asking John Kerry to go away, or at least back to the U.S. Senate to pursue elder statesmanship instead of further national political ambition," John Brummett writes in the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

"Alas, he has not done so," Mr. Brummett said. "So, the Democrats must try to win the midterm elections while carrying Big John on their backs as they endeavor to extract his big foot from his big mouth. I'm not sure they have either the strength or dexterity.

"Apparently Kerry carries the notion that Hillary Clinton won't run for president or can't win and that Barack Obama's bright flame will flicker. Apparently he carries the notion that -- Evan Bayh, John Edwards, Wes Clark and Bill Richardson aside -- he would then naturally ascend to carry his party's banner again. ... The problem is that there usually are sound reasons a politician loses an election. It's probably that he's not a good candidate. That was, and remains, Kerry's problem."

GOP Rep. Faults White House On Iraq Site (AP-Y)

AP, November 6, 2006

House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra criticized the Bush administration on Sunday for its handling of a trove of once-secret documents from Saddam Hussein's covert nuclear program disclosed on a federal Web site.

Hoekstra, R-Mich., complained the U.S. intelligence community hadn't properly declassified the documents.

"Well, you know, we have a process in place. It looks like they screwed up," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

President Bush's director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, ordered the documents posted on the site last March, at the request of Republicans in Congress who wanted to show Saddam was a real threat.

Scientists at a federal lab raised concerns that the site, as a repository for millions of pages the U.S. government found in Iraq the past 15 years, held sensitive nuclear information. Negroponte abruptly shut the site down Thursday night after The New York Times contacted his office for an article published Friday.

His office began reviewing the consequences, including who accessed the documents. Four Democratic senators demanded he also tell them why and how the site began, what role members of Congress played and whether the administration ignored U.S. intelligence officials' concerns.

"How valuable that information was, I really don't know," Hoekstra said. "Now we release — or they inadvertently release some of these documents and they show that the Iraqi program may be much further along than anybody ever anticipated."

Hoekstra said his committee would review the documents to determine the former Iraqi leader's goals and capabilities before the war in 2003.

Documents: To Saddam, From Mars (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - National Intelligence Director John Negroponte shut down a government Web site after the disclosure that it had posted nuclear-research documents from Iraq's pre-Gulf War I weapons program. Set up in March at the insistence of congressional GOPers, the site was designed to post documents seized by the U.S. military in Iraq. But many were trivial memos and oddball letters: a telephone-repair request from an Iraqi military agency, copies of the 1987 Baghdad phone book, an Islamic Web-site article claiming the United States was developing weapons designed to sexually arouse soldiers, a 2001 letter to Saddam Hussein from a woman seeking money to preserve the planet "Iquestra" (she described herself as a commander of the Martians).

Why were taxpayer dollars spent on such a project? Late last year House intel-committee chair Pete Hoekstra and Senate intel chair Pat Roberts pressed Negroponte's office to make the Iraqi docs available. They and others, including The Weekly Standard magazine, said the material might show Saddam did have WMD or ties to Al Qaeda. So the Defense Intelligence Agency began to review 48,000 boxes of material, located in a U.S. military warehouse in Doha, Qatar, and started posting it on an Operation Iraqi Freedom Web site. DIA spokesman Don Black said several hundred analysts, linguists, translators and contractors took part, weeding out diplomatically sensitive docs or those mentioning the names of U.S. persons (a potential violation of the U.S. Privacy Act).

Outside of a few conservative bloggers, the Web site got little attention until The New York Times revealed last week that the site had posted documents showing diagrams and drawings from Iraq's early-'90s nuclear program that might be useful to those seeking to develop a bomb. Negroponte closed the site. Meanwhile, Black admits no docs have turned up altering the postwar intel view that Saddam had no WMD and no working relationship with Al Qaeda at the time of the 2003 U.S. invasion.

Trailers, Secrets And Los Alamos (NSWK)

By John Barry And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091161

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - It began as a routine police call. At 4:16 p.m. on Oct. 17, two Los Alamos County police officers were dispatched to the Royal Crest Trailer Park. The cluster of mobile homes is located next to Los Alamos National Laboratory, the sprawling New Mexico compound that houses one of America's two main facilities for designing nuclear weapons. A resident had complained that two neighbors were shouting at each other and throwing rocks through the windows of their trailer. The cops expected to find the usual: a domestic dispute that had gotten out of hand. Instead, they discovered what one Los Alamos official—who, like all lab and government sources in this story, would not be named talking about sensitive matters—calls "potentially the greatest breach of national security" in decades.

When the police entered the trailer, they found 20-year-old Justin Stone and his girlfriend. Stone said he was a guest of the trailer's owner, 23-year-old Jessica Quintana, who wasn't there at the time. Stone was wanted on a probation violation from an earlier crime. So the police arrested him. When they later got a search warrant, the cops found what appeared to be the makings of a crude personal crystal-meth lab. (Stone later pleaded no contest to possession of drug paraphernalia.) Among the dozens of items they hauled away were three computer thumb drives—the small storage devices that plug into a USB port and can hold hundreds of megabytes of data.

The police plugged the memory sticks into their computers. They found more than 400 pages of classified documents downloaded from Los Alamos computers, some containing sensitive data on nuclear-weapons design. A quick check revealed that Quintana had until recently been employed by a contractor at Los Alamos. A file clerk who worked in the lab's document-storage vaults, her job was to scan aging paper documents into a modern digital format. The police called the FBI, which discovered another cache of nuclear documents: 456 paper pages, many stamped SECRET—RESTRICTED DATA.

Quintana has not been arrested or charged with any crime. Her lawyer, Steven Aarons, told NEWSWEEK that she took all the material home one afternoon in early August because she was under deadline pressure to create an index of what she had digitized. When she was finished, Aarons says, Quintana intended to destroy the material. "She wanted to take it to a shredder ... She never did so."

Recently, a series of humiliating security failures—vanishing computer hard drives, unauthorized downloads of secret data—have tarnished the lab's once vaunted reputation. Those lapses were supposed to have been fixed. Panicked officials are now trying to determine how a low-level clerk was able to walk out of a high-security facility with hundreds of pages of nuclear secrets.

The brief answer: laxness and budget cuts. Though she had completed only one semester of college, in early 2005 Quintana was granted what the nuke world calls a "Q clearance," which meant she had access to nuclear-weapons designs. She had further access to a category of information code named Sigma 15. This meant she could handle material detailing how to override the security locks on U.S. nuclear weapons. The vaults she worked in contained data from 50 years of nuclear tests.

Multiple layers of security supposedly protect such sensitive material. The lab's hard drives are locked in cages to keep someone from plugging in, say, a thumb drive. To prevent temptation, clerks are supposed to work with a partner.

But those protections seem utterly to have failed. Aarons says that Quintana had a partner, but the company she worked for saved money by having them work separately. Quintana was able to insert the thumb drive she kept on her key chain into a caged computer because, Aarons says, the cages were never locked. Though employees were supposedly subject to searches, Quintana went home with the documents in her briefcase. Los Alamos officials, while declining to comment on specifics, issued a written statement saying, "The Laboratory is treating this matter with utmost seriousness."

National-security officials will likely spend months investigating and putting new procedures in place. They are fairly certain that everything Quintana took has been recovered. Meantime, lab employees are getting a taste of what it's like to work in a secure environment. The lab has barred workers from bringing in all manner of devices—no cell phones, no coffeemakers and certainly no thumb drives. Not that they would be of much use. The computers' USB ports have now been sealed up with glue.

Breached Lab Data Mostly Low-level (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 4, 2006

Los Alamos National Laboratory said that the classified documents discovered at a trailer park during a drug investigation last month did not include the most highly sensitive nuclear weapons information.

The lab, which designs nuclear weapons, said a "careful and comprehensive analysis" of three electronic memory devices and paper copies of classified documents found in a residential trailer showed that they were mostly low-level secrets that are 20 to 30 years old. It said none of the materials involved the most sensitive weapons information.

The FBI is continuing a criminal investigation into a lab employee who owned the trailer.

HOMELAND RESPONSE

Did Bank Stop A Fraud Or Terrorist? (PHI)

By Mari A. Schaefer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 6, 2006

Upper Darby police don't know what kind of crime they have on their hands.

It could be identity theft.

It could be money laundering.

Or, it could be terrorism.

On Wednesday morning, two men withdrew $8,700 from an account under the name of Shahid Batti at the Commerce Bank on Garrett Road. When they returned later in the day to withdraw an additional $9,700, bank officials became suspicious, denied the transaction and contacted police.

The two men were stopped by Upper Darby officers after leaving the bank. One man produced a passport from Pakistan, a New Jersey license and a Social Security card, all under the name of Batti - and all fraudulent, according to police.

"We have a lot of red flags," Police Superintendent Michael J. Chitwood said yesterday.

He said the man was arrested and charged with theft, receiving stolen property, forgery and other crimes.

The second man, who was acting as a driver, was released and not charged.

During questioning, the man who carried the identification and credit and bank cards identified himself as Raza Hussain from Brooklyn, N.Y. Chitwood said he is no longer cooperating with his officers.

During their investigation, Chitwood said police discovered a "possible" connection between Hussain and a terrorist with the same birthday when they ran the names through the FBI Terrorism Screening Center. He said the FBI and the New York Police Department have been contacted.

"We don't know who he is, where he is and if such a person exists," Chitwood said of Batti. He said the address on the bank account was for Batti Trading in the 6400 block of Market Street, which was a vacant building.

An address for Batti in the 100 block of 54th Street was "locked up tight," Chitwood said.

Bank Customer Stirs Terror Probe (PHDN)

By Simone Weichselbaum

Philadelphia Daily News, November 6, 2006

Something about the chubby middle-aged man didn't sit right with eagle-eyed employees at the Commerce Bank in Drexel Hill on Wednesday.

The customer called himself Shahid Batti and pulled out a New Jersey driver's license, a Social Security card and a Pakistani passport, all printed with his given name.

But bank employees thought the identifications looked fake - and it was the second time in just a few hours that the man wanted to withdraw thousands of dollars from the Batti account.

So the bank called the cops, and officers whisked the man off for questioning.

Last night, Upper Darby police were trying to come to grips with a strange case - one that quickly became twisted with post-9/11 suspicions.

As of yesterday, Upper Darby Superintendent Michael Chitwood said his investigators believe that the man with the Shahid Batti ID cards is Raza Hussain, 44, from Brooklyn.

While local and FBI officials sort out the man's real identity and his motives for living as Shahid Batti, the Commerce Bank customer is sitting in a Delaware County jail cell and has not posted the $100,000 bail, Chitwood said.

Hussain - if that indeed is his real name - is charged with theft, forgery, identity theft and related crimes. Police aren't even sure if Hussain and Batti are different people or the same man.

"There are a lot of red flags here," Chitwood said. "We don't know if we have an identity-theft issue; we don't know if we have a money-laundering issue, or a terrorist connection."

The man known as Shahid Batti owns Batti Trading LLC, which is connected to two addresses, records show. Chitwood said the defunct business was housed in a now-vacant shop on Market Street near Sellers Avenue in Upper Darby.

A woman named Stacey, who declined to give her last name, lives next door to Batti's 54th Street address. She said the moustached man has owned the rowhouse for about six years, was rarely there, and has always been known as Shahid Batti to her.

His home looks like a mosque, with Islamic characters lining the walls, she said.

On Wednesday at about 2:40 p.m. the case broke.

A Commerce Bank employee called police to report a "Pakistani male attempting to withdraw $9,700... from an account under the same of Shahid Batti," court records said.

Earlier that day, "the defendant withdrew $8,700" from the Batti account, records stated.

The man's request of $9,700 was denied because "of the differing photographs on the defendant's photographic IDs," records said.

Also, the Pakistani passport's insert covers "had been glued down with a different cover. The binding and stiching had been disassembled and appeared to have a new insert glued on," according to case records.

The Social Security card "was observed to have the seal of the 'Dept. Health and Human Services,' and not the legitimate seal of the Social Security Administration," records said. And the N.J. license did not appear to have the "normal hologram."

Cops found the man calling himself Batti and his driver, Zafar Mian, in a car and took them back to the police station. Batti told investigators that his real name was Raza Hussain, born Jan. 1, 1962, and that he lived in Brooklyn.

After that admission, Hussain stopped talking with police, Chitwood said. His driver was let go.

Police then alerted the FBI and checked whether Hussain's was on the nationwide terrorism list. Upper Darby police also contacted the New York Police Department's counter-terrorism bureau to learn more about Hussain's Brooklyn address, Chitwood said.

But FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Hussain "is not on the FBI terrorist-watch list, and has no known ties to terrorists. The Philadelphia FBI will continute their investigation to determine his true identity."

Heinz Field Arrests Spur Terror Response (PPG)

By Gary Rotstein And Nate Guidry, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 6, 2006

CMU students tried to enter stadium in middle of night; bond set at $1 million

Two Carnegie Mellon University students caught trying to sneak into Heinz Field in the middle of the night -- purportedly to film a music video -- prompted an anti-terrorist response that included pumped-up security at yesterday's Steelers game against the Broncos.

The two young men were being held last night in the Allegheny County Jail on $1 million straight bond each.

Although explosives-sniffing canines found nothing of interest around the football stadium, an affidavit said the dogs registered two separate "positive hits for explosives" in the Lexus sport utility vehicle the men were driving.

What might have fallen under the prank category in pre-9/11 days was treated as anything but that by authorities, who conducted full searches of the students' apartments and heightened security throughout the afternoon around the stadium on the North Shore.

"We take everything seriously, especially in today's light," Pittsburgh Police Chief Nate Harper said at a morning news conference, while the suspects were still being questioned by agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Force.

Arrested outside Heinz Field around 2 a.m. yesterday were Sudeep Paul, 21, of Woodbury, N.Y., and Anand Shankar Durvasula, 20, of Morgan Hill, Calif. Chief Harper said they are U.S.-born. Both were charged with criminal conspiracy, and Mr. Durvasula with criminal trespass. The $1 million straight bond has to be paid in full for release.

Heinz Field security officers spotted the men on a security camera trying to enter the stadium, a Steelers spokesman said. They first opened an exterior door at Gate B without going inside, police said. They then took a folding chair to the fence at Gate 5 on Art Rooney Drive, and Mr. Durvasula allegedly stepped up on the chair to scale the fence.

Heinz Field security officers then approached the pair, and as they tried to walk away, they were apprehended by Pittsburgh police officers who had been summoned. They told police initially they were trying to check out the stadium because they had tickets to yesterday's 4:15 p.m. game against the Denver Broncos, Chief Harper said.

He said they told investigators later that Mr. Paul was trying to complete a music video featuring Mr. Durvasula, and they intended to do the last scene inside Heinz Field. A video camera and tripod were found inside the vehicle, parked nearby, which police towed away.

The affidavit said the vehicle was registered to Paul Swapan Kumar, 41, of Woodbury, N.Y., but it could have meant Kumar Paul, as police initially referred to Sudeep Paul as Paul Sudeep.

"We don't know exactly what their intentions were," Chief Harper said. But, he said, it was unwise for them to attempt to break into the stadium at about 2 a.m. There was no evidence the men had been drinking, he said.

Kumar Paul, who was unaware of the son's troubles, said he gave his son the Lexus.

"He's such a good kid," said Mr. Paul. "He's a bright student and an honor student."

Last month, a Wisconsin man was charged with making a terrorist threat over the Internet for threatening that radioactive "dirty bombs" would be detonated at seven football stadiums.

The nature of yesterday's incident led to extra precautions surrounding the Steelers-Broncos game, which was played without incident. Chief Harper said the quick response that resulted in the men being detained showed that security arrangements "are very well up to speed," and not something to worry the public.

"We have taken steps to make sure Heinz Field is secure," Chief Harper said. "We have brought in extra canine dogs from Lawrence, Mercer and Beaver counties to conduct a sweep of the facility. ... We have brought in additional officers as well as state police, county police and the FBI."

Steelers spokesman Dave Lockett said fans attending the game were to receive the same kind of pat-downs from security staff as is customary for all games. He said it was the first such incident he was aware of at Heinz Field, and fans should still feel safe in attending.

"The only thing that needs to be said was that the security system worked in getting things done quickly," Mr. Lockett said.

Police described the two men as cooperative throughout, agreeing to a police search of their off-campus residences in Squirrel Hill.

A Carnegie Mellon spokeswoman declined comment on the incident, other than to confirm both men are seniors at the school, with Mr. Paul a business student and Mr. Durvasula in the humanities and social sciences program.

University-related Web sites suggest that both men have been active, involved students. Mr. Paul is listed as activities director of the Undergraduate Finance Association, and Mr. Durvasula as a committee chairman of the Undergraduate Entrepreneurship Association. Both also were involved in Carnegie Mellon's Mock Trial competition, a program in which students take on judicial roles to practice their speaking and analytical skills.

Mr. Paul, on his own Web home page, lists his grade point average as 3.7 out of 4.0. He made the dean's list last spring.

A Former Top Justice Department Lawyer Defends The Post-9/11 Decisions He Helped Make. (WP)

WAR BY OTHER MEANS

An Insider's Account of the War on Terror

By John Yoo

Atlantic Monthly. 292 pp. $24

You should read this book, though not for the reasons the author intends. John Yoo is a law professor who served in the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice from 2001 to 2003. In that capacity, he participated -- often quite centrally -- in the key post-9/11 legal decisions that framed the Bush administration's war on terror, including the Patriot Act, the National Security Agency surveillance program and administration positions on torture, military tribunals and the treatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

In War by Other Means , Yoo delivers on his subtitle. This is indeed "an insider's account of the war on terror." He sets an ambitious goal for himself: "to explain the choices that the Bush administration made after 9/11," choices made "under one of the most dire challenges our nation has ever faced." Yoo is mild-mannered, but he is angry, and his anger pervades this work. He attacks the media, human rights advocates, legal academics, civil libertarians, former attorney general John Ashcroft, the Supreme Court, conservative pundit George F. Will, librarians and even the Bush administration (among others) for cowardice, self-aggrandizement, overreaching, ignorance, dishonesty and cupidity.

At its core, War by Other Means offers spirited, detailed and often enlightening accounts of the decision-making process behind the key 2001-03 legal decisions. Yoo feels compelled to justify them because the Bush administration itself has "often failed to explain clearly to the public the difficult decisions al Qaeda has forced upon us." In some instances, Yoo mounts a persuasive defense of the administration's policies. His account of the Patriot Act, for example, convincingly demonstrates that it was not nearly as draconian as its critics charged and that perhaps "the worst thing about it is its Orwellian name."

Most illuminating about War by Other Means , however, are the arguments that unnerve rather than persuade. Yoo's defense of the administration's decisions about torture, surveillance, detention and due process will send a chill down the spine of anyone committed to the preservation of civil liberties and the separation of powers. Yoo asserts that Bush administration officials acted in good faith, but his reasoning reveals that they frequently acted with bad judgment.

Did you know, for example, that Congress cannot constitutionally restrict the president's authority as commander-in-chief to spy on the American people -- but that it can constitutionally eliminate such surveillance "by cutting off all funds for it"? Or that the commander-in-chief has the unqualified authority to decide "who to detain and how to detain them"? Or that the federal law prohibiting torture forbids the infliction of pain only if it is "equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying . . . death, organ failure, or serious impairment of bodily functions"? Or that the Justice Department's withdrawal of that definition after the revelation of detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib changed nothing? Or that the president in any event has the unqualified authority to use torture? Talk about Orwellian.

Yoo's characterization of many policies is little short of bizarre. He maintains, for example, that Abu Ghraib, the Aug. 2002 "torture memo" (which gave CIA interrogators sweeping legal blessings) and the NSA surveillance program are not really objectionable because the people can always vote the president out of office if they disapprove of his decisions -- without noting that the president attempted to keep these matters secret from the American people. He characterizes the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which expressly prohibits the president from engaging in foreign intelligence surveillance without a warrant, as offering "the executive branch a deal": If the president obtains a warrant, the surveillance will be deemed reasonable; if he orders surveillance without a warrant, "he takes his chances." I don't think so. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act flatly declared it unlawful for the president to engage in electronic surveillance without satisfying the act's requirements. It no more offered the president a "deal" than our drug laws offer pushers a deal: Don't sell drugs, and you won't go to jail; sell drugs, and you "take your chances."

The fundamental precept that drives Yoo's conclusions is his unyielding belief that in wartime, the president -- as commander-in-chief -- is exclusively in charge. Detention, surveillance and torture must all be within the president's unilateral control. Congress and the Supreme Court must defer to the president's judgment.

This is an extreme, reckless and dangerous view. That it has shaped the policies of our government is nothing short of irresponsible. Even U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Richard A. Posner, no slouch when it comes to advocating the aggressive use of government power to combat terrorism, has charged that Yoo's "extravagant interpretation of presidential authority . . . confuses commanding the armed forces with exercising dictatorial control" of the sort exercised by "a Hitler or a Stalin."

In his own way, Yoo has done Americans a great service. Not only has he offered useful insights into the reasoning of the Bush administration, but he has exposed that reasoning to the harsh light of day. His conception of our Constitution -- and that of the Bush administration -- must be resoundingly repudiated by Congress, the courts and the American people. Â·

WAR NEWS

Soldiers In Iraq Say Pullout Would Have Devastating Results (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

FORWARD OPERATING BASE SYKES, Iraq, Nov. 5 -- For the U.S. troops fighting in Iraq, the war is alternately violent and hopeful, sometimes very hot and sometimes very cold. It is dusty and muddy, calm and chaotic, deafeningly loud and eerily quiet.

The one thing the war is not, however, is finished, dozens of soldiers across the country said in interviews. And leaving Iraq now would have devastating consequences, they said.

With a potentially historic U.S. midterm election on Tuesday and the war in Iraq a major issue at the polls, many soldiers said the United States should not abandon its effort here. Such a move, enlisted soldiers and officers said, would set Iraq on a path to civil war, give new life to the insurgency and create the possibility of a failed state after nearly four years of fighting to implant democracy.

"Take us out of that vacuum -- and it's on the edge now -- and boom, it would become a free-for-all," said Lt. Col. Mark Suich, who commands the 1st Squadron, 89th Cavalry Regiment just south of Baghdad. "It would be a raw contention for power. That would be the bloodiest piece of this war."

The soldiers declined to discuss the political jousting back home, but they expressed support for the Bush administration's approach to the war, which they described as sticking with a tumultuous situation to give Iraq a chance to stand on its own.

Leading Democrats have argued for a timeline to bring U.S. troops home, because obvious progress has been elusive, especially in Baghdad, and even some Republican lawmakers have recently called for a change in strategy. But soldiers criticized the idea of a precipitate withdrawal, largely because they believe their hard work would go for naught.

Capt. Jim Modlin, 26, of Oceanport, N.J., said he thought the situation in Iraq had improved between his deployment in 2003 and his return this year as a liaison officer to Iraqi security forces with the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment, based here on FOB Sykes outside Tall Afar. Modlin described himself as more liberal than conservative and said he had already cast his absentee ballot in Texas. He said he believed that U.S. elected officials would lead the military in the right direction, regardless of what happens Tuesday.

"Pulling out now would be as bad or worse than going forward with no changes," Modlin said. "Sectarian violence would be rampant, democracy would cease to exist, and the rule of law would be decimated. It's not 'stay the course,' and it's not 'cut and run' or other political catchphrases. There are people's lives here. There are so many different dynamics that go on here that a simple solution just isn't possible."

Soldiers and officers had difficulty conveying what victory in Iraq would look like or exactly how to achieve it. In some ways, victory is a moving target, they said, one that relies heavily on the Iraqi people gaining trust in the Iraqi security forces and the ability of the Iraqi government to support essential services. In northern Iraq, officials said they expect to hand over major parts of the country to Iraqi forces within the next five months, but most agree that Baghdad will be far behind.

Even if top commanders meet their goal of transferring authority to the Iraqi army within the next 18 months, a U.S. presence long after that is likely, several officers said.

"This is a worthwhile endeavor," said Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, commander of Multinational Division North and the 25th Infantry Division. "Nothing that is worthwhile is usually easy, and we need to give this more time for it to all come together. We all want to come home, but we have a significant investment here, and we need to give the Iraqi army and the Iraqi people a chance to succeed."

Numerous soldiers expressed frustration with the nature of the fight, which many said amounted to driving around and waiting for the enemy to engage them, often with roadside bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs.

"It's frustrating, because it's hard to get into the fight," said Staff Sgt. Robert Wyper, 26, of Riverside, Calif., a squad leader with Bravo Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Infantry Regiment. Wyper rides around the Mosul area in a Stryker armored vehicle. He has fired a total of four rounds from his weapon since he arrived in August, while several other soldiers said they had never pulled their trigger during their deployments. "The combat we have is on the enemy's terms," Wyper said. "You can shoot at the enemy, but how do you shoot at an IED?"

First Sgt. David Schumacher, 37, of Watertown, N.Y., is on his eighth deployment to a foreign battlefield since a tour in Somalia, and his third tour in Iraq.

"The insurgents are more strategic this time, they're smarter," he said. "We're trying to anticipate their next move, and they're trying to anticipate ours. There's still a lot to do."

In Rushdi Mullah, a small farming village near Baghdad, Capt. Chris Vitale, 29, of Washington, Pa., said his unit's recent moves to the edge of this insurgent safe haven have made a major difference for residents. "If my unit left town, the insurgents would come back in and use it to stage attacks on Baghdad," he said. "I'm sure of it."

In the north, where Iraqi army and police units have made strides toward controlling their own territory, U.S. soldiers said they were at a critical point in helping the Iraqi forces develop.

Capt. Mike Lingenfelter, 32, of Panhandle, Tex., said that U.S. troops have earned the trust of residents in Tall Afar over the past couple of years and that leaving now would send the wrong message. His Comanche Troop of the 3rd Squadron, 4th Cavalry Regiment is working with Iraqi forces to give them control of the city.

"We'll pull their feet out from under them if we leave," Lingenfelter said.

"It's still fragile enough now that if the coalition were to leave, it would embolden the insurgents. A lot of people have put their trust and faith in us to see it to the end. It would be an extreme betrayal for us to leave."

Sgt. Jonathan Kirkendall, 23, of Falls City, Neb., said he fears that many Americans think that building the country to viability will be "quick and easy," when he believes it could take many years. Kirkendall, of the 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division in Baghdad, is on his third deployment to Iraq and celebrated his 21st and 23rd birthdays here.

"If they say leave in six months, we'll leave in six months. If they say six years, it's six years," said Kirkendall, who is awaiting the birth of his first daughter, due next week.

"I'm just an average soldier, and I'll do what they tell me to do. I'm proud to be a part of it, either way it goes, but I'd like to see it through."

And Now, Back To The War (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

DOJ_NMG_0091167

The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq. The nation will face an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out. It should begin by considering the leading authorities on civil wars -- Oxford's Paul Collier, Stanford's James Fearon and Barbara Walter of the University of California at San Diego -- even if their thoughts are dispiriting.

The academics' first point is that civil wars last longer than interstate wars. The average civil war since 1945 has lasted 10 years, and the median (or typical) one has lasted seven years. If we date the start of Iraq's civil war in 2004 or 2005, we probably have at least another five years of fighting.

If you believe that the United States can stick it out that long, you must consider what it would achieve by doing so. In three out of four cases since 1945, civil wars have ended when one side has crushed the other. If the United States were prepared to use its troops to force the victory of Shiites or Sunnis, perhaps it could hasten the war's end. But neither side makes for a palatable ally.

The United States could stay in Iraq in the hope that it may be one of the unusual civil wars that ends with a political compromise. This is possible, but the academics do not believe it to be likely. In his analysis of 50-plus civil wars, Collier finds that sectarian conflicts such as Iraq's are harder to end than ideological conflicts such as El Salvador's. Meanwhile Fearon emphasizes that wars in which each side is splintered are less susceptible to negotiated conclusions, because you can't trust the other side to stick to a deal if the other side consists of multiple uncoordinated death squads. Both Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq are divided among competing militias.

Moreover, wars that end in negotiation tend to do so only after the combatants have fought to a standstill. Iraq seems a long way from that: Leaders on both sides appear to believe that, once the Americans are out of the way, they can get what they want by fighting. It may be that neither side will give up this belief until it has been tested. This leads Fearon to the view that U.S. withdrawal is a precondition for the military test that in turn is a precondition for peace.

If Fearon is right, remaining in Iraq actually prolongs the carnage. But even if he is wrong, it's not clear that remaining in Iraq is justified. In the past three months, 241 U.S. troops have died; another five years implies the death of 4,820 Americans, more than were killed in the terrorist attacks of 2001. Meanwhile the U.S. involvement in Iraq distracts from other pressing foreign policy problems. The price of staying in Iraq is high, while the gains are uncertain.

But it is also true that leaving Iraq could prove extremely costly. Fearon expects that withdrawal is likely to accelerate the conflict, unleashing an even more intense campaign of ethnic cleansing of civilians. So if the United States did decide to leave Iraq, it should signal its intentions clearly and give civilians time to sort themselves into ethnically homogenous groups, protected by their respective militias. Leaving Iraq could also embolden U.S. enemies, though the spectacle of the United States bogged down in Iraq might arguably embolden them more. Withdrawal might also allow Iran to establish control over its neighbor, though Iran might find Iraq almost as difficult to control as the United States has.

But the strongest argument against withdrawal is that it might not be permanent. As civil wars progress, they undergo a change: In the first stage people fight because they believe they can win, but in the second stage they fight because there is no mechanism to make a peace deal credible. In a conventional interstate war, each side can retreat to the safety of its own territory and keep its army as a guarantee. But in a civil war combatants are expected to surrender their weapons, even though these are the only things that stop the other guys from massacring civilians. This prisoner's dilemma explains why civil wars tend to be prolonged. It also explains why, when they do approach their end, outsiders are often necessary to put a final stop to them.

So when Iraq's combatants fight themselves to stalemate, some coalition of external powers may have to enforce a peace, and the United States would probably be part of such an effort. Whether it's worth staying in Iraq in the meantime -- and if so, with what level of troop strength -- is going to be the unavoidable debate of the post-election season.

The Case For Dividing Iraq (TIME)

By Peter W. Galbraith

Time, November 6, 2006

Iraq is broken.

Iraq's national-unity government is not united and does not govern. Iraqi security forces, the centerpiece of the U.S.'s efforts for stability, are ineffective or, even worse, combatants in the country's escalating civil war. President George W. Bush says the U.S.'s goal is a unified and democratic Iraq, but we have no way to get there. As Americans search for answers, there is one obvious alternative: split Iraq into separate Kurdish, Sunni and Shi'ite states.

The case for the partition of Iraq is straightforward: It has already happened. The Kurds, a non-Arab people who live in the country's north, enjoy the independence they long dreamed about. The Iraqi flag does not fly in Kurdistan, which has a democratically elected government and its own army. In southern Iraq, Shi'ite religious parties have carved out theocratic fiefdoms, using militias that now number in the tens of thousands to enforce an Iranian-style Islamic rule. To the west, Iraq's

Sunni provinces have become chaotic no-go zones, with Islamic insurgents controlling Anbar province while Baathists and Islamic radicals operate barely below the surface in Salahaddin and Nineveh. And Baghdad, the heart of Iraq, is now partitioned between the Shi'ite east and the Sunni west. The Mahdi Army, the most radical of the Shi'ite militias, controls almost all the Shi'ite neighborhoods, and al-Qaeda has a large role in Sunni areas. Once a melting pot, Baghdad has become the front line of Iraq's Sunni-Shi'ite war, which is claiming at least 100 lives every day.

Most Iraqis do not want civil war. But they have rejected the idea of a unified Iraq. In the December 2005 national elections, Shi'ites voted overwhelmingly for Shi'ite religious parties, Sunni Arabs for Sunni religious or nationalist parties, and the Kurds for Kurdish nationalist parties. Fewer than 10% of Iraq's Arabs crossed sectarian lines. The Kurds voted 98.7% for independence in a nonbinding referendum.

Iraq's new constitution, approved by 80% of Iraq's voters, is a road map to partition. The constitution allows Iraq's three main groups to establish powerful regions, each with its own government, substantial control over the oil resources in its territory and even its own regional army. Regional law supersedes federal law on almost all matters. The central government is so powerless that, under the constitution, it cannot even impose a tax.

American leaders seem to be in denial about these facts. President Bush continually asserts that the Iraqi people have voted for unity, while Condoleezza Rice once told me how impressed she was by the commitment of the Iraqi Kurds to building a new Iraq. James A. Baker III, co-chairman of a congressionally mandated commission tasked with formulating new policy options, has ruled out the idea of dividing Iraq. The most prominent American politician to endorse anything resembling partition is Senator Joseph Biden, who, along with former Council on Foreign Relations president Leslie Gelb, proposes dividing Iraq into three regions while maintaining a "central government in charge of common interests."

U.S. officials are now asking that Iraqis agree to a program of national reconciliation, changes in the constitution to protect Sunni interests, and an oil law that would share revenues equitably. It's instructive that this initiative aimed at unifying Iraq comes from Americans and not the country's elected leaders. A U.S. effort to put Iraq back together would involve endless micromanagement of Iraqi affairs and an open-ended presence of large numbers of U.S. troops. Breaking up Iraq, on the other hand, could provide an exit strategy for U.S. troops, mitigate the worst effects of civil war and give all Iraqis a greater stake in shaping their future. Few Americans imagined that 3 1/2 years after "liberating" Iraq, the U.S. would be presiding over the country's demise. But in a war in which there have never been good options, partition is the best we have left.

Iraq has never been a voluntary union of its peoples. Winston Churchill, as Britain's Colonial Secretary, created Iraq from the wreckage of the Ottoman Empire in 1921, installing a Sunni Arab King to rule over the Shi'ite majority and a rebellious Kurdish minority. Churchill later described Iraq's forced unity as one of his biggest mistakes. In 2003 the U.S. not only unseated the last and most brutal of Iraq's tyrants but also destroyed the institutions--notably the army and the Baath Party--that held Iraq together. The sectarian slaughter that followed the Feb. 22 bombing of the Shi'ite Golden Mosque in Samarra accelerated Iraq's disintegration.

Nonetheless, the U.S. continues to cling to the illusion of Iraqi unity. President Bush's hopes for success in Iraq depend on two pillars: Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national-unity government and the establishment of security forces that are trusted and respected by all Iraqis. But both are shams. Al-Maliki leads a religious Shi'ite coalition that includes parties that operate the death squads that kill scores of Sunnis each day. While he says illegal militias should be disbanded, he has vigorously resisted every U.S. operation against them. The Sunnis in Iraq's government are, if anything, even more extreme. Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the Speaker of the Council of Representatives and Iraq's highest-ranking Sunni, has been closely associated with Ansar al-Islam, an al-Qaeda-linked terrorist group that has targeted Shi'ites and secular Iraqis. He has blamed Iraq's problems on the Jews and has said statues should be erected to those who kill American troops. President Bush has lavishly praised both al-Mashhadani and al-Maliki, but flattery has not produced statesmanship. The real problem is that they reflect the views of their respective communities, which voted overwhelmingly for them.

Meanwhile, U.S. officials speak of Iraq's army and police as if they were neutral guarantors of public safety. Iraqis see them for what they are: Shi'ites or Sunnis who are active combatants in Iraq's civil war. Shi'ite police units have kidnapped, tortured and executed thousands of Sunnis since the Samarra bombing. Sunni policemen are often insurgents or sympathizers. The army, while marginally better than the police, is divided along sectarian lines and is largely ineffective. Whole battalions do not show up for combat duties they don't like. It is not possible to build a national army or police force when there is no nation to begin with.

So what can be done? The most realistic option is for the U.S. to abandon the idea of creating a new, united Iraq and instead allow the country to break apart, enabling each of the country's three groups to choose its own government and provide for its own security. It is possible that Sunni and Shi'ite regions would remain together in a loose confederation, but Kurdistan's full independence is almost certainly a matter of time.

Partition is an Iraqi solution. The U.S. could help make it go more smoothly, but it mostly needs to get out of the way. The Kurds already have their region. Last month Iraq's parliament approved a law to allow the Shi'ites to merge Iraq's nine southern provinces into a single state. The one group that resists dividing Iraq is the Sunnis, some out of nostalgia for the days when they ran the country and others because they reject all that has happened since Saddam's overthrow. But with the Kurds and Shi'ites having their regions, partition becomes an accomplished fact. It is hard to see any alternative for the Sunnis except to do the same.

In fact, the Sunnis may have the most to gain from partition. The Sunni insurgency feeds on popular hostility not just to the Americans but to a Shi'ite-dominated Iraqi government. Most Sunnis don't support al-Qaeda and its imitators, but they often prefer them to Iraqi security forces, which are seen as complicit in the killings of Sunnis. If the Sunnis were to establish their own region, they could have an army and provide for their own security. Since Iraq's known oil fields are in the Shi'ite south and the Kurdish north, the Sunnis do have reason to fear being stuck in the middle with no resources of their own. So, for partition to work, the Kurds and Shi'ites would have to guarantee the Sunnis a proportionate share of Iraq's oil revenues for a period of time, as they have already agreed to do. Over the long term, exploration for oil in the largely unexplored Sunni areas provides the region its best prospect for revenues.

We should have no illusions: partitioning Iraq would not be easy. Some groups would resist bloodily. But the adverse consequences of partition have already occurred. There's no reason to believe that formalizing Iraq's breakup would make anything worse--in fact, it might even help contain the violence. It's useful to outline the three main arguments raised against partition and explain why none are as convincing as their proponents portray them to be:

The sectarian bloodbath will get worse. Iraq's Sunni-Shi'ite civil war has already claimed tens of thousands of lives and forced Sunnis and Shi'ites to abandon coexistence. This is tragic and certainly not what most Iraqi Shi'ites or Sunnis want. But once under way, civil wars tend to empower the most extreme elements. Civil wars do not end because the parties get tired of fighting. Rather, they end because of outside intervention or, more often, because one side wins. Partition will not stop the sectarian cleansing in mixed areas, but by giving Shi'ites and Sunnis their own regions, it can avoid an outcome in which Iraq's more numerous Shi'ites completely crush the Sunnis.

Iran will dominate the Shi'ite south. Iran's Iraqi allies already dominate Shi'ite southern Iraq. If the U.S. were serious about countering Iran's influence, U.S. troops would have to forcefully disarm the Shi'ite militias and dismantle the southern theocracies. But this would mean taking on a whole new enemy in Iraq and also require committing more troops. The Bush Administration has no intention of doing either. Right now, Iran's allies control both the central government in Baghdad and the south. Partition would limit Iran's influence to the southern half of Iraq.

A divided Iraq will be destabilizing to Iraq's neighbors. Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbors all fear the destabilizing consequences of partition. But they fear an Iran-dominated Iraq even more. Turkey, Iraq's other powerful neighbor, has a population that includes at least 14 million Turkish Kurds. The Turkish nightmare has been the emergence of an independent Kurdistan in Iraq. But now that it is actually happening, Turkey has responded pragmatically: it is by far the largest source of investment in Iraqi Kurdistan and has cultivated close relations with its leaders. As Turkey's more sophisticated strategic thinkers understand, Turkey and an independent Kurdistan have a lot in common. Both are secular, pro-Western, democratic and non-Arab. Not only will Kurdistan depend on Turkey economically, but it can serve as a useful buffer to an Iran-dominated Islamic Iraq.

For many Americans, the biggest appeal of partition is that it makes possible a relatively rapid U.S. exit from much of Iraq. If U.S. goals no longer include preserving national unity or establishing Western-style democracy, there is no need for U.S. troops in the Shi'ite south or Baghdad. We would leave behind a civil war and an Iran-dominated south, but that outcome would be no different if we were to stay with the current force levels and mission. One overriding interest in Iraq, however, is still achievable: that Iraq's Sunni areas not become a base from which al-Qaeda and its allies might attack the West. With the security that comes from having their own region, the Sunnis might deal more effectively with the terrorist threat, since continuing violence would prevent economic progress in the Sunni areas. While local leaders are now unwilling to fight the most radical elements of the insurgency when the beneficiary is Iraq's Shi'ites, they may be more willing to do so when it benefits them.

The U.S. will still need an insurance policy against the threat of al-Qaeda in western Iraq. This could be accomplished by deploying a small force to Kurdistan, from which the U.S. could readily move back into the adjacent Sunni areas if necessary to disrupt al-Qaeda operations. This force would discharge a moral debt to the Kurds who fought on our side and could help consolidate democracy in the one part of Iraq that turned out as we hoped.

American administrations are instinctively committed to existing lines on the map. But not all breakups are a disaster. Although President Bush's father tried to hold the Soviet Union together, few mourned its ultimate demise. Trying to put back together Iraq, a state that has brought nonstop misery to most of its people for its entire 80-year history and is not desired by a substantial part of its citizens, will only bring about more pain and blood for Americans and Iraqis. If the country's people are to be saved, the only choice is to end Iraq. [This article contains maps and diagrams. Please see hardcopy of magazine.] THE GREAT DIVIDE

Iraq is checkered by different religions and ethnicities, its history marked by forced relocations and bloody conflict. The current Sunni-Shi'ite war has once again changed the demographic map of Iraq, leading some to call for the country to be split into three states. Looking For Light In Iraq (USNEWS)

By Linda Robinson

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

Samir Sumaidaie, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, is under no illusions about the difficulty of achieving peace in his country. His deputy chief of mission has lost three nephews to the violence engulfing the country-two of them killed by Shiite militia members when they went to a Baghdad hospital to retrieve wounded neighbors, the third by Sunni insurgents while visiting a cemetery to mourn one of the dead. "Extremists have a way of finding reasons to continue fighting," says the gray-haired engineer, who was ambassador to the United Nations before coming to Washington last April. But he has not lost hope.

Obscured by the reports of spiraling violence and the latest contretemps between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. officials is the surprising fact that the Iraqi government itself has laid out a timeline for dealing with the most contentious issues tearing the country apart. Achieving a timeline is not the same thing as reaching substantive agreement on solutions, but it may provide the kickstart for a last-ditch attempt to avoid fullblown civil war-and if deadlines matter, it is a measuring stick of the Iraqis' own making.

"Outlaws." Two months ago, the Political Council for National Security-which includes the prime minister, the president and vice presidents, the head of parliament, and their deputies-agreed on 15 items to be accomplished between September 2006 and March 2007, ending with a referendum on constitutional amendments. The timetable has already slipped by a month, but they have made progress on two key items: The parliament passed a foreign investment law last month and is debating legislation on how the oil industry will be run and profits divided among the Shiite, Sunni, and Kurdish populations. Sumaidaie expects the measure to pass this month. The next item is revising the de-Baathification process that drove many former regime bureaucrats and soldiers into the insurgency rather than offering them incentives to support the new government.

By all accounts, the toughest items on the agenda are those slated for December, when a law offering amnesty to Sunni and Baathist insurgents and demobilizing militias is supposed to be passed. A U.S. defense intelligence official with long experience in Iraq seriously doubts whether Iraq's Shiite-majority government will offer a genuine olive branch to Sunni insurgents, whom it deeply mistrusts, or defang the Shiite militias that, to many senior Iraqi officials, are the clearest means for ensuring Shiite dominance over Iraq. He points to the fate of Iraq's 8th Division general who dared to confront the powerful Shiite militia of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in the city of Diwaniya: A Sadr official was appointed to investigate him. And, the U.S. official warns, "Without really reaching out to the former regime members who are in Damascus supplying guidance to the insurgency groups and having a real amnesty ... this is not going anywhere."

Maliki, says Sumaidaie, wants to pursue a "holistic" approach against the militias, which are made up of criminals, political figures, and unemployed youths, a strategy "based on peeling all these layers off one at a time." He cites Sadr's recent public denunciation of specific "outlaw" militia leaders as "an important step toward breaking the problem up into manageable chunks." Ultimately, Sumaidaie says, "the question must be put to Moqtada [al-]Sadr, 'What kind of Iraq do you want ... a divided country ruled by warlords [or] a thriving country?'"

Whose Idea Was This? (TIME)

By Adam Zagaorin

Time, November 6, 2006

In a war effort marred by poor planning and misjudgments of the local scene, this move just about took the cake. Someone in the U.S. military thought it was a good idea to send Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler convicted of abusing detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, back to serve again in Iraq. What's more, his unit's job was to help train Iraqi police, a curious assignment for a military policeman caught in photographs distributed worldwide doing just the sort of thing peace officers should never do.

Cardona knew it was a terrible idea. Shortly before he left Fort Bragg, N.C., for the Middle East, he told a close friend and family members that he was returning against his wishes but felt dutybound to accept the deployment. The friend said Cardona described trying to attach another soldier's name tags to his uniform in hopes of concealing his identity from Iraqis but was told by a superior to desist. According to this friend, Cardona said he had told at least one of his superiors that he feared for his safety in Iraq. Cardona's name can be referenced almost instantly on the Internet, and his photo appears in at least one al-Qaeda propaganda video.

Still, it was not until TIME.com reported last week that Cardona was on his way to Iraq that the military reconsidered his posting. The morning after the story broke, the Pentagon said in a statement that Cardona's movement into Iraq from a staging area in Kuwait had been "stopped." Hours later, it said he would return to Fort Bragg immediately.

By reversing course, the Army stanched the p.r. damage, but some harm had already been done. On hearing the news that Cardona was in Kuwait awaiting transfer to Iraq, Maryam al-Rais, a member of the Iraqi parliament, lamented, "This is just the latest in a long list of insults to Iraqi dignity by the Americans." A Western official in Baghdad said he had received several angry calls from Iraqi political figures expressing "cold fury" at what they interpreted as American arrogance and insensitivity. The timing of Cardona's return could not have been worse. Anti-American sentiment is at an all-time high; opinion polls show that most Iraqis, regardless of sect or ethnicity, want the U.S. forces out. The Abu Ghraib scandal still resonates strongly among Iraqis. Those who resent the U.S. presence never tire of using it as a flogging horse. Even today, statements and videos issued by insurgent groups and jihadi organizations routinely cite Abu Ghraib as proof of the U.S.'s malign intentions in Iraq. Even America's allies in Iraq often bring up the scandal as proof of how little the U.S. understands the country. Many Iraqis will admit that their own security forces treat prisoners at least as badly, but they point out that their government doesn't lecture the world about human rights. The punishment meted out to Americans found guilty of atrocities at Abu Ghraib, Iraqis complain, was too lenient.

Cardona, who served as a dog handler at Abu Ghraib in 2003 and '04, was convicted this past May of dereliction of duty and aggravated assault, the equivalent of a felony in the U.S. civilian justice system. The prosecution demanded prison time, but a military judge instead imposed a fine and reduction in rank. Though Cardona was not put behind bars, he was required to serve 90 days of hard labor at Fort Bragg. He has since regained his rank of sergeant. Speaking to TIME while Cardona was in Kuwait, Army public affairs specialist Major James Crabtree, who is assigned to the 18th Airborne Corps at Fort Bragg, which has responsibility for Cardona's unit, said his company "happens to be deployed to Iraq, so he went with them." Crabtree quoted the Army commander overseeing the transfer as saying, "There were no issues associated with [Cardona's new] deployment." Assigning Cardona to Iraq again, commented retired General Barry McCaffrey, who commanded a division in the first Gulf War, "represents appallingly bad judgment."

According to a close friend with whom Cardona spoke just before his departure, the soldier was worried that not only he but also comrades serving with him could become targets for insurgents. The Iraqi police, whom the company was assigned to train, have been the target of frequent assassination attempts and, according to U.S. intelligence, are heavily infiltrated by insurgents. The Pentagon's last statement about the sergeant's return to Fort Bragg said he would be assigned duties that would allow him "to be a productive member" of the Army. Iraq: A New Enemy Emerges—'The Shiite Zarqawi' (NSWK)

Newsweek, November 6, 2006

Nov. 13, 2006 issue - Ever since the radical Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr joined the Iraqi government, his power on the streets has been slipping. Now U.S. and Iraqi officials worry that even more violent men might be taking up his mantle. One name has come up again and again: Abu Deraa, sometimes called "the Shiite Zarqawi." Abu Deraa and the death squad he runs have been waging a campaign of Shia terror across the city. He is suspected of torturing and killing scores of Sunnis in a bloody wave of ethnic cleansing in neighborhoods across Baghdad. U.S. officials believe Abu Deraa is responsible for the capture of a U.S. Army translator who disappeared two weeks ago while leaving the fortified Green Zone and remains missing. Abu Deraa "is a brutal, loathsome character," says a senior U.S. official who asked not to be identified by name because of the sensitive nature of the topic. "He is definitely a guy we'd like to see not around anymore."

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki hasn't made the job of hunting him any easier. Last week U.S. forces launched a massive raid in Sadr City, targeting Abu Deraa. The attack reportedly killed two of his sons, but he escaped. Concerned about the political implications, Maliki ordered U.S. troops to end the assault and then dismantle the checkpoints they had set up to net Abu Deraa if he tried to slip away. Maliki insists he would like to see Abu Deraa and other insurgents like him brought to justice—but he wants the United States to let him handle it his own way, by relying on Moqtada al-Sadr to clear out the death squads. "What the prime minister is doing—if it works it would be quite good," U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad tells NEWSWEEK.

But it's a gamble. The son of a fishmonger from one of the poorest slums of Sadr City, Abu Deraa (real name: Ismael Hafidh) has capitalized on Iraq's sectarian hatreds and won support among some Shiites as a defender of the faith. "What Abu Deraa does is just a reaction for what is being done by the mobs that kill innocents," says Abu Ali, 46, a Shiite policeman who has met and worked with Abu Deraa. For now, U.S. officials are reluctantly going along with Maliki's plan to let Sadr deal with Abu Deraa. Privately, however, the officials fear that Maliki can't really rely on militia groups like the Mahdi Army, which has ties to the most brutal death squads, like the one Abu Deraa runs. "[Al-Sadr] has been a violent militia leader for more than three years," says the U.S. official. "It's going to take more than statements to convince me that he's not still got one foot in the violence." Or that he could stop the bloodshed, even if he wanted to.

Two Texans In Trouble (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

At the White House, they call it the "V" word. Vietnam. It is the historical parallel that the Bush administration dreads most, because of fears that comparisons with the bitter, bloody Southeast Asian conflict will cast even more doubt on the conduct of the war in Iraq today. "Entirely different situations," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow told U.S. News.

But the idea that Iraq increasingly resembles Vietnam in some important ways appears to be gaining credibility among historians, pundits, and, most important, the public. While 50 percent of Americans think the United States will avoid another Vietnam-which was far more costly in terms of human life and military spending-40 percent think the United States is "heading for the same kind of involvement in Iraq as it had in the Vietnam War," according to a Washington Post/ABC News poll taken in mid-October. President Bush fueled the debate last month when he agreed that the current spike in Iraqi violence reminded him of the Tet offensive in 1968. That's when attacks across Vietnam seemed to under-mine President Lyndon Johnson's claims that there was light at the end of the tunnel. Bush conceded that, in a similar manner, Iraqi insurgents may be trying to break America's will today.

The comparisons will only intensify as Bush prepares to visit Vietnam for a high-profile economics conference next week and as frustrations with the course of the war in Iraq grow. "People see Iraq as an echo of the experience of Vietnam," says historian Robert Dallek, biographer of President Johnson, who escalated the Vietnam War in the mid- and late 1960s. "We got trapped there in a quagmire. And today, there is a sense once again that, like Vietnam, we are caught in a trap of our own making, and there is no way out."

Such assessments are vigorously challenged by President Bush and his senior aides. The war in Iraq, they say, is being won, contrary to media reports, and the administration has an effective strategy to eventually turn security over to the democratically elected Iraqi government. White House counselor Dan Bartlett conceded that Americans are frustrated, but he said that's mostly because "they want to know we can win." And Bush is confident of victory, Bartlett told U.S. News.

But those arguments are being aggressively challenged by the critics, some of whom cite eerie parallels with Vietnam. Johnson and, later, President Richard Nixon said they would turn over security to the South Vietnamese, and the plan failed.

It is also true that in each case, America's commander in chief immersed the nation in a faraway conflict for reasons that turned out to be misleading or just plain wrong. In each case, the cost in lives and treasure-and the strength and tenacity of the opposition-exceeded the government's initial estimates. In each case, as opposition mounted at home and abroad, the exit strategy seemed unclear. And in each case, a president who initially sought to focus on domestic issues found his other priorities shunted aside.

Stuck In The '60s (USNEWS)

By Michael Barone

U.S. News and World Report, November 6, 2006

"You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq." Those two sentences, spoken by John Kerry last week, tell a lot about the mind-set of many-not all, but many-Democrats who supported him for president in 2004 and who, as this is written, are looking forward to Democratic victories this week. One thing they tell us is that Kerry's mind-set is still back in the Vietnam era. Today the statement is literally untrue: No one is "stuck in Iraq" unless he or she volunteers, and the educational and economic levels of our military personnel are higher than those of civilians in the same age cohort. Kerry was evidently thinking back to the late 1960s, when there was a military draft and a college dropout could find himself drafted and "stuck" in Vietnam.

Kerry's explanation for his bizarre refusal to apologize for two days and then his grudging off-camera apology was that he was trying to make a joke about the stupidity of George W. Bush (even though Kerry's grades at Yale were slightly lower than Bush's). But his words were not wholly out of line with previous statements by him and other Democrats characterizing American troops as perpetrators rather than heroes. There was Kerry's 1971 "Genghis Khan" testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, as well as his December 2005 statement that troops were "terrorizing" women and children. Sen. Dick Durbin likened American service members to Nazi storm troopers and the Khmer Rouge, and Sen. Edward Kennedy suggested that Abu Ghraib under our "new management" was comparable to Saddam Hussein's regime of torture and murder. Behind all these statements is an unspoken assumption that American service members are incompetent and vicious.

It's unusual in American history for a conflict to be seen by a substantial part of the political class through the lens of an earlier war. Yet many Democrats view Iraq through the lens of Vietnam-or their version of it. Now, as then, they want to see American withdrawal even if that means defeat. Yet Iraq is plainly not Vietnam. There were more than 20 times as many American deaths in Vietnam as there have been in Iraq. And withdrawal from Iraq would be vastly more dangerous than withdrawal from Vietnam turned out to be.

To be sure, our withdrawal from Vietnam was bad for the Vietnamese. There was, contrary to Kerry's prediction at the time, a bloodbath, and the Vietnamese lived under a cruel communist dictatorship. But the dominoes did not fall beyond Indochina because, unnoticed by war backers and opponents, other East Asian states-South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Thailand, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia-were launching a free-market economic boom. The Vietnam War gave them time to get started. These countries had rule of law and in time developed democracies.

Purple fingers. Iraq is not in such a good neighborhood. Nearby are Iran, the leading supporter of international terrorism, busy developing nuclear weapons; Syria, headquarters of many terrorist groups; and Saudi Arabia, where petrodollars are used to disseminate totalitarian Wahhabism around the world. Premature withdrawal from Iraq would give terrorists more space and time to plan and prepare attacks on us beyond Iraq, and a visible defeat for the United States would exhilarate the followers of Osama bin Laden and other Islamofascist terrorists. It would leave unprotected the brave Iraqis who risked death to vote in three elections and held up their purple fingers in triumph.

About all this John Kerry, to judge from his changing positions on Iraq, doesn't seem to much care. Rather, he and his ilk seem bent, as they did in the 1970s, on establishing who our heroes should and should not be. They should not be members of the American military, who are portrayed as depraved or incompetent. They should be the antiwar protesters, the professors and intellectuals, the sophisticated elites who know better than ordinary Americans and the servicemen and women what's in the world's best interest. They should be people who believe that fighting those who want to destroy us only makes them madder and that withdrawal will assuage their grievances so they will leave us alone. It turned out that withdrawing from Vietnam did not cause us irretrievable damage. But will we be so lucky if we leave Iraq too soon?

U.S.-Style Campaigning At The U.N. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

The election news these days focuses on various races for House and Senate seats. But there's another hotly contested race of great, even worldwide, interest: the selection of a new head of the U.N. World Food Program for the next five years.

In this race, there's really only one final voter, outgoing U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan -- though he has consulted with other top officials, especially Jacques Diouf , the head of the Food and Agriculture Organization, and the incoming secretary general, Ban Ki Moon .

The front-runner is the official Bush administration candidate, Josette Sheeran, undersecretary of state for economic, business and agricultural affairs. The post most always goes to an American, but this time there are two in the running. The other is Tony Banbury , head of the World Food Program in Asia.

Banbury, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said last week, "is a very capable person" who worked at the National Security Council in the Clinton administration and stayed on in the first year of the Bush administration. Banbury has supporters within the administration who wanted him to be the official candidate, we're told.

The race has taken on some of the trappings of a real campaign.

Sheeran, formerly a managing editor and 16-year employee of the Washington Times, doesn't have experience running a food aid program, but she's campaigning hard. She's touting her work at State and before that as deputy U.S. trade representative. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been working the phones for her.

She's even put out an attractive four-page campaign brochure -- paid for by the State Department -- with a fine cover photo of her standing in front of a field of grain. "Fighting Hunger -- Management Leadership, Development Expertise," is the campaign motto. "Specifically my platform includes the following five points," she says in the brochure, laying out broad themes to feed the world's hungry.

And much as in a campaign, detractors in the blogosphere have gone negative, hammering Sheeran about her lack of experience and her lengthy membership in the controversial Rev. Sun Myung Moon 's Unification Church, where she got married at one of those mass weddings. She left the church eight or nine years ago, we're told.

Then there was a 1992 article she wrote in the Times about her interview with the late Kim Il Sung , a founding father of the axis of evil. She described the North Korean leader as "presenting the image of a self-confident, reflective elder statesman rather than the reclusive, dogmatic dictator he is usually portrayed as in the West."

"We don't need nuclear weapons," she quoted him as saying. "What is the use of producing one or two nuclear weapons while the big countries have several thousand, several tens of thousands of nuclear weapons? And we don't have a delivery system either." Not then, they didn't.

The oddsmakers say Sheeran gets the nod.At Least He Has Massoud

It's been a somewhat turbulent year for Kenneth Y. Tomlinson , former editor in chief of Reader's Digest and now chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, which oversees the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, Radio and TV Marti in Cuba, and Radio Free Asia.

Back in August, the State Department's inspector general dinged him for hiring a friend as a consultant for $244,000 and overbilling the government for his time. The report also found that Tomlinson had used his office to run his thoroughbred horse operation. The broadcasting board split 3-3 on partisan lines on whether to fire him, so he remains in the job until a replacement is found, which could easily be another two years.

Tomlinson said the allegations were part of a "political vendetta."

And a close look at one of his e-mails dealing with the ponies during work time makes it quite clear that the racing operation was not completely unrelated to his work for the Board of Governors. Sure, the message to "Colleagues" starts out: "Now put a gun to my head and I gotta say that Clement's Scabbard will win the forth race at Delaware."

But he also is clearly focused on international matters, especially when talking about his horse, Massoud. "Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah once told me [the late leader Ahmed Shah] Massoud loved fast horses and that his followers often made gifts of horses to him."

On the move from the White House to Afghanistan . . . The Long, Cost-Free War (NYT)

By Ted Koppel

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

IN the operations center at United States Central Command in Tampa, Fla., there is a wall of television screens, one end of the wall quartered so that four live feeds can be seen simultaneously. The signals originate somewhere over Iraq or Afghanistan. The cameras are aboard pilotless drones.

"Predators," some are called, and predators they are. They can be equipped with Hellfire missiles that are remotely fired by operators in Nevada who receive their orders from Centcom in Florida. The enemy, meanwhile, does much of its killing with improvised explosive devices, the most sophisticated of which are designed in Iran.

Such is at least one face of modern warfare, in which combatants exchange mortal blows by remote control, once or even twice removed from the battlefield. The victims are just as dead or mutilated as those in previous wars, but the notion of violence activated from hundreds or even thousands of miles away is telling.

The Bush administration is trying to deal with a particularly nettlesome problem: preparing Americans for a struggle that may last decades without simultaneously demoralizing them. Centcom's commander, Gen. John Abizaid, likes to refer to it as the "long war," where "long," means generational, with no end in sight.

To the degree that such a war can be fought at arm's length, with a minimum of friendly casualties, it will be. To the extent that victory can be achieved with a minimum of personal sacrifice, the Bush administration will try to do so.

Senior members of the administration frame that struggle in existential terms. They invoke the nightmarish possibility of a 9/11 on steroids — a terrorist attack using weapons of mass destruction, rattling the very foundations of our society. The Bush administration uses that frightening image to justify a new worldview, within which even associating with someone who belongs to an organization on the United States terrorist list justifies prosecution here at home.

This practice falls into the category of what Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty calls "preventative prosecution." It's an interesting concept: a form of anticipatory justice. Faced with the possible convergence between terrorism and a weapon of mass destruction, the argument goes, the technicality of waiting for a crime to be committed before it can be punished must give way to pre-emption.

Set aside for a moment the somewhat jarring notion of recalibrating our constitutional protections here at home while our soldiers and diplomats are given the thankless mission of spreading democracy in some of the most inhospitable regions of the Middle East.

There is a whiff of hypocrisy about conjuring up visions of a nuclear or biological holocaust while urging the American public to go about its business and recreation as usual.

We are advised to adjust to the notion of warrantless wiretaps at home, unaccountable C.I.A. prisons overseas and the rendition of suspects to nations that feature prominently on the State Department's list of human rights abusers, because the threats we face are "existential."

But apparently they are not existential enough to warrant any kind of widely shared commitment or sacrifice, like increased taxes or a military draft to meet the Pentagon's growing need for manpower.

One can share the Bush administration's perception that the United States confronts real threats that will not be eliminated easily or soon, but still find it impractical and immoral to get on with life as usual while placing the burden solely on the shoulders of the young men and women serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, their families and friends.

We are left with the impression that the grown-ups in Washington would prefer to make the difficult decisions for us without involving the courts, Congress or the press. That is precisely the wrong way to go about winning this war. Back when the United States was widely admired, it was for all that was most cumbersome about our democratic process.

America's efforts to transplant democracy elicit none of that admiration. How can they, when we appear to have lost confidence in fundamental aspects of democracy here at home? What has historically impressed our allies and adversaries has been our often flawed, but ultimately sincere, determination to operate within the law — if not always abroad, then at least within the United States.

Does our system require calibration in the context of the Long War? Perhaps. We cannot, for example, expect to know everything our government does when transparency informs our enemies of what they must not know. That, however, has always been the case. Indeed, there are courts and Congressional committees set up for the express purpose of reconciling the needs for secrecy and for transparency.

Furthermore, when officials deem certain crimes (torture, for example) unavoidable in the defense of liberty, those who commit those crimes must still know that they will be held to account before an uncompromised legal system. Congress recently passed a law that ensures exactly the opposite.

It is going to be a long struggle, and we may have to live with whatever adjustments we make to our liberties until the struggle is won, or at least over. Even liberties voluntarily forfeited are not easily retrieved. All the more so for those that are removed surreptitiously.

One might have expected that these issues would feature prominently in the debate leading up to the Congressional elections. They are scarcely mentioned.

Apparently unnerved by the unceasing White House harangue that they are ill suited to waging the war on terrorism, Democrats have largely forfeited the argument that "war," particularly a "long war," may be the wrong prism through which to view the dangers facing the United States.

Those who once argued that the task was one for police and intelligence agencies have been mocked into silence. Democrats have given a wide berth to the invasion of privacy, selective suspension of habeas corpus and the mistreatment of detainees, preferring instead to echo the drumbeat of Republican warnings about terrorism in general.

There is a war to be waged. We should be building protective ramparts around our legal system, safeguarding our own freedoms, focusing on our own carefully constructed democracy and leading by example.

It's too bad that we have so little confidence in the most powerful weapon in America's arsenal.

Is Pakistan An Ally? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

PREVENTING AFGHANISTAN from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. .

Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state.

Islamabad is clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests.

Musharraf told Washington that under the deal, tribal leaders promised to call a halt to the cross-border attacks into Afghanistan in return for the Pakistani army withdrawing from the tribal areas to its bases. Perhaps he didn't expect his Western friends to read the agreement in the original Urdu. According to those who have, Islamabad's official representative signed an agreement not just with Waziristan tribal leaders but with the "local mujahedin" — a vague term — and with the Taliban. The agreement spells the plural of the word "Taliban," which means students, in the Arabic way, as "Talaba" — a ruse that the Pakistanis are using to claim that they didn't actually inhale.

In fact, if President Bush has any red lines left, he should be furious that Pakistan is legitimizing the very Taliban it has pledged to eradicate. It should come as no surprise, we should add, that the Taliban has not kept its part of the bargain. Attacks have multiplied since the deal was signed.

Musharraf tried to make amends by ordering airstrikes on one Taliban-run madrasa last week, triggering a bloodbath and angry protests against the United States. But it will take far more to persuade the American public and Congress of the wisdom of providing Pakistan with $3 billion in military and other aid each year while Pakistani territory, tribal or not, gives sanctuary to Taliban fighters who kill U.S. and NATO soldiers and destabilize the Afghan government.

Enron Prosecutor Lands At Latham (LAW)

By Dan Slater

Law.com, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091177

Sean Berkowitz, the director of the Department of Justice's Enron Task Force in the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and the late Kenneth Lay, will join the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins, the law firm announced Thursday, Nov. 2.

The announcement came on the heels of Enron Corp. co-prosecutor John Hueston joining Irell & Manella.

"I did a careful look around Chicago firms and felt that Latham provided the best opportunities to capitalize on my experience in the Justice Department, and to transfer that into a national and international practice," said Berkowitz, 39, a Chicago native and honors graduate of Tulane University and Harvard Law School.

Berkowitz, pursued by Kirkland & Ellis and DLA Piper, among others, has several ties to Latham lawyers. He worked with John Lynch, a founding partner of Latham's Chicago office, when they represented different parties in General Instrument Corp.'s securities litigation, and with Latham associate Deborah Steiner in the U.S. Attorney's office.

Between his Enron experience and his associate years at Katten Muchin Rosenman before joining the U.S. Attorney's office in Chicago, Berkowitz expects to make a pretty seamless public-to-private transition. "Enron was one of the most complex matters out there, so I don't imagine I'll find anything in private practice that'll be insurmountable from a technical standpoint," said Berkowitz, whose provocative cross-examination of Skilling ignited an unflattering outburst from the fallen executive.

"From the perspective of the skill-sets that I learned in Enron," he added, "anytime you've got a high-profile case where there's a lot of pressure, you come out of it with the feeling that you've been battle-tested and can take any case or assignment."

At Latham, Berkowitz will handle white-collar cases and litigation outside the criminal realm, and also assist transactional lawyers in corporate governance matters. Said Mark Gerstein, a Latham M&A lawyer who worked with Berkowitz when they were both associates at Katten in the mid-1990s: "When directors ask to be counseled on a course of action, they want to know how their actions will be viewed through the prism of a litigator who's going to be representing them, or a prosecutor who's going to be reviewing them. I expect Sean will be sitting side-by-side with me in board meetings, when directors and managers ask what they ought to be doing and how they ought to be doing it."

A Latham team led by Gerstein is representing the Chicago Board of Trade's special transaction committee in the merger of its parent, Cbot Holdings Inc., with Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.

Added Gerstein: "As someone who's watching this office take its rightful place in Chicago, it's nice to see our presence on the CME-CBOT deal followed by Sean joining the firm 10 days later."

Inside Bomber Row (TIME)

By Maryanne Vollers

Time, November 13, 2006

Highway 50 runs straight as a pool cue from Pueblo, Colo., through 23 miles of rangeland and piÃ±on flats before offering an exit to the scruffy little city of Florence (pop. 3,795). Like Flint, Mich., or Orlando, Fla., Florence is a company town. The industry here is prisoners, and the company is the Federal Bureau of Prisons. Twenty years ago, the people of surrounding Fremont County ponied up $160,000 to buy some open land outside Florence, hoping to entice the bureau to build a prison complex as a way to boost the town's economy. Corrections had long been a mainstay in Fremont County; the high desert valley was already home to more than half a dozen prisons. But in the end, Florence got a little more than it bargained for.

The 600-acre Federal Correctional Complex, which was completed in 1994 on the outskirts of town, is a virtual theme park of penal experiences, ranging from a minimum-security camp for inside-traders and small-time pot dealers to the concrete fortress that was built to be the most secure prison in the country: the Administrative Maximum U.S. Penitentiary, or ADX for short. The inmates in ADX Florence include drug kingpins, gang leaders, hit men, snipers and, lately, more and more, international terrorists, including al-Qaeda shoe bomber Richard Reid; mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing Ramzi Yousef and at least seven of his accomplices; and four men convicted of involvement in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa. There are American terrorists too. Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma City bomber, spent time there before being transferred to Indiana, where he was executed in 2001. His accomplice, Terry Nichols, is still at ADX, as is Theodore Kaczynski, the Unabomber. The common thread running through the crimes committed by these men accounts for the nickname given to the highest-security section of the prison: Bombers Row.

Until now, almost nothing has been written about the inner workings of the ADX. Since 9/11, journalists have been routinely denied access to the facility, its staff and inmates. But Eric Robert Rudolph, who is serving life without parole at the prison for the fatal bombings at the Atlanta Olympics and an abortion clinic in Alabama, has written letters to me, the author of a book about his case, and to his mother Patricia Rudolph, who has shared them with me. These missives offer a unique first-hand account of life on Bombers Row.

"It is Ramadan now and the Muslims are fasting," Rudolph wrote in the fall of 2005, three months after he arrived at ADX. "The call to prayer echoes through the halls five times a day giving this place a decidedly otherworldly feel." Although the inmates are isolated in gloomy one-man cells the size of a small bathroom at least 23 hours a day, their chambers aren't soundproof. In fact, the prison is noisy. Rudolph's housing unit resonates with the constant mechanical whir and clank of electronic gates, punctuated by the sound of inmates praying, wailing and shouting conversations in English and Arabic through the walls and vents between their cells.

There are eight cells in Rudolph's "range," and another eight on the level above him. For security reasons, he is not allowed to name his fellow prisoners, but he says there is one American who never comes out of his cell; according to sources outside the ADX, the silent American is Kaczynski. Rudolph says the rest of his neighbors are such nationalities as Egyptian, Sudanese and Palestinian. He writes that his area of the prison is "where they house the political offenders, what they call 'terrorists.'" There are many such men at ADX. The list of Arab inmates reads like a Who's Who of the international jihad. Apart from the bombers already mentioned, there are, among others, Zacarias Moussaoui, the sole individual convicted of involvement in the 9/11 attacks; Ahmed Ressam, arrested at the Canadian border with explosives he had planned to use to bomb the Los Angeles International Airport; and Abdul Hakim Murad, convicted in Operation Bojinka, a 1995 al-Qaeda scheme to blow 12 planes, 11 of them U.S.-bound, out of the sky during a 48-hour period.

A correctional officer at ADX told me that inmates are placed on the same range based on their compatibility. Another clue as to why jihadists are housed together comes from Bureau of Prisons director Harley Lappin's 2003 testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee. He said that his department's strategy was to ensure that "inmates with terrorist ties do not have the opportunity to radicalize or recruit other inmates." They are kept at ADX because, he noted, it's "our most secure facility."

But is it secure enough? For the first decade after the ADX was built, the citizens of Florence weren't worried much about the secretive compound, which is only conspicuous when the sun goes down and its banks of light towers glow against the dark horizon. But when Moussaoui, the crazed 9/11 wannabe hijacker, arrived to considerable media fanfare in May 2006, some locals started to feel as if they were living beside a tempting terrorist target. People weren't so much concerned that someone would break out of the fortified ADX, but rather they wondered what would prevent an al-Qaeda squad, perhaps a suicide attacker, from breaking in. At the same time, they were hearing rumors about internal security problems at the Supermax, as the prison is sometimes called. "There's a lot we should be scared about in this little town, with those individuals up there," said Cindy Cox, the mayor of Florence. "Some think that since they're in prison, they're not terrorizing anyone anymore. But what about their friends?"

The federal complex is located only a couple of chip shots away from a combined golf course and housing development. While the two higher-security prisons there have walled yards, the entire campus is separated from the community by only a single barbed-wire cow fence. State representative Buffie McFadyen, a two-term Democrat whose district includes the prisons in Fremont County, has pressed members of Congress, to no avail, to appropriate funds to build a solid wall around the complex, along with a central guard tower to better protect the center from outside attack. The Bureau of Prisons has already failed four times to squeeze money into its budget to upgrade security. McFadyen has also campaigned to remedy what a federal arbitrator has called dangerous understaffing at the ADX. "The threat comes from both inside and outside the prison," McFadyen says.

Like an anthropologist dropped into an exotic village, Rudolph seems fascinated by the Arab inmates. "They're an extremely fatalistic people," he wrote. "This time must be very rough on them for they have little interest in anything other than the Middle East, President Bush and Islam. But at least they have each other and rattle on endlessly in Arabic."

Rudolph is getting his neighbors to teach him their language. He picks it up one phrase at a time. He wrote his mother, who lives in Sarasota, Fla., that "Kyfa ta Kool," which he spelled out phonetically, means "How do you say ...?" Sometimes the other inmates are eager to communicate with Rudolph, other times they are "sulking or buried in some Arabic hell of depression."

In ADX, the spartan cells are designed to keep inmates from hurting themselves--and their guards. Each 7- or 8-ft. by 12-ft. space contains a molded concrete bunk, stool and desk; a steel shower, sink and toilet, and a small black-and-white TV encased in Plexiglas to prevent tampering. At one end of the cell is a solid steel door, and a small vestibule--for the use of guards when they enter--separated from the living quarters by steel bars. There is one 4-in. by 4-ft. window. Rudolph's is over his bed, looking out on the prison yard. "Through the slit window one can see the sky, but other than this and the few small birds that roost on the prison roof, there are no signs of the natural world."

The inmates have almost no physical contact with other people. Food, mail and laundry are delivered through a slot in the steel bars. Prisoners have a choice of two kinds of meals: the regular plan consists of typical American food: casseroles, hamburgers, blue-plate specials. The alternative is a diet conforming to almost all religious restrictions. It contains no pork and incorporates lots of beans and vegetables. Muslims get special mealtimes during the month of Ramadan, when the observant do not eat during daylight hours.

Prison staff sit in control booths from which they operate the doors and surveil the corridors using sound monitors and cameras. To keep the inmates occupied, they offer crossword puzzles, bingo and Jeopardy competitions through flyers or through a closed-circuit TV channel. "The Muslims are obsessed with the games, they chatter endlessly about the possible answers," Rudolph wrote. The winners are rewarded with a candy bar or a picture of themselves. Being a Westerner puts Rudolph at an advantage in the trivia games, and his foreign neighbors depend on his help. "Moments after they post the questions on Monday morning, the yelling begins. 'Areek, what the answers? Who is President in the War of 1812?'"

Television is another distraction. ADX sources say inmates get basic cable service, although nothing as fancy as HBO, and can choose what to watch, though these privileges can be taken away as punishment for rules violations. Rudolph says he gets 60 channels, including music-radio stations and local news. A special prison channel offers educational shows, courses in anger management and a smorgasbord of religious programs dealing with faiths ranging from Catholicism to the Nation of Islam and even Asatru, the ancient Norse religion favored by Aryan supremacists.

According to Bureau of Prisons policy, the high-risk inmates in Rudolph's unit are allowed visits and phone calls only from their lawyers and from a list of approved contacts often restricted to immediate family members. All communications by such prisoners are supposed to be monitored by correctional staff. But a report by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General released last month faulted the bureau for not properly screening inmate mail and phone conversations at ADX Florence and other facilities. It confirmed reports that after 9/11, Mohammed Salameh, one of the 1993 World Trade Center bombers, wrote a letter praising Osama bin Laden that was published in Arabic newspapers. Salameh and two of his accomplices, also at ADX, mailed out at least 90 unmonitored letters between 2002 and 2004. The recipients included Islamic extremists with links to suspects in the Madrid train bombings; one letter was sent to Mohamed Achraf, alleged leader of a plot to blow up the National Justice Building in Madrid.

Investigators discovered that at the time the letters went out, there was only one part-time Arabic translator on staff at ADX to handle mail checks, which were done at random. The bureau has since hired three full-time Arabic translators for ADX but claims that more funds are needed to fully monitor the communications of all high-risk inmates, particularly non-English speakers.

To cut costs, the Bureau of Prisons in 2005 instituted a policy of shifting staff around within prisons and filling only the most critical positions. The union that represents correctional workers at the ADX charged that this resulted in the facility's being staffed far below the bureau's minimum safety standards. In spring a federal arbitrator heard testimony from ADX staff that some housing units had been left unattended for entire eight-hour shifts. Union officials also charged that posts in what they call the "terrorist unit" were routinely left vacant. According to the union, staff shortages meant that inmates weren't getting meals on time, scheduled phone calls were delayed or canceled, and exercise hours were cut because there was nobody to supervise them.

The inmates, correctional officers say, often turn hostile and dangerous when their basic needs are unmet or their routines are disrupted. "When you start tinkering with staffing levels, you start setting that system off balance, so you start seeing a lot of things popping up in terms of increased inmate assaults and increased threats," says Mike Schnobrich, a union representative who works at ADX. The union documented that since the new staffing policy began in 2005, two ADX inmates have been murdered by fellow prisoners, after 10 years without a killing at the facility; threats to staff increased, from 55 in 2005 to 110 in 2006; and assaults on correctional officers increased nearly a third over the same period, from 30 to 38 incidents.

The federal arbitrator sided with the union and in October ordered the Bureau of Prisons to reduce the hazards to correctional officers. Traci Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the bureau, disputes the arbitrator's findings and denies there has been any problem with staffing at the ADX, saying in a written response to questions from TIME that the facility "continues to operate safely and efficiently." She said that 60 new correctional workers have recently been added to the staff of the Federal Correctional Complex. Union representative Schnobrich maintains that despite those hires, staffing at ADX is still dangerously low.

Rudolph's letters over the past year have reflected increasing frustration with prison conditions caused by staff shortages. He has complained about cold food, delayed mail and calls missed because there was no one available to bring a phone to his cell. When he first arrived at ADX in 2005, the inmates in his range were let out of their cells four or five times a week for indoor exercise and once a week for a break in the yard. More recently they have been lucky to get outside once a month. Rudolph has joined other inmates in filing a complaint with the Bureau of Prisons over deteriorating conditions, but he doesn't hold out much hope that they will be corrected.

It's not easy to unnerve the citizens of Fremont County. Prisons have been part of the landscape since before Colorado was a state--the Colorado Territorial prison dates back to the 19th century, and people are accustomed to the occasional disturbance or inmate escape. In Florence, most folks still don't lock their doors at night. Many have grown up listening for three short blasts from the fire whistle--a signal that a prisoner is loose in the valley. When that happens, some residents simply fill up their car with gas and leave the keys in the vehicle. "It's better than having a fugitive break into your house and take you hostage," says Bob Wood, publisher of the Florence Citizen, with a shrug. "All they want to do is get out of town." Even though he doesn't live in fear, Wood says he's increasingly concerned about problems at the federal prison complex. And he's not alone.

On the weekend before Halloween, 50 people crowded into a community forum in Florence with Colorado's Democratic Senator Ken Salazar, who had just toured ADX to investigate the security situation. A few days later, Republican Senator Wayne Allard made the same trip. Fremont County sheriff Jim Beicker, who is still waiting for a Homeland Security grant to upgrade his department's radio system, expressed his concerns about the flimsy fence surrounding the prison complex and staffing shortages at ADX. "I want to see these issues fixed," he said. "I don't want to have to lay awake at night and worry about problems at the prison spilling over into my jurisdiction."

State representative McFadyen was encouraged that both Allard and Salazar promised to bring up the issue of security in the area in the next Congress. "The correctional officers at ADX work on the front line in the nation's war on terror, and they deserve our support, just like the troops overseas," she said. "Fremont County helps keep the country safe. Now the country should keep Fremont County safe."

From Eric Rudolph's point of view, the ADX is locked down very tight. The procedure to leave one's cell for a rare opportunity to exercise outside, for instance, is an ordeal. Two guards enter the vestibule and order the inmate to strip. After a cavity search, he dresses again and his hands are cuffed through an opening in the bars that separate the vestibule from the rest of the cell. The guards then march him down the corridor, a steel-tipped baton at the ready. When all the prisoners are lined up, they are led to an outdoor recreation area enclosed by 25-ft. walls. If they look straight up through the chain mesh that encloses the top of the yard, they can see a patch of the blue Colorado sky.

The prisoners are placed in chain-link enclosures called "dog runs," one per cage. Their cuffs are removed through a door slot. This is the only time the inmates actually see and interact with one another. "It is awkward adjusting my voice from the necessary yell of the cell block to the face-to-face conversation in the yard," Rudolph writes. "Unlike me the Arabs don't adjust the volume." Rudolph describes how his neighbors pair up in their separate runs and then "walk the length of the cage in unison, back and forth, yelling as they go. If you've ever seen big cats at a zoo, this is what they do as well. They pace back and forth, rhythmically, like a pendulum. Across the yard, this is what one sees: seven pairs of inmates pacing together, all the while yelling in loud Arabic." The words Aiwa, aiwa echo across the yard. Yes, yes.

"When the hour is up, the slow process of moving us back to the cells begins in reverse," Rudolph writes. "And then we sit in our darkened cells for the rest of the week, staring out at the empty sun-drenched yard."

Menino Looks To Replicate Gang Truce (BOS)

By Suzanne Smalley

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

Mayor Thomas M. Menino said yesterday that he is optimistic about the possibility of brokering more gang truces across Boston similar to the one that police, clergy, and youth outreach workers established between two of the city's most violent gangs.

Menino, who credited police and the Rev. Jeffrey Brown with cementing the pact between the Heath Street gang in Jamaica Plain and the H-Block gang in Roxbury, also praised the young gang members who came to the bargaining table.

"You have to give the . . . gang members a lot of credit for wanting to work together," Menino said in an interview.

Jack McDevitt, associate dean of Northeastern University's College of Criminal Justice and a consultant for the Boston police, said the truce could become a national model, in part because Heath Street and H-Block's long, bloody feud gives the treaty more street credibility. He said he plans to recommend the idea to six cities he is working with to fight gang violence under a US Department of Justice initiative.

"It gives some cover to other groups that might feel, 'OK, these are pretty serious folks and they did it so we can do it, too,' " McDevitt said.

The Globe reported yesterday that police and clergy are talking to eight other gangs after quiet talks, culminating in a peace summit at the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and Museum on July 24, led to a handshake truce that has significantly reduced gun violence in the neighborhoods where Heath Street and H-Block are active.

Organizers trying to preserve the truce have offered incentives to gang members, including tutoring, improvements to a teen center, and corporate box seats for a New England Patriots game. Truce coordinators had been seeking donations of Boston Celtics tickets as well; yesterday, Shawn Sullivan, the team's senior vice president for ticket sales, said in an e-mail that he is interested in helping.

Jamiel Brome, 25, whose brother Shavale, 24, was slain in H-Block territory in April 2005, said he doesn't mind gang members being treated to Patriots games, if such incentives save lives. "If it works, it works," he said. "A lot of young kids are dying."

Organizers emphasize that the truce does not give amnesty for any past or future crimes committed by gang members. In October, for instance, Amos Carrasquillo, who was participating in the truce as a Heath Street gang member, was shot by police and arrested after allegedly pointing a gun at police officers. Days later, Carrasquillo and Luis Garcia, another Heath Street member and truce participant, were charged by US authorities for allegedly dealing cocaine.

Organizers describe those arrests as minor setbacks in the truce effort. Since a temporary cease-fire in July, there has not been a single shooting police have connected to either gang, law enforcement officials have told the Globe. The peace treaty has involved assistance from government and nonprofit agencies.

Menino said that City Hall provided summer jobs to several gang members. The mayor also said he personally raised money to pay truce organizer Shakeem Allah -- who had been volunteering.

Menino said he has talked with Brown and with Acting Boston Police Commissioner Albert Goslin about the effort, adding that he is cautiously optimistic it could reduce gun violence in the city, which is on pace to surpass last year's 10-year high in homicides.

"This is community policing -- this is where it's at, the basic roots of community policing," he said.

Emmett Folgert, the executive director of the Dorchester Youth Collaborative, said the truce between Heath Street and H-Block could be a step toward getting youths to leave the gang life. He said much of Boston's gang violence is driven by youths who may want to stop shooting, but believe they have to protect themselves.

"This works when kids want a chance to back down," said Folgert, who has been using truces to limit violence between Asian gangs for several years. "We eliminate one of the main reasons for being in the gang -- you're worried about the other gang attacking you.

"Most of the shootings have been gang-related and that's why it's so hard to get prosecutions -- because the person who's your witness today is your suspect in yesterday's shooting," Folgert said.

FBI Numbers Suggest Manchester Safer Than Most Cities Its Size (NHUL)

By Scott Brooks

New Hampshire Union Leader, November 6, 2006

MANCHESTER – Manchester has consistently ranked among the least violent cities of its size in New England, an analysis of federal crime data reveals.

FBI records show the Queen City saw fewer robberies and aggravated assaults than almost any other similarly sized city in the region between 2001 and 2005, the last year for which data was available. Homicides also were rare.

Altogether, Manchester reported fewer violent crimes in recent years than all but one other New England city of more than 100,000 residents. Only Stamford, Conn., could claim fewer.

"The perception is that violent crime is way up," Police Chief John Jaskolka said. "Actually, our numbers are fairly low."

Officials and residents alike have lately called the security of several Manchester neighborhoods into question, particularly since city police patrolman Michael Briggs was killed by gunfire in the center city last month. Police have since ordered high-intensity patrols in a smattering of hot spots. Many residents, meanwhile, have banded together via neighborhood watch groups.

"Everyone knows in the city that things got real bad this summer," said Chris Leone, who recently formed a watch group on the West Side.

In fact, violent crimes have appeared to spike in recent months. Preliminary figures supplied by the city police department show robberies, aggravated assaults and burglaries are all up over the first eight months of this year.

And yet, data analyzed by the New Hampshire Union Leader suggest Manchester has been safer than most other cities its size. The paper looked at five years' worth of FBI crime reports for eight New England cities whose populations most closely approach Manchester's.

That list ranges from New Bedford, with roughly 93,000 residents, to Hartford, Conn., with 124,000 residents. Manchester's population is estimated at just under 110,000.

The results show Manchester reported an exceptionally low number of aggravated assaults, an average of 90 per year. That's fewer than the number in Portland, a city of just 65,000 residents, and a quarter of the number in Lawrence, Mass.

Manchester also had low incidents of homicides and robberies. However, the city did report a comparatively high number of forcible rapes, averaging 59 per year.

Peter Cordella, chairman of St. Anselm College's criminal justice department, unequivocally calls Manchester a safe city.

DOJ_NMG_0091182

"The real big question now is, is it becoming, at the moment, significantly less safe? And I think the jury is out on that," he said.

Manchester recently ranked 124th on Morgan Quitno Press' list of the country's safest cities. Its ranking fell short of 10 other cities in New England, including Nashua at number 27.

Cordella said Manchester holds several advantages over other New England cities. Household incomes are comparatively high ($50,404 as a median, according to the U.S. census), housing stock is generally in better condition and residents tend to move less often, he said. Those factors generally make neighborhoods more stable.

The recent uptick in crime may seem worse than it is, Cordella said, because the city has not had much crime to begin with. Perceptions, however, are not irrelevant, he said.

"If this is people's perception and they start altering their behavior, then it will become a problem," he said. "That's the critical issue."

Electronic Monitoring Now Includes Sweat Sniffers, Screeching Black Boxes (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, November 6, 2006

Electronic monitors that can pinpoint criminals on a map can now also tell whether they've been driving too fast, drinking or violating other laws.

Courts nationwide increasingly are embracing such tracking of people's behavior as a way to stop them from repeating the actions that got them in trouble with the law, though it remains less common than satellite surveillance of sex offenders.

“This is targeting behaviors that are risky, and I see it being used more and more for behavior modification in public safety,” says Peggy Conway, editor of the Journal of Offender Monitoring. “It's a phenomenally valuable option for judges.”

Among those options:

·Black boxes. A Michigan court has ordered 39 people convicted of repeated traffic violations to have systems installed in their cars that screech when they brake too hard or turn too fast, and keep a tally of the alerts for probation officers. One judge in Tennessee also has ordered a black box installed, says Larry Selditz, CEO of the company that makes the devices.

“It makes me watch how I drive,” says Mark Floria of Walled Lake, Mich., who got one of the boxes after his latest conviction for driving with a suspended license. “It beeped a lot when I started. It's scary because you don't know how many beeps it takes before probation will do something.”

·Alcohol-sniffing bracelets. Courts and prosecutors in 40 states have ordered drunken drivers to wear an ankle bracelet that sniffs their sweat for alcohol once an hour and reports the results to authorities daily on the Internet.

About 4,000 people nationwide are being monitored, says Kathleen Brown, a spokeswoman for maker Alcohol Monitoring Systems.

Authorities embrace monitoring because it's convenient and aimed at the problems that got people in trouble, says South Dakota Attorney General Larry Long. “We're not doing this to everybody. We're doing it to people who have demonstrated pretty convincingly that they are a safety risk to the rest of us,” Long says.

Because of that, few people have raised privacy concerns, says Marc Mauer, executive director of The Sentencing Project, which supports alternatives to prison. But it will work only if it's paired with other steps such as counseling, Mauer says, because “the reason people get in trouble is not because they lack an ankle bracelet.” Otherwise, he says, the problems might resume when the monitoring ends.

Location-tracking is expanding most rapidly, especially for sex offenders. Ten states this year passed laws requiring some or all offenders to be monitored by satellite; at least 10 others had already done so.

Alexander Lockup Fails Children, Report Asserts (ARDEM)

By Amy Upshaw

Arkansas Democrat Gazette, November 5, 2006

An advocacy group that has been monitoring Alexander Youth Services Center for months said Saturday that Arkansas isn’t meeting the mental health, education and special education needs of the children at the troubled facility as required by the U. S. Department of Justice and state law.

Problems at the center are systemic, said Dana McClain, a senior attorney with the Disability Rights Center, a federally funded Little Rock nonprofit that assists disabled Arkansans.

“We don’t think this is rehabilitation, and state law says it is supposed to be [for youthful offenders]. I think it’s punishment,” she said. “I feel like these children are being set up to go to adult prison.”

At some point, she said, the youthful offenders at the lockup will get out, "and you hope when they do they've got a better shot at being productive members of society."

A draft copy of the group's lengthy report detailing "failures" at the center in Saline County was given to the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette on Saturday — a day after the state unexpectedly ended its contract with Cornell Cos. Inc., a Houston company that ran the center for the past five years. An internal investigation found that employees were "inappropriately" drugging youthful offenders with psychotropic drugs to control bad behavior.

The state was paying Cornell about $ 10 million annually.

News about the forced medications, sometimes given without a doctor's order, prompted some legislators and others to renew calls Friday to shut down the state's largest lockup for youthful offenders.

The Disability Rights Center report, which outlines about 50 problems, is expected to be released publicly later this week.

McClain said her group will meet with the Department of Health and Human Services on Monday to discuss the findings. Monitors for Disability Rights have been making unannounced visits, as allowed by federal statute, to the center at least three times a month since March.

"Under the contract these are things Cornell was responsible for providing," McClain said. "I hope [Health and Human Services] doesn't just address that one issue [about the medication]. This is a good time to do more because they are starting anew."

The agency has been responsive so far, McClain noted. Cornell, however, didn't address some of the major concerns that Mc-Clain said she repeatedly talked to company employees about.

Julie Munsell, Health and Human Services spokesman, said her agency has received a copy of the report but she declined to comment about the details until it is published and officials meet with the group's representatives. Health and Human Services is the umbrella agency over the Youth Services Division, which now operates the youth lockup.

In general, Munsell said, the state has made many strides since entering into a settlement agreement with the Department of Justice in March 2003 after a federal investigation found civil rights violations in the delivery of mental-health care, education, fire safety and freedom of religious expression at the center.

Still, more work is needed, particularly with the center's education system, she acknowledged.

"We do still struggle with education issues at Alexander, and we've been working with the Department of Education to improve those issues," she said. "We will always strive to get to an ideal setting, but it will take us time to get there."

The Justice Department hasn't visited the center since January.

Over the years, the youths at the Alexander center have complained that employees kicked, slapped and even threatened them with death. Others killed themselves.

One boy, known for days to be suicidal, was able to hang himself a few years ago with a bedsheet. An investigation later found that his guard didn't check on him.

Another boy hanged himself in the same cell just a few months later — just as the state hired Cornell to take over the facility and fix its problems.

And last year, a 17-year-old girl at the center died of blood clots in her lungs. She complained to nurses and supervisors that she was ill, but they didn't believe her, even as she lay dying, according to a subsequent investigation.

Munsell said her agency plans to work with the Disability Rights Center to address the group's concerns. The Department of Justice couldn't be reached for comment Saturday. During visits to the lockup, McClain said monitors found: Youths watching Harry Potter movies during science class on more than one occasion.

A student sleeping on his keyboard, even though a teacher was sitting at a desk in the same classroom.

No teacher-led reading program, even though at least 50 percent of the youthful offenders at the center have difficulties reading, and in some cases, can't read at all. (An ombudsman who regularly visits the center said the youths are supposed to use a computer-based reading program at their own pace, but he has seen no evidence that such a system has

Secret Jury To Hear Gang Case Summary (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Closing arguments are expected today in a gang-related racketeering and drug-trafficking case in the District in which the judge took the unusual step of appointing an anonymous jury.

Prosecutors say they want the names of the jurors to remain secret because the gang has tried to tamper with the judicial system, including impersonating a law-enforcement officer to kill a cooperating witness.

Gerald Eiland and Frederick Miller are among several men accused of running a drug organization and car-theft ring based in the District. They have pleaded not guilty.

Before the trial, U.S. District Judge Royce C. Lamberth sided with prosecutors seeking the anonymous jury, citing "strong reason to believe that the jury needs protection." The trial began in October.

Defense attorneys have opposed the idea of an anonymous jury, calling the move unnecessary and prejudicial.

Keeping jurors' identities secret "erodes the presumption of innocence," defense attorney John Carney wrote in a court memo to Judge Lamberth.

Anonymous juries were used in the District in the trials of drug kingpins Kevin Gray and Tommy Edelin.

David McCord, executive director of the National Jury Center at the American Judicature Society, said such juries in federal courts are a "relatively new phenomenon," dating to 1977.

Supporters say it's an acceptable practice in high-profile cases or when there are concerns about jurors being threatened or bribed.

"One of the things defendants worry about is since it's so out of the ordinary, jurors will think the defendants are particularly dangerous and they'll have a prejudice against them," Mr. McCord said.

The trial is taking place amid tightened security. Those in attendance must undergo the usual security screening at the door of the courthouse, and must repeat the process when they enter the courtroom.

The case has been separated into two groups of defendants. In an earlier trial, Corey Moore, the so-called "Teflon defendant," was acquitted.

Mr. Moore has been tried multiple times on murder charges, but in each case the charges were either dismissed or he was found not guilty by a jury.

Case Could Change Rules About Officers' Searches Of Laptops (SDUT)

By Matt Krasnowski, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 5, 2006

Computer data private, some say

LOS ANGELES – Michael Arnold appeared disheveled and nervous after he landed at Los Angeles International Airport last year on a flight from the Philippines, so a U.S. Customs and Border Protection officer pulled him aside for screening.

Officer Laura Peng also noted Arnold was traveling alone, court records state. She found a laptop computer in his luggage and asked him to start it. Stored inside, she said, she found images of him having sex with women, photographs of minors in sexually explicit poses and messages indicating he was trying to procure minors in the Philippines.

The 45-year-old former Anaheim schoolteacher was indicted on one count of transportation of child pornography and one count of child pornography possession. His arrest was heralded as a success for the federal government's Operation Predator campaign against criminals who prey on children.

But last month, a judge threw out the computer evidence against him, setting up a court battle in which a man accused of vile behavior could help determine how far border agents can go in searching people's computers and the future of some privacy rights.

It's an issue – spurred by advances in technology, and increased concerns about terrorism and border security – that some legal experts expect will end up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

U.S. District Judge Dean Pregerson ruled the border officer needed reasonable suspicion to search Arnold's computer because the machines can contain vast amounts of private information.

That same suspicion standard is required before border agents can conduct a body cavity search, X-rays or other invasive examinations.

“While not physically intrusive as in the case of a strip or body cavity search, the search of one's private and valuable personal information stored on a hard drive or other electronic storage device can be just as much, if not more, of an intrusion into the dignity and privacy interests of a person,” Pregerson wrote.

Prosecutors contend border officers can search such items routinely, saying the computer search wasn't invasive or destructive but rather a standard inspection of a person at the border that courts have long supported.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Los Angeles, said prosecutors have filed a notice of appeal and will challenge Pregerson's ruling with the 9th U.S. District Court of Appeals.

Pregerson's decision conflicts with a 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision last year that deemed a border search of a laptop computer was reasonable and routine. But that case differs from the Arnold case because agents found that man possessed a photo album containing child pornography before they accessed his computer.

With the appeal, the prosecution of Arnold is on hold and border officers are free to continue searching computers as part of routine inspections.

Border computer searches have raised the concerns of international business travelers, who often fly with private business and personal information in their laptops. A recent survey by the Association of Corporate Travel Executives, which has 2,500 members worldwide, found that 87 percent of its members said they would be less likely to carry confidential business information on international trips after they learned how easily laptop contents could be searched.

Business travelers need to be "cognizant of the fact that U.S. customs takes the position that it has the right to review and download the contents of your laptop and all electronic media," said Susan Gurley, the association's executive director.

But if Pregerson's decision stands and is upheld by appellate courts, it could slap limits on how far agents can go when searching people at the border.

If officers are unable to come up with a significant reason to support the search, "the number of people they would be able to examine would go down appreciably," said Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor.

Kmiec and other experts say the issue eventually will need to be settled by the highest court in the land. And Kmiec said he expects Pregerson will be overturned.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the Supreme Court will review one of these cases," said Shaun Martin, a professor at the University of San Diego School of Law. "The issue is too important and it happens too often to let the results vary depending on what border you happen to cross or what circuit you're in."

Laptop Seizure Raises Concerns Over Firms' Data (LAT)

By James Gilden, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, November 5, 2006

Travel managers worry about what can happen to proprietary information at customs.

It may surprise many air travelers, but your laptop and its contents are far from secret at the nation's international airports. Increasingly, this is prompting new privacy concerns for business travelers.

Customs and Border Protection agents have the authority to search and seize laptop computers belonging to travelers entering the United States, those of U.S. citizens and foreigners alike. And they use it.

But just how far these officers can go in inspecting the contents of an overseas traveler's laptop is being tested in federal court.

In July 2005, Michael Timothy Arnold, then 43, of San Juan Capistrano arrived at Los Angeles International Airport after a nearly 20-hour flight from the Philippines, according to court documents.

After retrieving his luggage from baggage claim, he proceeded to the customs checkpoint. An agent selected him for additional screening because she was targeting single males between 20 and 59 who were returning from Asia.

After some secondary questioning, the agent inspected Arnold's luggage, including his laptop computer. She instructed Arnold to turn on the computer.

When the computer booted up, its desktop displayed the usual assortment of icons and folders, including two folders titled "Kodak Pictures" and "Kodak Memories." The agent and a colleague clicked on the folders and looked at photographs on the computer, including one of two nude women.

Special agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement were called in to question Arnold about the contents of his computer.

He was detained for several hours while they examined the computer, and they found numerous images depicting what they believed to be child pornography.

The agents confiscated the computer as well as a hard drive, some CDs and a flash drive and released Arnold. He was later arrested, jailed, held without bail until this week, and charged with transporting and possessing child pornography and attempting to engage in illicit conduct in a foreign place.

It is cases like Arnold's that have corporate travel managers up in arms — but not because of the pornography connection. Their concern is with what happens to the proprietary data that business travelers often carry on their laptops.

"That U.S. government officials have the right to examine, download or even seize business travelers' laptops came as a surprise to the majority of our members," said Susan Gurley, executive director of the Assn. of Corporate Travel Executives, an Alexandria, Va.-based trade group.

Eighty-six percent of members surveyed said that court decisions allowing government agents to seize computers at the borders were cause to limit the kind of proprietary information typically carried on executives' laptops. Two out of 155 members surveyed said they had an employee who had had a laptop seized.

The politics and the law behind the seizures are complicated, according to attorneys and court documents. The 4th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution protects citizens against unreasonable search and seizure. But the courts have given government agents more leeway to conduct searches at the border than inside the country.

For example, the courts have found that it is acceptable for border agents to search through the belongings of someone entering the country for no reason other than that he or she is entering the country. But if the search becomes more invasive, such as a pat-down or a body cavity search, then agents have to have probable cause.

It is at this nexus that the courts are trying to decide what constitutes reasonable when it comes to a laptop computer. After all, it could contain personal information, confidential business information, blueprints for terrorist attacks or child pornography.

A ruling last month by U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson of Los Angeles in the Arnold case may be the beginning of a shift in the courts.

In his opinion, the judge noted that "the information contained in a laptop and in electronic storage devices renders a search of their contents substantially more intrusive than a search of the contents of a lunchbox or other tangible object."

The court found that "a search of this type without reasonable suspicion goes well beyond the goals of the customs statutes and the reasonableness standard articulated in the 4th Amendment."

"While not physically intrusive as in the case of a strip or body cavity search, the search of one's private and valuable personal information stored on a hard drive or other electronic storage device can be just as much, if not more so, of an intrusion into the dignity and privacy interests of a person.

"This is because electronic storage devices function as an extension of our own memory. They are capable of storing our thoughts, ranging from the most whimsical to the most profound. Therefore government intrusion[s] into the mind … are no less deserving of 4th Amendment scrutiny than intrusions that are physical in nature."

As a result, the judge threw out laptop-related evidence against Arnold retrieved during the search, which may hurt the government's case. The government is appealing the judge's ruling, said Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles.

Arnold still faces federal child pornography charges, but he was released from federal custody this week on $50,000 bail.

The association of travel executives is not concerned as much with the constitutional questions as it is with the practical implications for business travelers.

It has tried to get answers from Customs and Border Protection about its policies regarding the search and seizure of laptops and measures taken to protect sensitive business information on them but has not received an answer to its queries, Executive Director Gurley said.

The Times e-mailed the agency questions including what its policies are regarding the protection of sensitive corporate data.

The agency responded with a statement saying, in part, that "officers adhere to all requirements to protect privileged, personal and business confidential information."

Said Gurley, "Our issue is whether the proprietary business information on the hard drive can be taken. Is it returned? Is it destroyed? We have not received any word from [the agency], not even 'Thank you very much, we have your request.'

"What's so difficult about giving the public this information?"

Lab Delays Hinder Crime-solving (MHCA)

By Julia Reynolds

Monterey (CA) Herald, November 5, 2006

Crimes in Monterey County are going unsolved and prosecutions delayed as piles of unprocessed evidence grow higher in the county's primary crime lab, law enforcement officials say.

In some cases, The Herald has found, more than a year passed before fingerprints were processed, leaving detectives frustrated and criminals walking free.

"The delay in processing evidence is a year and a half," Undersheriff Nancy Cuffney said.

"There have been delays," said Seaside police Capt. Steve Cercone, who sends fingerprints to the lab. "But we do understand that staffing shortages are the reason for it."

The lab is so badly understaffed -- down from five employees to two -- that arrests have had to wait as crimes go unsolved for more than a year.

In one example, a fingerprint was lifted in an April 2005 larceny case, but the print was not processed until June 2006. In the interim, investigators say, the same man had moved on from nonviolent fraud to carjacking.

"It does affect public safety," said Cmdr. Malcolm Gray, head of investigations at the Monterey County Sheriff's Office. "If we can't get evidence to help ID suspects, to tie suspects to cases, people are out on the street longer than they should be."

Detectives around the county complain that backlogs in the forensic services crime lab mean arrests aren't being made when they should.

Law enforcement personnel described cases such as a 12-month delay in running fingerprints for an attempted murder case.

The Herald asked the Sheriff's Office whether specific cases have been affected by the delays. After initial assurances of cooperation, sheriff's officials, including Sheriff Mike Kanalakis, opted not to provide case details or allow interviews with lab staff.

Staffing levels|

Hidden in a small, crowded room in the sheriff building's basement on Natividad Road, the lab is mostly invisible to the general public. Several desks take up space but sit empty.

Staffing levels at the lab have fallen from five full-time staff members to two in little more than a year. One position was eliminated, and two vacancies have remained unfilled.

But the work done in that small room is critical to the county's criminal justice system.

The lab processes serious crime evidence from across the county for the Sheriff's Office, and handles the latent fingerprint work for Seaside, Pacific Grove, Monterey and Marina police departments. The city of Salinas has its own forensic evidence department.

Latent print work is a skilled specialty. Unlike the inked prints taken at the Department of Motor Vehicles, latent fingerprints can usually be seen only after certain chemicals are applied. As such, they are fragile things.

A latent print examiner must not only be an expert at processing, preserving and identifying prints, but be skilled at presenting "expert witness" testimony in court.

On top of that, for an identification to be considered valid, a print must be verified by more than one examiner.

With only two full-time print examiners on staff, that often means long hours for lab supervisor Victor Lurz and evidence technician Georgine Scott, both of whom are on call 24 hours a day, according to police agencies that work with the lab.

Officials warn that public safety has been compromised by the backlogs, and not only because arrests have been delayed.

Gray said prosecutors are reluctant to file charges if the forensic evidence isn't ready.

"Even the cases that we file (with the District Attorney) -- if we can't get the evidence fast enough, they kick the cases back to us," Gray said.

"This happens all the time," said Chief Assistant District Attorney Terry Spitz. "When we get into the more serious felonies, we're going to be sending back memos -- 'Please run that out to the lab.'"

Assistant District Attorney Berkley Brannon said he wasn't aware of any complaints from prosecutors about the delays, but said his office often waits to file charges when forensic evidence is lacking.

Spitz said that in misdemeanor cases, a suspect might even be released, at least until the evidence comes in.

"If he's not a danger to the public, we'll say 'Let him go,'" Spitz said.

The delays mean that lesser crimes tend to fall off the radar, which can frustrate detectives.

"We have to set our threshold higher," Gray said. "It slows the whole process down. Our guys are screaming for evidence results, but we have other priorities," he said.

Detectives end up not even trying to take some cases to court, he said.

"We can't work all the cases."

Monterey police Lt. Leslie Sonné said the delays have had an effect on her department.

"It impacts every level of the investigation," Sonné said. "If a print is matched to someone, it would be nice to go after someone before they commit another crime. There's nothing we can do about it but hope they can generate some staff."

The city of Monterey, she said, is the lab's biggest customer.

Outside of police circles, the problem hasn't gotten much attention, in part because authorities have been reluctant to talk about it.

It took a few years to get this bad.

Forensic services everywhere have diminished during the past five to 10 years, said Pacific Grove police Lt. Tom Uretsky.

"It's a slow creep, not an acute problem," he said. "You gradually stop doing the things you used to do."

Officers say crime victims today expect evidence to be processed faster than ever, thanks to programs such as "CSI," where the latest high-tech equipment abounds and budget cuts seem nonexistent.

"Forensics are huge in law enforcement these days," Sonné said. "Unfortunately because of TV shows, the public expects results in an hour."

Spitz agreed that people don't realize that fingerprint experts cost money.

"They don't talk about that on CSI," he said.

The high cost of living in Monterey County and pay rates for the lab's skilled positions don't help.

Though the county's fingerprint experts aren't the worst paid in the nation or California, their salaries are far from the highest.

"It's what the county is willing to cough up," said Gray. "We cannot get people to come here to work."

In the current job posting for a latent fingerprint/crime scene examiner, Monterey County offers from $51,732 to $70,644 annually.

For a similar position, Santa Clara County offers from $62,531.04 to $75,653.76 annually. San Mateo County pays up to $75,300.

A few states, with lower costs of living than California, offer even more. Police in Las Vegas will pay up to $79,306 for a latent fingerprint examiner, while in August, the state of Colorado offered up to $89,568.

Private industry pays the most, with some companies offering upward of six figures.

Shortages in police agencies|

Some local police agencies have been too busy coping with staff shortages to raise their voices about the county's vacancies.

Monterey, for instance, is down by 13 officers, Sonné said.

Pacific Grove is also suffering an officer shortage.

"We're not submitting enough fingerprints to say 'Gee, hurry up.'" Uretsky said. "We'll soon be four officers down... Our priority is to keep staffing levels where they are."

When serious crimes such as murder or attempted murder take place in Pacific Grove, Uretsky said his department calls in the state's Department of Justice.

"We call the Sheriff's Office to photograph the scene but the DOJ to process the crime scene," he said. "They lift the prints, drive them to Sacramento and immediately run them. That's what they do for a living."

But that solution, he said, only works with the most serious crimes.

"At the DOJ, if it's not a homicide, they'll get to it when they get to it," Uretsky said. "They're also very short-handed."

It took two years, he said, for the state to return a DNA "hit" on a Pacific Grove rape and assault case.

Other agencies, such as Seaside, are trying to improve their ability to pick up some of Monterey County's case load. Capt. Steve Cercone said his department recently hired a police services assistant who will be qualified in six months to a year to process evidence.

"It will take some of the workload off the Sheriff's Office," he said. "We can only do so much."

The sheriff's forensic lab does all it can, Cercone said, to accommodate Seaside's most urgent requests.

Uretsky's admiration for the lab's remaining staff members borders on reverence.

"I've got nothing but praise for those two," he said.

Sonné said the lab's workers are often roused on days off to process crime scenes.

Gray described a recent Saturday when every Sheriff's Office detective was dispatched to the scene of a stabbing murder in Castroville. Staff shortages meant that detectives and lab staff could work on nothing else.

"With that evidence, everything else gets dropped," Gray said. "You have physical evidence that has to be processed. You can't just leave it."

For many crimes, the county will likely struggle with evidence backlogs for the foreseeable future, as the downsized lab tackles a case load handled by five people only a few years ago.

"We'll sure keep our fingers crossed for the county crime lab," Sonné said. "They sure can use some relief."

CIVIL LAW

A Powerful Voice In Patent Disputes (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

When it comes to patent law, who is the ultimate authority? Is it the Supreme Court? Or the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialty court for patent and trademark law established by Congress in 1982?

Actually, it's none of the above. But before I reveal the correct answer, let me congratulate you for having read this far beyond the words "patent law." This eye-glazing technical topic has been known to send even people who like tax law screaming from the room. That you may still be interested shows a commendable understanding of patent law's significance, notwithstanding its arcane nature.

After all, the Founding Fathers didn't think patents were boring. They recognized that secure intellectual property would be a pillar of the national economy they hoped to create. Thus, the Constitution, "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts," specified the legal recognition of patents and copyrights as an exclusive function of the federal government.

Making sure that patent rights are strong enough so that inventors have incentives to innovate, but not so strong that they create inappropriate monopolies on widely applicable technology, is a legal balancing act that determines the flow of billions of dollars each year. Just ask corporate giants such as Microsoft, AT&T or eBay, whose names appear on the list of litigants in recent Supreme Court patent cases.

Abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty grab headlines. But when it comes to impact on the jobs and consumer choices available to everyday Americans, patent law probably matters more.

End of lecture. Now back to the mini-quiz. Arguably, the real power in patent law these days is not a court at all, but the Office of the Solicitor General, the Justice Department lawyer who represents the federal government before the Supreme Court. In the 10 Supreme Court patent cases in which the solicitor general has participated since 1995, the SG is undefeated, according to a recent study by Jonathan Franklin, a Supreme Court specialist at the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski.

What's behind the court's deference to the executive branch? In part, say patent law specialists, it appears that the justices are increasingly second-guessing the rulings of the Federal Circuit, which was designed to help clean up patent law by concentrating all federal appeals in a single expert body. From the Federal Circuit's inception until the mid-'90s, the justices seemed content to let it call the shots. But as the information technology revolution has spread, the high court has shown a willingness to review decisions of the Federal Circuit, whose critics say it is too favorable to patent holders.

None of the justices are experts on patent law. Thus, they lean heavily on the expertise of the solicitor general, who receives plenty of input from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Federal Trade Commission and others within the executive branch.

"In many areas of law that are highly technical, the court looks to the government to help find its way," said John F. Duffy, professor of patent law at George Washington University. "The Supreme Court is not leading. It is choosing between two specialists: the PTO and the Federal Circuit."

Duffy notes that patent cases account for about a fifth of the 10 to 20 appeals per year in which the court asks for the views of the solicitor general before it decides whether or not to hear the case.

The justices have agreed to hear three patent cases this year. The most significant may be KSR International v. Teleflex , No. 04-1350, scheduled for argument on Nov. 28. At issue is the proper meaning of "obvious" in patent law. You can only patent something if it's really an original invention. It can't be something so obvious that anyone could have slapped it together. The question, though, is how obvious that is.

KSR makes gas pedals for General Motors and other car manufacturers. Its accelerators are adjustable, so they can be made higher or lower depending on how long the driver's legs are, and are linked to an electronic sensor that modern cars use to control the throttle, instead of a cable as in the old days. Teleflex, represented by Supreme Court specialist Thomas C. Goldstein, says KSR is infringing its patent on this combination; KSR says, in essence, that it is simply building something anyone familiar with the technologies could have made. A federal district judge sided with KSR, but the Federal Circuit reversed that decision and said Teleflex's device was non-obvious, and thus patentable.

To Duffy, who represents KSR in the Supreme Court, the Federal Circuit's ruling has no basis in the text of the relevant patent statute and is typical, he says, of how "junky patents are clogging up the system." Teleflex's brief responds that its device is "new and previously unforeseen" and that the Federal Circuit applied a "flexible" standard of obviousness in concluding that the company was entitled to a trial on its claim of infringement.

The court's decision will not only determine this critical point of patent law doctrine, it could also affect how much car and truck buyers have to pay for vehicles with adjustable accelerator gizmos, which, among other uses, help short people drive big rigs. If you think that's not a big deal, many folks disagree with you: Some 37 different friend-of-the-court briefs have been filed on behalf of one side or the other -- three more than have been filed in the blockbuster case on the federal partial birth abortion ban, which will be heard on Wednesday.

Of course, if Franklin's analysis holds, the brief that matters most is the solicitor general's, filed on KSR's side. Obviously, there's a lot more to patent law than you thought.

Judge To Rule On Hughes Estate Claims (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, November 6, 2006

Nearly 30 years after jurors declared that a will left by Howard Hughes that gave a fortune to a Utah gas station owner was fake, Melvin Dummar is back in court claiming he was cheated out of a share in the billionaire's estate.

Hughes was the reclusive industrialist whose eccentricities were recorded in the 2004 movie The Aviator. He was world-famous as a dashing flier, aircraft builder, Hollywood producer and Nevada casino owner with an eye for women. Phobic about germs late in life, he had a habit of walking around naked in the penthouse at Las Vegas' Desert Inn, where he lived from 1966 to 1970.

Several weeks after Hughes died at age 70 in 1976, a will purportedly in his handwriting was discovered on a desk in the Salt Lake City headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. News media went wild over the surprising bequest of $156 million to the obscure Dummar.

Dummar explained to reporters who descended on his gas station in Willard, Utah, that Hughes must have acted to repay him for rescuing a beaten and bleeding Hughes from a roadside ditch in the Nevada desert in December 1967. Dummar says he drove Hughes to a Las Vegas hotel.

The so-called Mormon will gave one-sixteenth of Hughes' $2.5 billion holdings to Dummar. The will was one of dozens that surfaced after Hughes died. None was declared valid by courts.

Nevada and Texas juries decided in 1978 that the will was a forgery. Now, Dummar, 62, says a new witness came forward in 2004 who can confirm his story. He revived the half-forgotten case in June by filing a complaint of fraud and racketeering in federal court against Hughes heir William Lummis, 85, and Frank Gay, 77, former chief operating officer of Hughes' companies.

U.S. District Judge Bruce Jenkins suggested in a hearing Thursday in Salt Lake City that he'll rule this week on motions to dismiss Dummar's suit because he waited too long to return to court.

In 1976, Dummar at first said the news of his windfall surprised him. Then his fingerprint was found on the envelope containing the will. During a seven-month trial over the will's validity, Dummar said he had delivered the document to the church on instructions of a “confidential agent” of Hughes who brought the will to his gas station.

Under Texas law for those who die without a will, all of Hughes' empire went to Lummis, a first cousin from Houston.

Dummar alleges that Lummis and Gay pressured Hughes employees to testify falsely at the 1977-78 Nevada trial that Hughes never left the Desert Inn in December 1967, so he could not have been rescued.

Knut Rife, a lawyer for Dummar, says the defendants owe Dummar $156 million plus interest since 1978 — a total of $500 million.

Though Dummar still says the will was valid, he says he's not trying again to win a piece of Hughes' estate. That was divided long ago between Lummis and the IRS. He's suing for damages, alleging that Lummis and Gay solicited perjury and obstructed justice.

“For almost 30 years, Melvin Dummar has been thought of as a fraud or a con artist or a forger,” says Stuart Stein, another lawyer for Dummar. “He had his life ruined by this.”

Dummar says: “I just want to clear my name. I guess in a case like this you have to put some kind of monetary value on it, but it has more to do with your pride and reputation.”

Hollywood turned Dummar's thwarted dream of sudden riches into the 1980 film Melvin and Howard.

Dummar was in court Thursday as lawyers for Lummis and Gay denied wrongdoing and argued that Dummar had sued decades too late.

“You only get one bite of the apple,” says Peggy Tomsic, a lawyer for Gay. Besides, she says, “almost every potential material witness is dead. All of the documents, including the alleged original handwritten will of Mr. Hughes, are gone.”

Dummar's lawyers say there should be a new trial because evidence of alleged fraud didn't turn up until 2004. That's when retired Hughes aviation executive Guido Roberto Deiro read an article about Dummar and volunteered to be a witness for him.

In that article, Dummar detailed the location of his encounter with Hughes as 6 miles from the Cottontail Ranch, a legal brothel in Lida Junction, Nev. Deiro says in court documents that as manager of the Hughes-owned North Las Vegas Airport, he piloted the billionaire to the Cottontail Ranch one night between Christmas and New Year's Eve of 1967 but lost track of him.

The holiday-season trip was the last of four flights to brothels he made with Hughes, Deiro says. He says he never saw or spoke to Hughes again.

Dummar now lives in Brigham City, Utah, with his second wife. He's self-employed, delivering meat and seafood to Nevada and Utah ranches.

Stein, Dummar's lawyer, says he's encouraged after last week's hearing. “The first thing is to rehabilitate Mr. Dummar's reputation,” he says. “I think I've accomplished that, no matter what the judge does.”

State GOP: Missing Voting Machine Cards In Memphis Could Be Used Fraudulently (AP)

AP, November 5, 2006

MEMPHIS — Tennessee's Republican Party chairman complained to Shelby County election officials that electronic voting machine cards were missing in Memphis, the hometown of Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Harold Ford Jr.

"It has come to our attention that several smart cards used in early voting are missing from at least one early voting site in Memphis, Tenn.," Bob Davis Jr. said in a letter dated Thursday. "The lack of oversight and control over these smart cards has created a situation which could allow for voter fraud."

The letter called on the commission to "locate these missing smart cards as soon as possible."

Tennessee Election Coordinator Brook Thompson said Friday that even if the cards aren't recovered, there is no danger of fraud.

"The cards are programmed such that once you use them, they cannot be reused until they are reactivated by the Election Commission," he said.

Shelby County Election Commission administrator James Johnson didn't immediately return calls seeking comment and wasn't in the office when a reporter stopped by to ask him about the complaint.

Chris Devaney, the state GOP's executive director, disagreed with Thompson's assertion that a smart card couldn't be reactivated and used fraudulently.

He said GOP poll watchers at the Bishop-Byrne precinct reported 12 cards missing.

"We want the Shelby (election) commission to investigate it," Devaney said.

Ford, a five-term congressman who faces Republican Bob Corker of Chattanooga in the Tuesday election, said he would ask the Shelby County district attorney and sheriff to step aside from the investigation because they are co-chairing Corker's campaign.

"They are good people, both, but they should recuse themselves," Ford said. "If we have to ask the Justice Department to come in and oversee this, we may have to. It's unfortunate that these things happen, but we have authorities — and hopefully independent authorities — that will come in and correct the record." ·

IPod Friendly Program Will Monitor Election Complaints (LAWJW)

Lawrence Journal-World, November 6, 2006

A federal prosecutor will be available during Tuesday's election to respond to reports of possible election fraud and voting rights violations in Kansas.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Leon Patton will be available as part of the Justice Department's nationwide Election Day program, which is an effort to increase the department's ability to deter election fraud and discrimination at the polls.

Patton can be reached at (913) 551-6730 while the polls are open.

Complaints also can be made to the Civil Rights Division's Voting Section in Washington, D.C., at (800) 253-3931 or (202) 307-2767.

A New Breed Of Watchdog For Election Day By JUNE KRONHOLZ (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

When Americans go to vote tomorrow, a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus.

Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it.

"This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," predicts Marybeth Kuznik, who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania. Ms. Kuznik, a former arts educator, calls herself a "progressive," but says VotePA includes members of both major parties, two minor parties and independents.

Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count.

"I don't care who wins; I just want to know it's democracy," says Warren Stewart, policy director of VoteTrustUSA, an umbrella for 70 grass-roots groups, like VotePA, that lobby legislators and warn voters about election issues.

Two of the bigger groups -- the Election Protection Coalition and Voter Action -- will staff call centers where they will field voter complaints to their 866-OUR-VOTE and 888-SAV-VOTE numbers and dispatch lawyers to any trouble spots. Video the Vote is enlisting "citizen journalists" to film polling-place problems. The Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law and People for the American Way are among Election Protection's members. Voter Action is a legal-rights group started by California lawyer Lowell Finley, who sued voting-machine maker Diebold Inc. over software security; Diebold recently paid $2.6 million to California as part of a settlement of the suit.

Pollworkers for Democracy -- a joint project of VoteTrustUSA, and two groups who often support progressive causes, Mainstreet Moms and Working Assets -- is asking election workers to report voting problems to the group after finishing their precinct shifts to provide evidence for potential lawsuits and recounts. And dozens of small, grass-roots groups will be watching polling stations, elections offices and tabulation centers.

"This is so important," says Bo Lipari, who retired at age 53 from his job as an Ithaca, N.Y., software engineer to start a watchdog group called New Yorkers for Verified Voting. Mr. Lipari describes his group as "strictly nonpartisan" and won't discuss his party affiliation. On Election Day, Mr. Lipari says he will be a poll watcher in Saratoga County, one of the few in New York using electronic voting equipment.

The goal of these groups is both to untangle snarls -- Election Protection's lawyers will ask state courts to keep polls open if there are glitches, for example -- and to document problems, alert the media and gather plaintiffs for possible recount demands and lawsuits.

These groups are on heightened alert because of the new voting equipment and registration databases put in place this year to satisfy the Help America Vote Act or Hava. That 2002 legislation offered voting jurisdictions $3.8 billion to replace their punch-card and lever voting machines. It also required states to put together voter databases in an effort to clear up questions about who is eligible to cast a ballot.

As a result, about 55 million voters will be casting ballots on new voting systems this election, and 22 million of them will be using touch-screen machines in a federal election for the first time. New voter databases also are heightening activists' worries. States compiled the lists by consolidating their county voter-registration lists, then cross-checking them with Social Security and driver-license databases to weed out voters who have died, moved or lost their voting rights.

Democrats fear the untested databases have mistakenly purged the poor and minorities -- generally Democratic constituencies -- while Republicans fear they will contain names of ineligible voters, particularly illegal immigrants, whose votes also could benefit Democrats. The watchdog groups, meanwhile, worry that database mix-ups will create long lines that cause voters to leave before casting a ballot.

For many activists, Election Day is only one more step in a long election-integrity campaign that started when counties began buying touch screens with their new federal money. The machines -- which about 38% of all voters will use tomorrow -- operate much like a bank ATM, leading voters through several prompts and tabulating votes on an internal memory card.

The voting-machine companies, led by Ohio's Diebold, insist the touch screens are tamper-proof and that they prevent voters from making the kinds of errors -- like voting twice for the same office -- that typically disqualify thousands of ballots. The problem, the companies say, is with poorly trained poll workers, not the machines.

Some computer experts quickly began warning that the touch screens are vulnerable to fraud and software glitches, but the issue simmered largely online, and largely unnoticed, until the 2004 elections.

VoteTrustUSA's Mr. Stewart, a San Francisco cellist, says he hadn't been politically active since he stuffed envelopes for George McGovern in 1972, but became alarmed after reading about problems in the 2004 count in Ohio. "I could accept it if my candidate lost," he says, but not that polling-place errors might have changed the outcome. Mr. Stewart won't disclose his voter registration.

He joined an ad hoc group seeking recounts in several states and was assigned to analyze the results in New Mexico where there were 21,000 "under votes" -- that is, 21,000 more ballots distributed than votes cast. After comparing the under votes by precinct, voter demographics and how they were cast, Mr. Stewart says he concluded that almost all were from two early-model electronic voting machines that still are in use in nine states. He quit the California Bach Society, where he was the conductor, and helped start VoteTrustUSA, which he describes as "three people and a Web site, making a lot of noise."

The 2004 Ohio vote also energized Mark Halvorson, who says he was mystified why there were groups focused on voter registration, but none whose mission was the integrity of the poll. "I felt compelled to do something," says Mr. Halvorson, who quit his job as a social worker to launch Citizens for Election Integrity Minnesota, which is affiliated with VoteTrustUSA.

Many election-activist groups have registered as lobbyists or nonprofit charities, which allow them to raise money. But most say they operate on a shoestring with donations from their members. Susan Pynchon, who abandoned her real-estate career to start the Florida Fair Elections Coalition, says she finances her group's work out of rental income from several properties she owns. Ms. Pynchon says she doesn't "allow political statements" from the group's members, and that she claims no party affiliation on her voter registration.

Partly because of activists' pressure, 17 states now require that touch-screen machines record votes on paper documents that may be used in recounts. A House bill that would require a similar paper trail in federal elections has 219 sponsors. "The energy, the motivation is not top down, it's bottom up," says Rep. Rush Holt, a New Jersey Democrat who introduced the bill.

Mr. Halvorson's Minnesota group helped press the state Legislature to increase the number of precincts where election officials routinely hand-count the ballots and compare them with vote totals on scanners -- electronic voting machines that read hand-marked ballots. Currently, 13 states require random audits.

Also on the activists' agenda: voting-machine certification. As it is, voting-machine makers choose the labs that test their touch screens and the software that runs them. Activists want the government involved, and want outside experts to be able to scrutinize the software for security holes. A new federal Election Assistance Commission mandated by Hava is scheduled to issue new guidelines by the 2008 vote.

Eastern Kentucky School District Facing Civil Rights Inquiry (AP)

AP, November 5, 2006

LLOYD, Ky. - An eastern Kentucky school district faces a federal civil rights inquiry, attorneys for the school system said.

The Greenup County School District and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Civil Rights have exchanged preliminary materials, but the agency has not scheduled a visit to the area, said Michael J. Schmitt, an attorney for the school district.

School officials wouldn't say what the nature of the inquiry is. Greenup Superintendent John Younce would neither confirm nor deny that an inquiry is under way or that federal officials are planning a visit to the district.

The investigation is the second of the school district in the last two years. In 2005, the school district faced of racial discrimination against Greenup County High School principal Randall Peffer.

Peffer was accused of using racially derogatory comments, discriminating against students, limiting the time of black players on the basketball team and grading black students more strictly than white students.

A report issued at the conclusion of that inquiry cleared Peffer of the allegations, but said that he had been disciplined for using a racially offensive remark.

ANTITRUST

Morgan Stanley And Visa Settle Dispute (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

Morgan Stanley and Visa Europe have agreed to settle a long-running antitrust dispute, in a move that could bring to an end a six-year competition probe by the European Commission into the credit card group.

The dispute broke out after Visa refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network. The US investment bank had wanted to offer card services to shops and merchants in the European Union. However, Visa denied it access to its network, pointing to the fact that Morgan Stanley runs the Discover card in the US in competition with Visa.

Morgan Stanley in 2000 filed a complaint to the Commission, which opened an investigation and in August 2004 issued formal charges against Visa accusing it of abusing a dominant market position. The credit card group has been waiting for a final decision, and a possible antitrust fine, ever since.

According to executives from both groups, Visa and Morgan Stanley have now agreed to bury the hatchet. Morgan Stanley has become a member of the Visa card network, and in return has withdrawn its formal antitrust complaint to the Commission.

The move follows last month's decision by Visa Europe to split from the Visa group's international operations.

While Visa International decided to turn itself into a publicly-listed company, Visa Europe plans to retain its structure as an association owned and run by its member banks.

Charlotte Hogg, managing director of Morgan Stanley's consumer banking group international, said: "I can confirm that Morgan Stanley Bank has become a member of Visa Europe and that we have withdrawn our complaint to the European Commission about exclusion from membership of Visa Europe."

Visa Europe said: "We are very pleased that we have reached an amicable agreement with Morgan Stanley and have informed the European Commission about this new development."

The Commission declined to comment on the move. Formally speaking, the settlement between Visa and Morgan Stanley has no impact on the probe, although in practice it will be very difficult for the regulator to pursue an infringement already addressed by the parties.

Should the deal with Morgan Stanley force the Commission to abandon its probe, it would remove the threat to Visa Europe of a fine of up to 10 per cent of its global annual turnover.

However, Visa and its rival MasterCard still face pressure from the Commission to slash the fees they demand from retailers.

Although Visa agreed in 2002 to lower these “interchange fees”, a recent Commission sector probe again hit out at what it describes as “excessive” charges.

CVS's Deal Maker Faces Toughest Test Integrating Caremark (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz, David Armstrong

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

CVS Corp.'s $21 billion pact to buy Caremark Rx Inc. marks the biggest gamble yet for Thomas Ryan, the CVS chief who will lead the new company.

A 54-year-old former pharmacist, Mr. Ryan has helped build CVS from a regional drugstore chain into a national giant by buying rivals such as Revco DS Inc., Eckerd and Albertsons Inc.'s Save-On and Osco stores. Since ascending to the CEO and president posts at CVS in 1998, he has more than doubled the number of CVS stores to about 6,200. Sales are now $37 billion, up from $15 billion when he took over.

Mr. Ryan is a savvy manager with a talent for overhauling and integrating sagging drugstore chains. But the Caremark deal, which would create a behemoth with $75 billion in annual revenue, represents a bigger deal than any he has tried before and CVS's first major acquisition of a company that isn't another drugstore chain.

Mr. Ryan will be walking a fine line: Caremark and other pharmacy-benefit managers, known as PBMs, get the best possible deal on prescription drugs for their customers, typically big companies or health insurers. Some skeptics of the CVS-Caremark combination wonder whether Caremark's customers will still get the lowest possible drug prices after a drugstore company takes control.

Mr. Ryan is quick to dismiss concerns about a conflict of interest between operating both a profit-driven pharmacy and a PBM. In an interview, he noted that CVS already owns a PBM, which will be rolled into Caremark's operations as part of the merger. He said potential conflicts of interest haven't prevented big clients, such as DaimlerChrysler AG, from signing up with CVS's PBM, PharmaCare.

"It's a natural concern," Mr. Ryan says, adding that the combined company has to offer low prices if it expects to get new business. "No one will beat us on cost when we go to market," he says. So far, Caremark customers have been supportive of the proposed deal, he adds.

Mr. Ryan says he is transforming the drugstore chain into a complete health-care provider. CVS's other recent acquisitions include MinuteClinic, of Minneapolis, which operates in-store health clinics, where nurses treat strep throat, ear and sinus infections and other minor illnesses. He has "figured out that it's good to be a consumer company, but more important to be a health care company," says John Ransom, an analyst at Raymond James Financial Inc., in St. Petersburg, Fla.

Along the way, Mr. Ryan has persuaded the CVS board to "follow him on tough decisions," says Terrence Murray, former chief at FleetBoston Financial Corp. and a CVS board member. He says Mr. Ryan has a "sense of not only where his company is going but where the industry is going."

Mr. Ryan still needs to sell investors on the Caremark deal: He is scheduled to hit the road and meet with big shareholders this week. Some Caremark shareholders are grumbling that the purchase price is too low; some wonder if the sale is driven by weakness in Caremark's business. And despite Mr. Ryan's past successes, some investors worry he may be overextending himself and CVS.

The son of a machinist and a homemaker from New Jersey, Mr. Ryan joined CVS in 1974 as an intern when he was a pharmacy major at the University of Rhode Island. A professor recommended he interview at a CVS store in Woonsocket, some 45 miles away from campus. "I didn't know what CVS was or where Woonsocket was," Mr. Ryan says. He borrowed a fraternity brother's tie and got the job. The man who hired him later told him why: He was the only candidate who wore a tie.

CVS's roots go back to Stanley and Sid Goldstein, two Woonsocket brothers who started out supplying health-and-beauty products to retailers. In 1963, in Lowell, Mass., they and a partner, Ralph Hoagland, opened the first "Consumer Value Store" selling these products to the public at a discount -- an operation the retail conglomerate Melville Corp. bought three years later.

By 1996, CVS was the best-performing company in the Melville portfolio, with hundreds of stores. In that year, Melville, led by Stanley Goldstein, then its CEO, sold or spun off everything but the drugstores and renamed the remaining company CVS Corp. Meanwhile, Mr. Ryan, handpicked by Mr. Goldstein to run CVS's pharmacy division when he was only 29, was catapulting up the CVS ranks.

Mr. Goldstein recalls being impressed with Mr. Ryan's "ability to frame issues and keep it simple. ...He had that ability to slough off the superfluous stuff that people throw up as roadblocks." Mr. Goldstein handed the CEO reins to Mr. Ryan in 1998 and retired from the CVS board in May.

CVS under Mr. Ryan has cultivated Rhode Island state officials. Former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Almond says he and Mr. Ryan spent hours cajoling state legislators to cough up a total of $23 million in cash for an 8,000-seat, $54 million gym and convocation center at the University of Rhode Island.

"There are some guys who just have a knack," says Mr. Almond. "A lot of it has to do with Tom's personality. He is easygoing and doesn't come across as a guy who knows it all. He talks with you, not down to you." The new facility was christened the "Ryan Center" in 2002 after the CVS chief donated $2 million and CVS gave $3 million.

University of Rhode Island President Robert Carothers recalls how Mr. Ryan visited a hold-out legislator, entering the office and closing the door. "When they came out, [the legislator] was supporting the project," he recalls. "I don't know what he said." Asked about the conversation, Mr. Ryan says he told the legislator, "you are going to see some great basketball games."

CVS's relations with state legislators, however, have embroiled it in an influence-peddling scandal that began after some legislators turned up on CVS's corporate payrolls.

The scandal, dug up by the Providence Journal, has so far resulted in the resignations of two senators. One senator pleaded guilty last year to federal criminal charges, acknowledging he was paid by CVS as a consultant at the same time he opposed or killed legislation designed to relax insurer limits on customers' choice of pharmacy chains.

At CVS, a senior vice president and a government-affairs official were placed on leave. The fallout hasn't affected CVS earnings, and there are no indications the probe reached Mr. Ryan.

Mr. Ryan's biggest accomplishment has been to change the appearance of CVS stores, highlighting cosmetics and beauty products to make the stores more "female-friendly," says Mr. Ransom, the analyst. Mr. Ryan also introduced "ExtraCare" cards, which CVS says is the first loyalty card -- essentially a frequent-flier program -- for drugstore shoppers.

Also, under Mr. Ryan, new CVS stores are almost all free-standing, with wide aisles and drive-through pharmacy windows. These stores generate higher sales than older stores in cities and malls.

"I've been with him [on golf trips] in Hilton Head where he pops into CVS stores to talk to people," says Paul J. Choquette Jr., a friend and the chairman of Gilbane Inc., a Rhode Island builder. "He's always thinking about how he can move CVS ahead."

Five years ago, Mr. Ryan oversaw an overhaul of computer technology at CVS. When CVS was working on a plan to reduce customer wait times for prescription drugs, Mr. Ryan says he was frustrated that the company couldn't figure out how long customers were actually waiting. With new technology, Mr. Ryan says he can instantly check wait times in any CVS store.

Because CVS was growing into a national chain, even small changes around the margins have a big effect on profits, he says. For instance, CVS now can track whether the location of an item within a store makes it more likely to be stolen. The company can direct store managers to move heavily stolen items to more protected areas.

Mr. Murray, the board member, says Mr. Ryan wisely recognized that technology "was not a natural strength of his," and so he hired a smart team to handle the conversions. "That of course, is the key to a great executive, to understand his own strengths and weaknesses and to shore up when necessary," he says.

Analysts say CVS stores under Mr. Ryan have become hipper than those of its Midwestern rival, Walgreen Co., of Deerfield, Ill. CVS recently held an analysts day at a swank New York hotel, inviting Chistophe, the Beverly Hills hairdresser, to demonstrate hair products.

Regulators Clear Google's YouTube Deal (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

U.S. antitrust regulators cleared Google Inc.'s $1.65 billion purchase of online video-sharing company YouTube Inc., based on a document published Friday.

No other details were available.

A transaction involving Google and YouTube was listed on the Federal Trade Commission's daily publication of transactions whose reviews have been terminated.

Google, Mountain View, Calif., agreed early last month to acquire YouTube, of San Mateo, Calif., from its founders for $1.65 billion in stock. On Tuesday, the FTC approved related transactions between Google and YouTube's co-founders Steve Chen and Chad Hurley, who started the venture in Mr. Hurley's garage last year. Also Tuesday, the Justice Department gave its approval to Google's bid for YouTube.

Report: Feds Refusing FBI Terror Cases (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0091196

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, November 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department increasingly has refused to prosecute FBI cases targeting suspected terrorists over the past five years, according to private researchers who reviewed department records.

The government says the findings are inaccurate and "intellectually dishonest."

The report being released Monday by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University raises questions about the quality of the FBI's investigations.

Prosecutors declined to bring charges in 131 of 150, or 87 percent, of international terrorist case referrals from the FBI between October 2005 and June 2006, according to the report. The study was based on the most recent data available from the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys.

That number marks the peak of generally steady increases from the 2001 budget year, when prosecutors rejected 33 percent of such cases from the FBI, according to the report.

The data "raise troubling questions about the bureau's investigation of criminal matters involving individuals the government has identified as international terrorists," the report said.

It noted that prosecutions in traditional FBI investigations since 2001 _ including drug cases, white collar crimes and organized crimes _ have decreased while the number of agents and other employees has risen.

"So with more special agents, many more intelligence analysts, and many fewer prosecutions the question must be asked: What is the FBI doing?" the report said.

A Justice Department spokesman disputed the data highlighted by the Syracuse researchers, noting that terrorist hoax cases that were quickly dismissed may have been included in the government data.

Additionally, some cases are referred to prosecutors to obtain subpoenas or other legal orders in investigations that ultimately never result in criminal charges, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. He said prosecutors rejected 67 percent of FBI international terrorist cases in the nine-month period _ not 87 percent.

The FBI's assistant director, John Miller, said the low number of cases prosecuted reflects changes in how investigations have been conducted since the Sept. 11 attacks. He said about half of the FBI's resources go to detection and information gathering of terrorist networks in cases that do not always result in arrests.

"It's not about the numbers and for TRAC to suggest as much is to be intellectually dishonest," Miller said.

He added: "The FBI has been very clear about how we have changed the way we do business since 9/11."

TRAC co-director Susan Long said researchers merely relied on the Justice Department's own numbers to come up with the conclusions.

Justice Dept. Disputes Report On Terror Cases (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal prosecutors rejected 87% of the international terrorism cases brought by the FBI during the first nine months of fiscal year 2006, a Syracuse University analysis concluded.

The review, conducted by the university's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse (TRAC), found that the number of rejections has been generally increasing since 2001. Prosecutions fell from 118 defendants in fiscal year 2002, to 19 defendants from Oct. 1, 2005, to June 30, the latest data available.

The Justice Department challenged the findings and said the analysis represented an "astonishing misunderstanding" of the inner workings of the federal criminal justice system.

"This report contains inaccurate figures, relies on a faulty assumption that every referral from an investigative agency should result in a criminal prosecution and ignores the reality of how the war on terrorism is being conducted," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

In the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Justice Department announced a dramatic transformation of its mission, from a prosecution-driven institution to an agency that emphasizes prevention and the development of a domestic intelligence system.

Because of the new mission, Roehrkasse said, cases rejected for prosecution don't necessarily close investigations.

"Often, matters are referred to prosecutors to assist in further investigation through the use of criminal investigative tools that require legal process such as a subpoena or surveillance order," he said. Hoax cases that were dismissed may have been included in the government data, too, he said.

The TRAC report appears to reflect Justice's new mission, but Roehrkasse said the department's rejection rate stands at 67%, not 87%. He added the department has prosecuted 36 international terrorism defendants, nearly double the number reported in the analysis.

Susan Long, one of the report's authors, defended TRAC's analysis of the numbers. The data used in the review were obtained from the Justice Department's Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys.

"The information comes from their files," Long said.

TRAC provides data on federal staffing, spending and enforcement activities to Congress, media and other groups to make the information more accessible to the public.

FBI Willing To Go Undercover In Congress If Necessary (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy, November 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The new chief of the FBI's Criminal Division, which is swamped with public corruption cases, says the bureau is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress.

Assistant FBI Director James Burrus called the bureau's public corruption program "a sleeping giant that we've awoken," and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area "for many, many, many years to come."

So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office.

In the past year, former Republican Reps. Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney have pleaded guilty to corruption charges. FBI agents are investigating about a dozen other members of Congress, including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature.

If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs.

"We look for those opportunities a lot," Burrus said, using words rarely heard at the bureau over the last quarter century. "I would do it on Capitol Hill. I would do it in any state legislature. ... If we could do an undercover operation, and it would get me better evidence, I'd do it in a second."

Philip Heymann, who oversaw the Abscam investigation as chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division during the Carter administration, expressed surprise to learn of the FBI's willingness to attempt another congressional sting after the outcry from Capitol Hill over Abscam.

"It shows courage at the FBI," said Heymann, now a criminal law professor at Harvard University. He said he concluded, after watching a recent public television documentary and listening to experts, that "there is more corruption (on Capitol Hill) than I ever thought imaginable" and that a single FBI sting "might result in very large numbers of prosecutions."

But even without an undercover operation, Heymann and other observers say they have been pleased with the GOP-controlled Justice Department's willingness to pursue old-fashioned investigations, even if they hurt congressional Republicans in Tuesday's elections.

Nationally over the last year, 600 agents worked 2,200 public corruption cases, resulting in 650 arrests, 1,000 indictments and 800 convictions, Burrus said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller, who listed public corruption as his top criminal investigative priority when he shifted the FBI's focus to terrorism in 2002, said last month that the surge in convictions "sends the message that public corruption will not be tolerated." Despite the realignment, the number of agents working on public corruption has remained constant.

Burrus argued that the FBI is "uniquely qualified" to handle such cases, pointing to the bureau's political independence, exemplified by Mueller's 10-year term. Burrus said that Alice Fisher, the politically appointed chief of the Justice Department's Criminal Division with whom he confers weekly, also has "an aggressive attitude" about pursuing public officials.

"Operation Rainmaker," the FBI's broad investigation of a Washington lobbying ring, has already led to a handful of convictions, including Ney's guilty plea last month. The inquiry was one reason for the resignation last year of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who also faces state campaign finance charges. Other investigations seem to be sprouting everywhere.

But Reid Weingarten, a former Abscam prosecutor who now is a high-profile Washington criminal defense lawyer, said he would bet that the flurry of congressional cases has resulted from evidence "falling in their (investigators') laps," rather than a programmed FBI hunt for corruption.

The FBI does appear to be stepping up its use of electronic surveillance and has conducted stings of state politicians. Bureau agents secretly taped Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., before finding $90,000 in his freezer during a raid last May. Cell phones were wiretapped for four months in an investigation of Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., government sources say.

In "Operation Tennessee Waltz," 10 Tennessee state officials, including five current and former legislators, have been prosecuted in a scheme in which hidden cameras whirred as FBI undercover agents offered payoffs in return for help for a dummy company. Burrus said some targeted Tennessee legislators were moving so quickly that "we were actually having to discuss how we were going to slow it down" so that bills aiding the phony firm didn't become law.

A separate undercover inquiry led to the indictment of three members of San Diego's city council.

In Alaska, the FBI has more than doubled its manpower in a sweeping investigation of allegations that an oil industry services company bribed state legislators, people familiar with the inquiry said. On Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, the FBI conducted two dozen raids and searched the office of state Sen. Ben Stevens, son of U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska.

Burrus declined to discuss any investigation, but said the FBI will focus on more state capitals over the next year, "because we have seen a trend in cases that leads us to believe there's more out there."

When he arrived as deputy chief of the criminal division in 2004, he said, field offices frequently told him they had "no idea" how to pursue public corruption leads. Since then, he said, agents in about 30 of the bureau's 56 field offices have been trained. FBI agents in Washington have studied congressional activities that might invite bribes, such as hard-to-trace "earmarks" in which members appropriate money for pet projects, often keeping their involvement off the public record.

"Public corruption cases have to be fished out," he said, noting that crooked politicians tend to do secret deals with one other person and often try to disguise their actions as "for the public's good."

Controversial new legal theories are also helping prosecutors bring cases in which they can't prove outright briberies. A vaguely written, 28-word 1988 law, for example, makes it a fraud for a politician to deprive taxpayers of his "honest services." It was among the charges lodged against Cunningham, Ney, former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the San Diego councilmen.

Burrus said the FBI has to prove "that this person engaged in the activities specifically to receive this stream of benefits and knew that stream of benefits would stop if he did not support these particular projects."

Probe Hits Jefferson In Wallet (NOTP)

By Bill Walsh, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 6, 2006

Campaign support appears to dwindle

The federal bribery probe targeting U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is issue No. 1 in the race to unseat him, but it has also played a powerful role behind the scenes as the eight-term Democrat has struggled mightily to raise enough money to keep his re-election campaign afloat.

Though he has not been charged, revelations that the FBI found $90,000 stashed in Jefferson's freezer in August 2005 have earned him the cold shoulder from many once-loyal donors, the majority of whom have migrated to the campaign of state Rep. Karen Carter, also a Democrat, who has become the favorite of the political establishment.

Jefferson paid perhaps an even larger price when his fellow House Democrats voted in June to eject him from the influential Ways & Means Committee, whose jurisdiction over taxes and trade makes it a financial magnet for corporations and trade unions seeking to influence legislation.

Records show that dozens of political action committees donated to his campaign after the FBI raid. After he was thrown off Ways & Means, however, they abandoned him.

"Political action committees will continue to support an incumbent as long as he is in a position of authority," said Craig Holman of the nonprofit watchdog group Public Citizen. "As soon as he loses his authority, they funnel their money somewhere else."

Fundraising falters

Almost unheard of for an incumbent, Jefferson has trailed two of his challengers -- Carter and Derrick Shepherd -- in fundraising since they jumped into the race in the summer. Jefferson's $151,375 haul between July 23 and Sept. 30 was eclipsed by Carter's $327,162 and Shepherd's $199,900.

A fourth major Democratic candidate, Troy Carter, has raised just $79,900 for the entire campaign. Republican Joe Lavigne, who has been in the race the longest, raised money early on at an impressive clip, but the pace slowed as prominent Republican benefactors -- such as developer Joe Canizaro, shipbuilder Boysie Bollinger and funeral industry executive Frank Stewart -- lined up behind Karen Carter.

A review of Jefferson's campaign finance reports show that those who have stuck with him financially are members of his family, long-time friends and business associates, a few fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus and a smattering of sympathetic businesses and unions.

Among the loyal are: state Sen. Cleo Fields, a former U.S. representative and gubernatorial candidate; former Jefferson law partner Trevor Bryan; New Orleans attorney Robert Harvey; Liberty Bank President Alden McDonald; U.S. Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C.; janitorial company owner Burnell Moliere; Jefferson's pastor and influential African-American leader Bishop Paul Morton; former state Sen. Sammy Nunez; technology company owner Bobby Savoie; and engineering company President George Kleinpeter.

"He's been a good friend for a long time," said Kleinpeter, president of Burk-Kleinpeter Inc. Asked about the federal probe, Kleinpeter said, "I'm not judge and jury on those kinds of things," before abruptly ending the call.

Several other Jefferson donors declined to be interviewed or return phone calls for comment.

Long-time donors vanish

Jefferson campaign finance reports are littered with names of long-time donors who pulled up stakes in the face of the federal probe, which has focused on Jefferson's efforts to help U.S. businesses land contracts in West Africa. Even worse for the embattled congressman, those once-reliable donors have tended to ally themselves with his leading opponent, Karen Carter. Among those who switched were construction company President Robert Boh; restaurateur Ralph Brennan; import-export company owner John Georges; New Orleans lawyer Allan Kanner; and former Louisiana Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, a former Jefferson colleague in the Louisiana congressional delegation.

Johnston and former Sen. John Breaux, D-La., both longtime Jefferson backers, threw their support to Karen Carter late in the summer. Both have raised money for her and introduced her around Washington.

"We stayed with him as long as we reasonably could," said Hunter Johnston, the senator's son and a lobbyist. "Our relationship with Jeff goes way back. But he has not left any of his friends with any reasonable, plausible explanation of what's going on. New Orleans can't afford to be represented by someone whose reputation and effectiveness is so diminished."

PAC support dwindles

Dozens of corporate and labor union political action committees have evidently come to the same conclusion about Jefferson's clout on Capitol Hill. Businesses and labor groups such as Wal-Mart, Pfizer, Microsoft, Harrah's Entertainment, Entergy, BellSouth, Northrop Grumman, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America and associations of accountants and anesthesiologists gave generously to Jefferson after the Aug. 4, 2005, raid on his home by the FBI.

Despite the bad publicity, Jefferson raked in $53,750 in PAC contributions between Jan. 1 and June 15, the day the Democrats voted him off the Ways & Means Committee, records show. Since then, however, PAC giving to Jefferson has plummeted to $11,000, according to campaign finance reports.

Arguably the most loyal PAC has been the American Federation of Teachers, which donated $5,000 after the FBI raid and another $5,000 after his ejection from the committee.

"I'm not the one who could give you a comment on that," said union spokesman George Jackson. "I imagine it would be because he consistently votes in our favor on issues. I don't believe he has been formally indicted, has he?"

Although records show Karen Carter has been the main beneficiary of one-time Jefferson donors, Shepherd has lifted himself into the upper tier of candidates in the 13-candidate field with some aggressive fundraising of his own. His political base is the West Bank, but he has received contributions from throughout the 2nd Congressional District, which stretches from Jefferson Parish nearly to the Mississippi state line.

Shepherd, who is African -- American, also has received financial support from some prominent white donors such as architectural company owner William Sizeler, lawyer Kenneth Pickering and Audubon Institute CEO Ron Forman. Lawyers and developers were among his top contributors, according to the campaign finance Web site PoliticalMoneyLine.

Troy Carter has struggled to raise money. He has banked some contributions from business owners in the French Quarter, whom he used to represent on the City Council. But he also appears to be carrying a $122,129 debt stemming from his failed mayoral bid in 2002.

Tuesday's election is all but certain to prompt a December runoff between the top two vote-getters. But with the field still unpredictable, some donors are hedging their bets. Campaign finance records show that Kleinpeter, the engineering company president, gave $1,000 to Jefferson's re-election campaign on Sept. 25. He contributed $1,000 to Karen Carter, records show, the next day.

2 Prison Guards Found Guilty (ORS/AP)

By Bill Kaczor, The Associated Press

The Orlando Sentinel, November 4, 2006

Tallahassee officers were convicted in a sex-for-contraband scheme.

TALLAHASSEE -- A jury found a male prison guard guilty of bribery and another guilty of witness tampering Friday in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended with a deadly shootout at a federal prison for women.

DOJ_NMG_0091200

A U.S. District Court jury convicted Gregory Dixon of three counts of bribery and Alan Moore of witness tampering. The jury also found both guilty of conspiracy to accept illegal gratuities after deliberating nearly eight hours. Moore also was convicted of accepting an illegal gratuity.

"Any prosecution is trying to send a message," Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls said after the verdict.

Defense lawyer Robert Harper said he didn't think it would be the right kind of message, though.

"This case to me sends a dangerous message to every male correctional officer at every female correctional institution," Harper said.

Three other guards previously had pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges. A sixth guard, Ralph Hill, was killed in the June 21 gunfight that he started at Tallahassee Correctional Institution when federal agents came to arrest them, officials said.

Justice Department special agent William "Buddy" Sentner also was killed, and a prison officer assisting in the arrests was wounded.

Judge Robert Hinkle set sentencing for Jan. 10. Dixon could face up to 47 years in prison, while Moore faces 14 years. Hinkle threw out the most serious charges of conspiracy to commit extortion and mail fraud, citing insufficient evidence, and the jury acquitted both men of conspiracy to commit bribery.

Neither defendant showed emotion when the verdicts were read as they sat at the defense table with their lawyers. Neither would comment.

Harper, who represents Moore, said post-conviction motions are pending or will be filed with Hinkle to seek reversal of the convictions. Dixon's lawyer, Thomas Findley, said his client would appeal at the appropriate time.

More than a dozen current and former inmates, some in prison uniforms and chains, testified against the two guards during the weeklong trial. Some said they traded sex for such commonplace items as cigarettes, cigars, gum and cosmetics. None claimed to receive drugs or alcohol.

Others said they acted as lookouts or paid guards for contraband.

Davis argued there was an unwritten, sometimes unspoken, understanding among guards and inmates that sex and money could be swapped for contraband.

"They lived in an environment where rumor abounded," Davis said.

FBI May Use Billboards In Art Hunt (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

Agency seeks leads in Gardner theft

The FBI is considering a billboard campaign as part of its international hunt for $300 million worth of artwork that was stolen from the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston in 1990 by thieves who masqueraded as police officers to get inside, according to the agency

"We are evaluating investigative techniques designed to solicit information from the public regarding the investigation, including the use of billboards," said Thomas Larned, an assistant special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office.

The Financial Times of London reported on Oct. 21 that Eric Ives, head of the FBI's major theft unit in Washington, said the FBI planned to appeal for the public's help on billboards posted throughout the United States, and possibly overseas, sometime next year. Ives could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Larned said that using billboards as part of a publicity campaign was under consideration, "however we have no imminent plans."

The stolen artwork includes a Vermeer; three Rembrandts, including his only seascape; five Degas drawings; and a Manet.

Cathy Deely, a spokeswoman for the museum, declined to comment on the ongoing investigation or the possibility of a billboard campaign. But she said that "we are optimistic that they will be returned."

Julian Radcliffe -- chairman of the Art Loss Register in London, which is the world's largest database of stolen art and antiques dedicated to their recovery -- said he had never heard of billboards being used to help locate stolen pieces. But he added that law enforcement officials frequently advertise in art trade magazines.

"The people who might know about the paintings will tend to be criminals or near-criminals, and clearly the FBI has been working on those sorts of people in the past without a great deal of success," Radcliffe said. "So making a more general appeal may be necessary to widening the net, but I think the chances of it attracting somebody who knows where the pictures are is probably not very high."

FBI Leader In Boston Gets Post In D.C. (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 6, 2006

The agent who has run the FBI's Boston office for the past 3 1/2 years was promoted yesterday to a high-profile post at the agency's headquarters in Washington, D.C.

Kenneth W. Kaiser said it was an honor to be chosen to serve as assistant director of the Inspection Division, which evaluates and audits the work of the FBI's field offices, conducts internal investigations of alleged misconduct by bureau employees, and investigates shootings by FBI agents.

It will be a bittersweet departure for Kaiser, who said yesterday that he regrets being unable to capture fugitive gangster James "Whitey" Bulger while serving as special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office since March 2003.

But Kaiser, 50, said he believes that he has left the once-beleaguered office in better shape than he found it by repairing the FBI's relationship with other law enforcement agencies after it had been badly frayed by corrupt agents who protected Bulger from prosecution and helped him slip away just before his 1995 indictment.

"I really think that in the last 3 1/2 years we've changed the perception of what the FBI in Boston is all about," Kaiser said in a telephone interview from Washington. "I think the perception now is that the FBI is a team player . . . that we really are looking for Whitey Bulger, and that the Boston office isn't a corrupt office."

Kaiser said his advice to his successor will be to continue to devote a team of full-time agents and analysts to the hunt for Bulger, a longtime FBI informant wanted in the slayings of 19 people.

"I didn't even know who Whitey Bulger was really when I came here," he said. "Once you realize how important he is to the office and the community, it's important for the credibility of the FBI to continue to look for him very aggressively."

The FBI has launched a number of high-profile cases during Kaiser's tenure, including a probe into corruption on the Big Dig project, an operation that led to the indictment of three Boston police officers on drug-trafficking charges, and the indictment of Abdullah Khadr, a Canadian national and alleged Al Qaeda operative charged with conspiring to kill Americans overseas.

After Hurricane Katrina, Kaiser was deployed to Louisiana as commander of FBI Technical and Emergency Operations, coordinating the bureau's SWAT operations for high-risk arrests, rescues, and other federal operations.

He also oversaw security at the Super Bowl last year in Florida. .

Kaiser said he was on a temporary special assignment in Washington yesterday when he was notified by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III that his promotion had been approved by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. Kaiser is scheduled to return to Boston next month. It's unclear when he will start his new job.

Sharon Ormsby, an assistant special agent is in charge of the Boston office while Kaiser is away, but a permanent replacement has yet to be named.

An Illinois native and son of an FBI agent, Kaiser joined the FBI in May 1982 after four years as a diplomatic security agent for the US State Department.

He has held a number of positions with the agency, working in the Inspection Division in Washington, serving as second in command of the Indianapolis office and as a member of the counter-terrorism unit, where he helped plan security for the Olympic Games in Barcelona and Atlanta. Before coming to Boston, he was head of the New Orleans office.

He arrived in Boston a year after retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. was convicted of racketeering for protecting longtime FBI informants Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi from prosecution and warning Bulger to flee in advance of his federal indictment. Bulger was and still is one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted.

Congressional hearings into the FBI's mishandling of Bulger and Flemmi were underway. And there were two separate manhunts for Bulger, with the FBI leading one task force and Massachusetts State Police and the Drug Enforcement Administration spearheading the other.

When Kaiser arrived "he had no idea how deep the rift was, but he absolutely reached out," said Thomas G. Robbins, who retired as superintendent of the Massachusetts State Police in June. "He did a lot of repair work."

While bitterness remains in some law enforcement quarters over the Bulger scandal, Robbins credited Kaiser with getting the FBI and State Police working together on the Bulger case.

US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, who left Boston in August to serve as acting director of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said, "From the first day he arrived, he's really been a team builder, looking for opportunities to make sure everybody felt included." Sullivan credited him with forging partnerships with other agencies.

During Kaiser's tenure, the number of FBI joint task forces in Boston has grown from five to 21.

"I think what I do is play well in the sandbox with everybody," Kaiser said. "We continue to do what we need to do to move forward. . . . I tried to leave the place in a better position than when I got there and I think maybe I have."

Sullivan said yesterday that he has been assured by Washington officials that the commitment to finding Bulger will continue. "We all want the same thing, and that's for him to be captured," he said.

Shooting Victim Was Undercover (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

An Alexandria woman fatally shot last month in what police are calling a targeted hit worked undercover and cooperated with the FBI in violent-crime and drug cases up and down the East Coast, previously sealed records show.

Restaurant owner Bethlehem Ayele, 34, assisted in a homicide investigation in Connecticut, arranged an FBI sting in Florida and testified against drug dealers in the District.

Miss Ayele, 34, was fatally shot Oct. 25 in Alexandria while waiting at a stoplight at Mount Vernon and Commonwealth avenues in the city's Del Ray section.

The shooting prompted immediate speculation about whether Miss Ayele's death was tied to her testimony against members of the so-called Murder Inc. drug gang in the District.

But previously sealed court records show Miss Ayele also provided valuable help in several other felony cases over the years. Police say they are looking into whether her cooperation in other cases played a role in the shooting.

"Detectives still believe she was targeted, but they have not determined exactly why," Amy Bertsch, a spokeswoman for the Alexandria Police Department, said yesterday.

"The detectives are aware of all of those aspects," Miss Bertsch said. "They just don't know if they're connected to her murder. It's certainly something they're investigating."

According to unsealed records in federal court in the District, Miss Ayele debriefed detectives in a double homicide in Connecticut.

In Florida, she worked with the FBI to set up a cocaine buy between a drug dealer and an undercover FBI agent.

She cooperated in the investigation of a drug ring in the District. She testified publicly in the 2003 and 2004 Murder Inc. trial, linking two men to the conspiracy. Various members of the gang were convicted in 31 separate murders.

Miss Ayele's cooperation began after her arrest by U.S. Park Police in April 2000, when she was stopped for a traffic violation and officers found $20,000 in cash, drugs and a handgun in her van, according to court records.

She pleaded guilty to conspiracy in December 2000, agreeing to cooperate and forfeit more than $200,000 in seized cash, two cars and jewelry.

According to court records, there was concern about Miss Ayele's safety as a cooperating witness during her case.

In 2001, a federal magistrate judge ruled that her case should be kept off the public docket, writing that "her cooperation, due to the nature of the case, places the personal safety of the defendant and the officers and agents working with her at substantial risk."

A provision in her plea deal stated that the U.S. attorney's office in the District would back her entrance into the federal witness protection program.

It is not clear whether Miss Ayele ever opted to go into the program. Federal authorities and Miss Ayele's attorney declined to comment for this story.

When she was killed, Miss Ayele was working as a real estate agent in Alexandria. She also ran the Ohio Restaurant on H Street in Northeast. The restaurant remains closed, and family members could not be reached for comment.

According to court records, Miss Ayele was held without bond after her arrest. She was released into the custody of an FBI special agent to help in undercover investigations, including cases in Florida and Georgia.

California 'Pot Docs' Put Selves At Risk (USAT/AP)

By Lisa Leff, Associated Press

USA Today, November 6, 2006

COOL, Calif. — Mollie Fry, a doctor, never thought telling her patients where to get the medicine she recommended for pain, depression and nausea would be a problem.

Federal drug agents who raided her home and office thought otherwise, and she was indicted last year on felony charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana.

"I assumed the fact that I had 'M.D.' at the end of my name gave me the right to make judgments about people's health," said Fry, who estimates she has issued thousands of cannabis recommendations since setting up her thriving practice northeast of Sacramento in 1999.

Since California passed the nation's first medical marijuana law a decade ago, a provision requiring written doctor approval to grow and buy pot has created conflict between the state mandate and federal drug laws, and strained the doctor-patient relationship.

Until the stalemate is resolved, doctors recommending marijuana do it with trepidation and a good deal of risk.

Medical marijuana advocates estimate that 1,500 doctors, mostly oncologists and AIDS specialists, have authorized pot for at least one patient. But most recommendations have come from about 15 self-appointed specialists, the so-called "pot docs," who charge $150 and up to walk what the California Medical Association calls "a gray area between the clearly permissible and clearly impermissible categories of action."

Following complaints by local law enforcement, nearly all have been investigated by the state board that licenses and disciplines physicians. Four had devoted their practices to acting as medical marijuana consultants and ultimately were sanctioned, ranging from the public rebuke that Fry got to having their licenses suspended.

California's medical marijuana law, also known as Proposition 215, named a host of ailments for which marijuana might prove helpful in easing symptoms: cancer, anorexia, AIDS, glaucoma, arthritis, migraine.

Unlike medical marijuana laws enacted in 10 other states, California's also gave doctors discretion to certify patients with "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief," leaving open the possibility that recommendations could be made to people who did not need them.

David Thornton, executive director of the California Medical Board, said that until the board issued guidelines two years ago outlining what constituted "accepted medical standards," physicians pretty much had to figure it out on their own. Most concluded it was not worth the risk.

Although a federal appeals court ruled four years ago that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration cannot go after doctors merely because they recommend marijuana to patients, the state medical board's guidelines make it clear the ruling did not amount to immunity either from prosecution or disciplinary proceedings.

The board advises doctors that relying on a patient's word instead of prior medical records to determine whether a marijuana recommendation is appropriate could constitute medical negligence. Failing to conduct an independent exam or to consider whether another drug would be as effective could lead to charges of unprofessional conduct.

The California Medical Association is even more explicit, warning doctors never to tell patients where to get pot and urging them to remind patients of possible side effects. Discussing dosages with patients, opining on whether they should smoke or eat marijuana, and signing a form that enables patients to obtain a state-issued medical marijuana ID card also are steps the medical association cautions could lead to them being sanctioned.

Frank Lucido, a Berkeley physician who devotes about 30% of his practice to working with medical marijuana patients, said he abides by those recommendations, but thinks pot docs are being held to higher standards than doctors who prescribe lots of Viagra, prescription painkillers and other abused medications. Doctors who prescribe sleeping pills for patients who complain of insomnia, Lucido noted, are not at risk of being called quacks if they don't do a hands-on exam or develop a long-term treatment plan.

Fry, 50, who is awaiting trial, continues signing recommendation forms for patients who come to see her from throughout the state. She no longer sells her patients starter plants, but freely tells them about what she sees as the spiritual, emotional and economic benefits of growing their own pot.

"What did I take an oath to do? To do no harm and to alleviate pain and suffering," Fry said. "I'm going to be true to my oath, and I'm even willing to go to prison for it."

Carlyle-Clarke Pleads Guilty To Drug Conspiracy (MR)

Aristocrat admits responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana

A British aristocrat who fought extradition to the United States for the better part of a decade stood in handcuffs and leg shackles Friday before a federal judge in Mobile to admit his guilt in a massive drug conspiracy.

Giles Richard Carlyle-Clarke, who traces his family roots in England to 1066, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. He admitted responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana that came into the country by way of Baldwin County and St. Petersburg, Fla.

Prosecutors hailed the plea as the latest victory in an investigation that dates to the 1980s and has resulted in more than 70 indictments and 65 convictions.

"It was a significant case to our office and I think to the DEA (Drug Enforcement Administration)," Assistant U.S. Attorney Gloria Bedwell said.

And the investigation still is not over, Bedwell said. The government continues to search for about five fugitives who investigators believe are hiding in foreign countries.

Carlyle-Clarke's plea agreement contains a standard provision allowing him the chance to cut his sentence if he provides information helpful to the investigation. Bedwell said she does not know if Carlyle-Clarke has kept in touch with any co-conspirators or has any other useful information.

If sentenced to the low end of advisory sentencing guidelines, Carlyle-Clarke would serve a prison term of 12 years and seven months. Prosecutors have agreed to support Carlye-Clarke if he seeks to serve that time in his home country.

Defense attorney Jeff Deen said after Friday's hearing that his client had no criminal record before or after his involvement with the Jamaican marijuana operation.

"This is all things that happened a long time ago when he was a much younger man," Deen said. "He's just trying to atone for his misdeeds."

Carlyle-Clarke, 49, admitted in his written plea agreement that he has was recruited by a friend, Robert Delisser, to participate in a Jamaica-based drug running operation. Delisser, who remains at large, suggested Michael Beauchemin hire Carlyle-Clarke, the plea agreement states.

Carlyle-Clarke transported about 200 pounds of marijuana on his sailboat, the Can-Can, from the Caribbean island nation to St. Petersburg in 1986.

The following year, Carlyle-Clarke captained Beauchemin's vessel, which contained a larger load, some 7,000 to 8,000 pounds of marijuana. He received $500,000, according to law enforcement investigators.

In early 1988, Beauchemin returned to Jamaica and arranged for another 8,000-pound load to be smuggled into the country, this time through Baldwin County. All of the marijuana was stored in a rented house in Baldwin County. The high-quality marijuana from that shipment eventually was sold, while the lower-quality marijuana was moved to a farmhouse on Baldwin County 97.

Carlyle-Clarke traveled to Baldwin County on Delisser's behalf and inspected the drugs stored at that farmhouse, according to the facts laid out in the plea agreement.

The Alabama Marine Police launched the investigation in May 1988 after receiving reports of people unloading a sailboat moored in the area of Roberts Bayou in south Baldwin County. The Marine Police turned the matter over to the DEA, which got a search warrant for a house in Elberta and the sailboat. Agents found thousands of pounds of marijuana and hundreds of pounds of hashish oil stored in a pier house on the property and uncovered evidence of the intricate distribution network.

Evidence seized included a videotape detailing the construction of the sailboat, which had a double hull with a large secret storage compartment in between. The four people arrested on the property led investigators to other conspirators, who in turn gave up others.

A federal grand jury in Mobile indicted Carlyle-Clarke in 1992. British authorities arrested him in January 1998 but allowed him to remain free at his family's 1,200-acre ancestral estate in England while he fought extradition to the United States. By July, he finally had exhausted his appeals and turned himself in to federal marshals at London's Heathrow Airport.

S. Texas Law Enforcement Seeks Drug Incinerator (HC/AP)

Houston Chronicle, November 6, 2006

McAllen chief says nearby facility would cut costly trips to Dallas to destroy contraband

MCALLEN — Asked recently what Texas could do to help a border police department like McAllen's, Chief Victor Rodriguez had a ready answer: Give us a nearby place to burn seized drugs.

He then outlined a situation that stunned members of the state Senate Criminal Justice Committee holding a field hearing in the Rio Grande Valley.

In a region that is a gateway for drugs coming from Latin America and bound for cities throughout the United States, destroying drugs means sending a caravan of vehicles and officers on a two-day trip costing $8,000 to $10,000.

For McAllen, in particular, it means unloading tons of contraband from the 8-foot by 40-foot evidence bunker and into a rented moving van, which is then driven to a privately run incinerator near Dallas.

It's a journey nearly the length of Texas, and a task that requires seven or eight officers. There's got to be backup vehicles, officers to guard the drugs and, yes, each other. In recent years local police chiefs as well as U.S. Customs and Border Patrol agents have been prosecuted for bribery for helping drug traffickers get loads north.

Labor regulations require an overnight stop after such a long drive, adding lodging on top of overtime costs. Then there's the bill for the actual burn — calculated at about 40 cents to 50 cents per pound for several thousand pounds. It's a trip that's repeated several times a year.

"The border, it is an international front; it does yield for us down here large seizures of contraband," Rodriguez said. "Not only are we saddled with the border geographically, above and beyond that we have to pay to destroy this stuff, and it can get expensive."

Webb County Sheriff's Department Capt. Ted Garcia agreed. The county's evidence room has filled rapidly in recent months from a spree of cocaine seizures, he said, meaning another costly trip to Dallas is imminent.

"You would think they would have one closer," he said.

3 private operators in stateThere are three main facilities in Texas for incinerating drugs, state Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Tela Mange said, and all are privately operated.

For security reasons, she asked that they not be identified by name. Besides Dallas, one is in El Paso, and the other is in the northeastern corner of the state near Louisiana.

The El Paso facility is accessible to police along the state's far western border with Mexico. But for Laredo and cities in the lower Rio Grande Valley it's about as distant as Dallas or Louisiana.

"You have to go by whatever TCEQ regulations are, so that can get kind of complicated and expensive," Mange said. "When you've got about a million pounds, it can add up."

The Texas Commission on Environmental Quality requires incinerators for illegal drugs be dual chamber, burn at minimum temperatures of 1,400 degrees Fahrenheit and have stacks stretching at least six feet above any structure within 150 feet.

Cocaine, opiate and methamphetamine burns are limited to 10 pounds in an eight-hour period, marijuana to no more than 500 pounds an hour. Only specific fuels can be used — sweet natural gas, liquid petroleum gas, electric power or fuel oil with less than one-half percent sulfur by weight.

U.S. Customs and Protection routinely makes seizures of a ton or more along the border, with Border Patrol agents frequently coming upon bales of marijuana or cocaine unloaded on the banks of the Rio Grande or into dump trucks or other vehicles.

Exploring optionsThe federal Drug Enforcement Administration keeps tallies on federal seizures as well as larger ones by local police departments. During fiscal 2005, 1,077 tons of marijuana, 26 tons of cocaine, 715 pounds of heroin and 3.2 tons of methamphetamine were seized along the southwest border.

Evidence must be kept until a trafficker is convicted, and when it comes time to destroy the drugs the federal government also faces a challenge.

"For obvious reasons of security and safety, we can't reveal where we burn or destroy our evidence, but it is a concern for us in terms of the costliness of it," Houston-based DEA spokesman Ray D'Alessio said. "We're exploring different options right now."

It would cost at least $5 million to build a new drug incinerator, according to one estimate.

State Sen. John Whitmire, the Houston Democrat who chairs the Senate Criminal Justice Committee, said he was astonished by Rodriguez's testimony. "I promise you we'll fix this," he said at the Aug. 30 field hearing at McAllen City Hall.

Whitmire aide Larance Coleman said research into the logistics of a local facility is just beginning. "We haven't ever really looked into this before," he said.

Guilty Plea In Murder For Hire Case (HC)

By Brian Rogers

Houston Chronicle, November 6, 2006

DEA agent's ex-wife receives deferred sentence

A Houston U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent's ex-wife pleaded guilty Friday to trying to hire someone to kill him.

Pamela Bishop, 38, got deferred adjudication for solicitation of capital murder of Donald Noell Bishop. The conviction will be dropped from her criminal record if she stays out of trouble the next six years.

Bishop, who had been held in jail in lieu of $500,000 bail since her arrest in early October, will pay a $500 fine and do 300 hours of community service.

Except for saying the incident stemmed from an acrimonious divorce, her attorney, Jay Dedrick, declined to comment on the circumstances surrounding the charge because the couple are still in a custody fight for their children, a 13-year-old boy and a 6-year-old girl.

Prosecutor Kelly Siegler said the plea bargain was unusual, but it's what Bishop's ex-husband wanted.

"He's a stand-up guy," Siegler said. "And that's what he wanted, so that's what we decided to do."

Siegler said authorities were notified when one of the men Bishop asked to kill her ex-husband developed a conscience.

"She was talking to one of the would-be killers and he told the DEA," Siegler said. She said the agency contacted the Harris County Sheriff's Office to investigate and make the arrest.

She also said Bishop would not be allowed to contact her ex-husband or her children except through the supervised visits as a condition of the plea agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Texas Starts Internet Border Watch (AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 4, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas -- Texas launched its ambitious effort to use Internet users to watch the border for illegal immigrants. But the network of surveillance cameras was plagued by technical problems, the images were grainy and the cameras were placed so high that it was hard to distinguish a person from, say, a bush.

Republican Gov. Rick Perry, who announced plans over the summer to spend $5 million on the virtual posse, asked for "forgiveness on the front end of this," but dismissed the problems as routine computer glitches.

"I'm sure that as you start a big program like this that you will have some glitches," Mr. Perry, who is up for re-election, said Friday in Brownsville. "My wife's computer is not working this morning."

The cameras will operate at criminal hotspots. Members of the public who see something suspicious over the Web cameras can e-mail authorities.

However, the Web site doesn't work on some Internet browsers. The images were grainy and it was difficult to tell whether, say, a group of people on the screen was a family crossing a crowded parking lot or a band of smugglers with their human cargo. The view from one camera on the Rio Grande was largely obscured by a bush. In another, all that was visible was the license plates on passing cars.

When he announced the program in June, Mr. Perry said the images would be available online in a month. While the first cameras were installed within a month, and law enforcement officers have been watching them since then, the public Web site was not up and running until late Thursday.

Perry spokeswoman Kathy Walt said that it proved more difficult than expected to get the public site running and that the launch so close to the election was a coincidence. Law enforcement officials have access to footage from about 15 cameras, Ms. Walt said, but only eight appear on the Web site.

Ms. Walt said authorities have been trying to work out technical issues, such as the proper distance and how to achieve good picture quality. Since much of the border is undeveloped land, the designers of the system also had to figure out how to use batteries or solar power and how to transmit by wireless signal.

Six companies have donated their time and camera equipment, Walt said. The state paid a seventh company $100,000 to create and run the Web site. Within a few days, the state plans to ask companies to submit proposals to install dozens of additional cameras.

Some civil rights groups have criticized the virtual border watch plan, saying it will instill fear in border communities and could lead to fraudulent crime reports and racial profiling.

Web Cameras Will Focus Eyes Of Texas On Border (FWST)

By Patrick Mcgee

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 4, 2006

Live images from cameras set up along the Mexican border became available for the first time Thursday, in the hope that alert residents can help fight crime and illegal crossings into Texas.

People can visit a Web site, www.texasborderwatch.com, where they can view selected areas and report suspicious activity by clicking an online button.

Gov. Rick Perry's office has installed 15 cameras since June, and seven of them are being tested on the Web site.

But many of the Internet links were not working Friday, and some that did work didn't include the promised online button to click to report suspicious activity.

Gov. Rick Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said Friday that cameras may have been down for temporary adjustments and that the Web site is still a "test site."

"The intent, particularly with the public Web site, is to model the successful neighborhood watch programs we have had for years," she said. "The idea is, the more eyes you have monitoring, the more success you will have in reducing crime."

Perry, who is running for re-election, has featured increased efforts to secure the border in some of his campaign ads for Tuesday's election.

The Border Patrol has cameras in every sector of Texas' border with Mexico, said Mike Friel, spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

He said the cameras work in daylight or at night and can be rotated 180 degrees by the Border Patrol agents or National Guardsmen who use them.

Several of the cameras' feeds appear in different formats.

The cameras were installed free by companies that hope to win contracts when the governor installs more, Walt said. Perry wants to have 70 to 100 cameras on the border eventually, she said.

Clicking the online button to report suspicious activity will alert officials in the operations center in Austin.

They will then notify local law enforcement officials, who can notify the Border Patrol if necessary, she said.

Rogelio Nuñez, director of Proyecto Libertad, an immigrant rights organization based in the border town of Harlingen, said the state cameras are a terrible idea.

"It's just a total misuse of money," he said.

"This is just another ploy of the Republican Party to again appeal to some sentiment out there in the community that there is this relationship with immigration and terrorism," Nuñez said.

He expressed skepticism about the cameras being used to reduce crime.

"There's high areas of crime in urban areas like Houston and Dallas. Why are we singling out the border?" he asked.

Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez said he thinks the cameras can only help.

"Anything that would help us in law enforcement would be appreciated," said Gonzalez, who is chairman of the Texas Border Sheriffs Association.

"If citizens can do it for us, great. We can always use volunteers," he said.

Del Rio Police Chief Waylon Bullard said the cameras could be helpful, especially if they are well-placed.

"We're hoping that some of them will be installed in the city or close to the city," he said. "We don't have anyone that's set up to monitor them full time, so the citizens [watching online] will be a great help," he said.

Steve Taylor, editor of the Rio Grande Guardian, an online newsletter about Texas' border with Mexico, said he doesn't think many border-area residents will log onto the Web site because many have no computers and no interest in reporting illegal immigrants.

"Because of the families' ties on both sides of the border, there's a lot of sympathy" for immigrants, he said.

"There's probably more tolerance here than in other parts of the state."

A closely watched immigration fight (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, November 5, 2006

A Closely Watched Immigration Fight

The country's immigration battle took another turn last week when a federal judge blocked two landmark immigration ordinances in Hazleton, Pa., from being enforced just hours before they were to go into effect. The measures, now on hold until November 14, would have allowed city officials to fine landlords housing illegal immigrants and deny business permits to companies that hire them. Judge James Munley said enforcement would cause "irreparable harm" to businesses catering to Hispanics. His decision was in response to a suit filed by Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union.

The case is being watched, because towns like Valley Park, Mo., and Riverside, N.J., have copycat measures in place; others have considered them. Hazleton was the first city to try a landlord-fine approach, which supporters hoped was more defensible than other attempts to limit immigrant benefits. Said Hazleton Mayor Lou Barletta, "We have only begun to fight."

Harsh Report on a Fatal Blast

Budget cuts and negligence helped ignite the worst industrial accident in 10 years, according to a federal report released last week. The March 2005 explosion at BP's Texas City, Texas, refinery killed 15 people, injured 180, and left the London-based oil company mired in lawsuits. The Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board has no legal power, but its conclusions that "aging infrastructure, overzealous cost-cutting, inadequate design, and risk blindness" contributed to the explosion will no doubt be cited in pending cases.

BP has acknowledged some safety problems at the refinery. But BP places blame on a few low-ranking employees, arguing that if proper "procedure had been followed ... this incident would not have happened."

The Texas City blast isn't the firm's only problem. BP is also under investigation for failing to fix a corroded pipeline that burst in Alaska's Prudhoe Bay earlier this year.

Tragic Score Card Underground

It has been a horrific year in the nation's mines. In January, 12 workers perished at West Virginia's Sago Mine, one of the worst disasters on record. Last week, one miner was killed and another seriously wounded in Pineville, W.Va., when a shuttle car they were trying to repair unexpectedly began to move, striking one miner and pinning the second against a wall. The accident raised this year's death toll to 43 nationwide, the highest level in more than a decade; the dangerous winter season still looms. Twenty-two of those deaths have occurred in West Virginia-the most there in 25 years. Tests by the state's mine safety office recently found that some of the air packs miners carry to provide an extra hour of oxygen have suffered heat damage; Randal McCloy Jr., the sole survivor of the Sago Mine tragedy, has sued the packs' maker. West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin is pushing for legislation next year that would improve safety.

It's a Sort-of South Florida Story

Sports agent Gustavo "Gus" Dominguez was thrown, well, a curveball last week. A federal grand jury in Miami indicted the California-based agent for allegedly smuggling professional baseball prospects to the United States from Cuba. The indictment alleges Dominguez traveled by boat to the island in July 2004, picking up 22 Cuban nationals-baseball players among them-before being intercepted by American law enforcement on the return trip; the nationals were returned to Cuba. The next month, Dominguez allegedly tried again, this time successfully bringing 19 Cubans stateside, including several ballplayers. Attorney Susan Dmitrovsky, who represents Dominguez, expressed confidence he will prevail. She called the United States a "vanguard for those seeking freedom" and said her client had merely "advance[d] that American heritage" lawfully. But Immigration and Customs Enforcement Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said the case boiled down to human smuggling: "The ringleaders put the lives of illegal immigrants at risk and sought to profit from their labor."

Border Agents Seek New Trial (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Two U.S. Border Patrol agents sentenced to lengthy prison terms for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect as he fled across the Rio Grande want a new trial, saying three jurors claim they were pressured into returning guilty verdicts.

Jose Alonso Compean, 28, and Ignacio Ramos, 37, were sentenced Oct. 19 by U.S. District Court Judge Kathleen Cardone in El Paso, Texas, to 12 and 11 years in prison, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A federal jury convicted the two men in March after a two-week trial, and Judge Cardone ordered them to report to prison Jan. 17.

Ramos' El Paso-based attorney, Mary Stillinger, plans to appeal the case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans based, in part, on sworn affidavits of three jurors -- Robert Gourley, Claudia Torres and Edine Woods -- who said they were incorrectly instructed that their verdict had to be unanimous and that the judge would not accept a hung jury.

"I don't remember exactly what it was that made me change my vote to guilty on these charges, but I know I was very influenced by my belief, based on the other jurors statement, that we could not have a hung jury," Ms. Woods said in her affidavit. "I think I might not have changed my vote to guilty if I had known that was an option."

Mr. Gourley and Ms. Torres said they were told by the jury foreman that Judge Cardone would not accept a hung jury.

"I had no reason to doubt the foreman," Mr. Gourley wrote.

Ms. Stillinger has argued that the jurors "essentially conceded their votes" when they saw they could not convince the majority otherwise, thinking "they did not have the option to stick to their guns and prevent a unanimous verdict."

The defense attorney made the same argument to Judge Cardone before the sentencing, but she rejected it.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, was given immunity and agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for immunity after an investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General.

The immunity deal protected Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country as a drug smuggler. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in the van he abandoned near the border.

Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and refused efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Aldrete-Davila managed to cross the border and escape in a waiting van.

In a case brought by U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, the government said the agents "shot an unarmed, fleeing suspect in the back and lied about it." He said they "fired their weapons at a man who had attempted to surrender by holding his open hands in the air."

Drones to patrol mexican border (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0091209

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

U.S. Customs and Border Protection has launched its newest weapon in securing the nation's borders with the debut of an unmanned aerial vehicle capable of providing an "eye in the sky" for Border Patrol agents on the ground.

"Our front-line agents deserve proven, effective technology that equips them to secure our borders and to prevent terrorism," CBP Commissioner W. Ralph Basham said. "This unmanned aircraft system provides us with the situational awareness we need to more effectively deny illegal entry at our nation's borders."

The agency's new unmanned aircraft, known as the MQ-9 Predator B, began limited operations last week from Libby Army Airfield in Fort Huachuca, Ariz., to support enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexico border. The aircraft was introduced during ceremonies Tuesday in Arizona hosted by Air and Marine Assistant Commissioner Michael Kostelnik.

The agency hopes to expand operations to the California and New Mexico state lines in the next month.

Unmanned aircraft give the agency improved and expanded mission capabilities to meet what Mr. Basham has described as "the continuing terrorist threat to our nation." He said the program supports efforts by CBP to expand specialized teams and rapid-response capabilities within the agency to enhance control of the nation's borders.

New unmanned aircraft systems within CBP are designed to augment crewed air and marine assets and ground interdiction agents already on the southwest border. In fiscal 2007, the aircraft will complement crewed air and marine assets and ground interdiction agents on the northern border and the Gulf Coast.

Mr. Basham said the aircraft have the potential to coordinate operations within other Department of Homeland Security agencies, including the U.S. Coast Guard and the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said his agency also will work closely with the Defense Department to "gain efficiencies in acquisition, testing, training and deployment."

In 2004, CBP conducted operational tests and evaluations using the Hunter and Hermes unmanned aircraft vehicles, and last year, the agency conducted operational tests using the MQ-9 Predator B. Since 2004, unmanned aircraft have flown 1,878 hours and directly contributed to 3,603 arrests and the seizure of 11,000 pounds of marijuana.

Mr. Basham has called border enforcement "a legal issue as well as a matter of national security," saying the United States "simply must keep people from crossing our borders undetected if we are going to protect our homeland."

To achieve that goal, he has been a vigorous proponent of efforts to better secure the border through a strategy aimed at increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and equipping them with the proper tools, including new roads, lights, fences, barriers, upgraded technology and unmanned aerial vehicles.

After The Amnesty: 20 Years Later (CSM)

By Luis Andres Henao

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

Twenty years ago Monday, Congress passed the largest effort to date to curb undocumented immigration to this country. Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), employers were sanctioned for the first time for hiring undocumented workers. The bill also called for tighter controls along the Mexican border. But the bill was a compromise: Enforcement was balanced by an amnesty provision.

Under IRCA, undocumented immigrants who had lived in the United States prior to 1982 and those who had worked as seasonal agricultural workers before May 1986 could seek legal status and eventually US citizenship.

Nearly 3 million undocumented immigrants were granted legal residence under the amnesty. Most of them were Mexican (more than 80 percent) and lived in the Los Angeles area. Salvadorans, Filipinos, Haitians, Poles, and Vietnamese also benefited from the program.

But two decades later, illegal immigration is still a hot-button issue and amnesty is a dirty word to some. Private-citizen minutemen and National Guardsmen have rushed to the Mexican border. This spring, millions of undocumented immigrants and others marched in the streets of US cities to protest federal legislation that would criminalize illegal immigrants.

It's an issue that may reignite if a new Congress picks up the debate this coming January.

Amid the shouts of today are decades-old echoes from the IRCA.

Critics say the bill set a damaging precedent for future amnesties. IRCA supporters say the word "amnesty" mischaracterizes the bill's intent.

"An amnesty cleans people who have broken the law," says former US Rep. Romano Mazzoli (D) of Kentucky. He and former US Sen. Alan Simpson (R) of Wyoming were the primary architects and cosponsors of IRCA. "But in our bill, you had to prove that you were a law-abiding person who honored the institutions of our country.... So you can take your pick of euphemisms, but if you use the word 'amnesty,' people will get angry, throw their hands up in the air, and scream: 'They're rewarding people for misbehaving!' "

Today Mr. Mazzoli defends the bill as the best way to combat illegal immigration at the time. The six administrations that followed, he says, are to blame for not enforcing tighter restrictions. And now, "It's déjà vu all over again," Mazzoli says. "These are the same issues that we had 20 years ago."

William King Jr., was the Western regional director of the US Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and responsible for carrying out the amnesty program. He says that he had hope that the legislation would work at first. But IRCA was a three-legged stool, he says. One leg was employer sanctions, another was increased border security, and the third was the amnesty program. "In truth, only the amnesty program became a fact," he says, and the effort failed.

To John Keeley, a spokesman for the Center for Immigration Studies, a nonprofit group that wants tighter immigration controls, IRCA was well intentioned - but implementation was lacking. "There was a half-hearted attempt at immigration control by the late '80s and early '90s by the old INS," he says, but political pressure brought that to a "screeching halt" by the middle of the decade.

One of the big problems with the IRCA amnesty was all the counterfeit applications, especially from seasonal agricultural workers. Economists Pia Orrenius and Madeline Zavodny studied the effects of amnesty programs on undocumented immigration and presented their findings in the August 2003 issue of Demography magazine. They say that the number of seasonal workers qualifying for amnesty was about 300,000. But in the end, more than 1 million applications were granted. "Most people agree that there was substantial fraud because the document requirement and the residency requirement were quite low for that part of the program," Ms. Zavodny says.

"I don't think anyone says that it deterred illegal immigration," says Cecilia Muñoz, vice president of The National Council of La Raza, the nation's largest Latino advocacy group. "But it succeeded in legalizing 3 million people. Their wages went up, and they're fully integrated into American society." Rohan Baichu / Houston

'At first, I thought it might be a trap'

Rohan Baichu says that he has "a lot of jewelry." Mr. Baichu came to the United States from Guyana in 1981, wanting to become a boxer. Instead, he earned three World Series rings as a massage therapist and assistant training coach for the New York Yankees as well as a league championship with the Houston Astros. He is a certified pilot and masseur.

But during his first undocumented years in America, "just the day to day was a battle," he recalls.

Constantly worried about getting picked up by immigration officers, he had to give up his boxing dreams to work night shifts as a security guard.

Baichu was even offered a job with the city of New York by a police chief, who never suspected he was undocumented.

Disappointed with his prospects, he gave up on New York, packed two suitcases, and left for Canada in February 1986. His mother, a Canadian citizen, had offered him a new start through a residency card. But a few days later, he received a call from his girlfriend in New York. She was pregnant. Baichu came back immediately and took up his old job.

By this time, he had lost hope of obtaining a better career. Then came the amnesty. "At first," Baichu says. "I thought it might be a trap." He was so hesitant that he waited a year and applied right before the deadline.

With legal documents in hand, Baichu applied for a supervisor position at the security company. He even did a short stint working for a Wall Street technology company.

But Baichu regretted that he had never gotten an education. So he took out several loans and and moved to Colorado where he went to a community college and where he also earned a pilot's license at the age of 33.

By the time he got his pilot's license, though, flying jobs were scarce, and Baichu was soon looking for another career. So he turned to what he knew best. After years of running track and reading books on nutrition, he aced a professional-trainer exam and got a license in massage therapy.

One day while working at a New York gym, a friend told him the Yankees were looking for a staff trainer. Some weeks later, the team flew him to training camp in Florida for an interview. "When they saw me, they said: 'You're the man.... Can you start tomorrow?' "

Baichu has been in professional baseball ever since. During his time with the Yankees, he crisscrossed the country, shook the hands of two presidents, and earned three World Series championship rings.

He became so well regarded as a trainer that when Roger Clemens was traded from the Yankees to the Houston Astros, the pitcher asked his new team to hire Baichu from New York. He is grateful to "his good friend" Clemens and is proud of his friend's work ethic, describing it as one of the best in the game because, at the age 44, Clemens "works like an immigrant."

Baichu attributes his success to his determination and the possibilities that opened up to him after the amnesty. But he also points out that even those immigrants who haven't been as successful as he has still benefited a lot from the law. "They got their own success," he says. "Even if they ended up living in a rented apartment, they got peace, tranquillity, and values that carry them through."

This year, Baichu became a United States citizen and started a group that raises civic awareness through voter registration. Now that he's able to vote, he says he would support the passage of any legislation that benefits immigrants.

As an immigrant, Baichu says he's proud that one of his daughters - now a student at the University of Southern California - encouraged him to tell his story. "She understands the odds that we had to overcome and feels satisfied about where I'm at."

Baichu sees his future split between coaching and taking care of his two daughters and his adopted son, a 22-year-old Haitian athlete whom he met practicing track one day. Baichu is sponsoring him to attend college. Alfonso & Marta Castañeda / Los Angeles

The joy of security and work

When they crossed the US border with Mexico in the early 1970s, Alfonso Castañeda was a house painter; his wife, Marta, was a nurse. Almost three decades later, they still work in the same professions.

"I thought I could do something more," says Mrs. Castañeda who never managed to validate her degree and works as a nurse assistant at a private hospital. Mr. Castañeda, a stocky man with long sideburns, says he dreamed of saving enough to go back to Mexico, but never did.

The '86 amnesty did not give the Castañedas wealth or more education. But the passing of the bill brought them protection in the form of a disability check, workers' compensation, and the means to build toward a secure retirement. Their citizenship, and subsequent financial stability, helped them support their children Gerardo, a research assistant at a law firm, and Elsa, a computer science graduate from the University of Arizona who now works for her alma mater.

The couple also find small rewards in their own work routines.

"The youngest ones are 75," Marta says with a laugh, describing the elderly patients she helps. "It's beautiful when they recover and they get to go back to their families."

Alfonso started his own small painting business, but still climbs a ladder and takes out his brush every day. Despite the smell of paint, the rain and sun, he feels satisfied because at the end "you see the results." Mary Vega / Providence, R.I.

On that day, 'My soul came back to my body'

From breaking news to weather updates, Mary Vega listens closely and retells the story to thousands of Spanish-speakers in Rhode Island. She provides instantaneous English-Spanish dubbing for the nightly news at local ABC television affiliate WLNE.

But during her first years in the United States, only a few could hear her voice. Ms. Vega came to Providence from Colombia in 1980 and overstayed a tourist visa. Her legal status wouldn't allow her to drive a car, get medical care, or work at any job outside the service industry. Fearing deportation, she kept a low profile by caring for an elderly couple at a private residence in Providence.

"The American dream stays in dreams," Vega says of the time before the passing of the 1986 amnesty. "I think this is part of the problem.... What else can Latinos do if we're only allowed to clean bathrooms?"

Today, Vega still looks after the same couple. But through the amnesty, she also became a citizen, brought her three daughters to this country, and found a career in journalism, a field that she feels passionate about. "The day I was granted the amnesty, my soul came back to my body.... I was going to fight for what I wanted, and that's how it was."

Her daughters - also US citizens - study law and medicine, and the oldest works as a talent manager for a Miami hotel.

"I'm not a millionaire, but I have a Social Security number and ... I was able to get a federal loan for my daughter's college when I needed to," Vega says. As a result of her efforts, Vega pays taxes and hopes the skills her daughters learn in college will help them contribute to American society as well.

Vega's aspirations go beyond translating. On the weekends, she practices using editing software at the channel and watches every camera move closely. One day, she says, she will be on the other side of the camera as a television news producer. Marvin Andrade / Los Angeles

Out of civil war, into the University of Southern California

Marvin Andrade was 10 when he waved goodbye to his mother and young sisters through the rear window of a taxicab. At the time, "life wasn't worth much," he says.

Mr. Andrade's father - a grocery store owner - had received death threats from both sides in the Salvadoran civil war. While the armed forces suspected him of helping the guerrilla movement, the guerrilla fighters wanted him dead for refusing to provide them with supplies. In the middle of the night, and with only the clothes on their backs, father and son fled the conflict that killed more than 70,000 Salvadorans in the 1980s.

During a month-long journey in 1980, father and son traveled thousands of miles through Central America and Mexico to reach the banks of the Rio Grande across from El Paso, Texas. But as Marvin crossed the river on the shoulders of another man traveling with them, he could only think of "the land of Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck" that he had seen on TV. On the other side, sitting in a pickup bed on his way to Los Angeles, someone gave him a can of Coca-Coca. He had only seen bottles at home, and he clung to this soda can for a long time. It was his first memory of life in the United States.

Growing up undocumented in Los Angeles, Andrade remembers long hours spent standing on street corners with his father while they waited to be picked up for construction or gardening jobs. School was no easier, he says. He was mocked because of his accent and often called a "wetback."

But Andrade sought education as the way to battle the violence, poverty, and discrimination that rattled his early life.

On a high school field trip to the University of Southern California, he asked one of his counselors what his chances were of getting into such a place. "You're aiming too high," the counselor told him.

Those words stuck in his mind. But instead of discouraging him, they gave him resolve. He filled his days with activities to achieve that goal, volunteering at the nonprofit Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. And since he could not afford tuition or receive financial aid, he took night classes at East Los Angeles Community College in 1987.

A year earlier, when the amnesty passed, Andrade had applied to only one school: The University of Southern California. Andrade was accepted in 1988 and eventually received a degree from USC in international politics.

Today, Andrade helps immigrant children integrate into American society. As the education director for the Central American Resource Center, Andrade oversees more than 70 elementary and middle school students who come to the center for after-school tutoring in English, math, and art.

"The things I was told growing up had an effect on me," says Andrade. "It made me be the guy that wants to spur change, and it's the reason why I'm here."

As he enters a classroom, paper kites with Mexican, Salvadoran, and American flags hang over a group of students who are finishing math and reading assignments for tomorrow's class.

"The same dream I had of going to college," says Andrade, "is now shared by many students who by merit could go to the best schools, but can't do so because they're undocumented."

He calls for urgent immigration reform and disagrees with the negative image that the '86 immigration law gathered.

"The word 'amnesty' gives the connotation of a pardon," he says. "My view is that it's not a crime to look for the betterment of your family. [Illegal immigrants] risk their lives to work here. And through taxes, they contribute more than what they receive."

He's thankful for the law that opened the door to education and citizenship for him. "The amnesty allowed me to meet my wife, graduate from one of the best universities in the world, and own a house, which is part of the American dream."

Today, more than 25 members of his family, including his mom and two sisters, have joined him in Los Angeles. All benefited from the amnesty law.

Some months ago - and 20 years after the violent conflict that drove him from his land - Andrade went back to El Salvador; this time as an international peace observer and US citizen. Jose Ortiz / Los Angeles

The profound impact of 'this gift'

Jose Ortiz turned roadblocks into opportunities. Mr. Ortiz came to Los Angeles in 1981 at age 12 to escape the Salvadoran civil war. He enrolled in school and, with time, rose to the top of his high school class. Set on a career in architecture, he was offered a full scholarship to college. But without his green card, his dream was put on hold.

Twenty-six years later, Ortiz - now a citizen - continues to redefine himself: as a dental assistant, massage therapist, and entrepreneur. "When the amnesty came ... it opened my horizons. I was legal, and I had more options," he says in his native Spanish.

His determination carried him through difficult times. Disappointed that he was denied access to college, he immediately enrolled in X-ray technician courses that didn't require him to produce any citizenship documents. When his green card came through as a result of the '86 amnesty, he enrolled in courses sponsored by University of California, Los Angeles, and became a registered dental assistant. And because of the physical therapy that he received after an injury at work, he began a new career as a massage therapist.

Recently, he set up a financial firm that teaches Latinos how to manage their finances, from balancing a checkbook to investing in stocks. "My dream is to start a company that shows Salvadorans how to save and manage their remittances," he says, referring to the more than $2 billion sent each year by Salvadorans living abroad to family members at home. Foreign remittances are El Salvador's No. 1 source of income.

Ortiz also hopes to bring his parents here to live with him. "The amnesty," he says, "has had a profound impact not only on me but on many people who received this gift." But ultimately, "it comes down to you to make [this dream] a reality." Laureana Santana / Providence, R.I.

Reunited with her family, but struggling

Five giggling children, ages 1 through 10, run circles around Laureana Santana. They bump into one another while using every inch in the living room of Ms. Santana's small brick home in Providence's oldest housing project. There's a playground across the street, but they are not allowed to go outside - not since a 12-year-old boy was shot and killed two years ago while playing with friends nearby. "I don't want to take risks," she says.

Santana looks after as many as nine immigrant children throughout the day while their mothers work in factories around town. She obtained a family day-care certificate from the state six years ago.

In 1985, without a job and no prospects for one, she became desperate. So Santana floated on a raft from the Dominican Republic to Puerto Rico, leaving behind her three young children and hoping to find a better life for herself and her family.

"The first years were difficult," she says. To help support her children, she plowed fields and grew yucca and peanuts. "I was away from my children and every penny I made working in the fields I would send back to them."

In 1986, she benefited from a section in the bill that supported agricultural workers who had resided in any United States territory for more than 90 days prior to May 1986. Three years later, she left Puerto Rico for Providence, R.I. When she became a US citizen in 1989, the doors opened for other family members.

In 1995, she was able to bring her children to this country. Two years ago, her mother was able to come and live with her as well.

"The amnesty let me reunite with my children, and today, we're all together," she says.

Even when she is struggling to make ends meet, she believes that today's immigrants should be given the same opportunities that she received 20 years ago.

"If they close doors on them," she says, "if they refuse to rent them an apartment or allow them to work, they're just putting immigrants on the spot, rounding them up and pushing them to do bad things in order to survive and provide for their families."

Now in her late 50s, Santana says that taking care of so many children can be exhausting, but it is also rewarding.

"It's such an experience to have left my kids at such a young age and now to take care of so many," she says. "There are times when I say: 'Lord, give me wings so I can fly away.' But when they leave, I miss them, and this house feels empty."

Bush Hails Verdict As Milestone For Iraq (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 6, 2006

President Bush celebrated Saddam Hussein's death sentence as a victory for "Iraq's young democracy" and U.S. security, highlighting Sunday's verdict in the last hours of an election campaign in which Republicans are suffering from public discontent with the Iraq war.

White House spokesman Tony Snow decried as "absolutely crazy" any notion that the end to Saddam's nine-month trial was timed to produce positive news on the divisive, unpopular war two days before Americans vote. The United States has always denied direct involvement in the trial, though suspicions persisted.

Snow didn't entirely set politics aside, asserting that U.S. voters "ought to be heartened" by the verdict and its broader implications about the progress the administration insists is evident in Iraq.

"This is getting the Iraqis to stand up on their own," Snow said. "You can't have civil society without rule of law."

Bush painted Saddam's conviction and sentence as vindication of the sacrifices made by American soldiers in Iraq. More than 2,800 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

"They've sacrificed for the security of the United States," said the president, who spoke to reporters for two minutes in Texas before flying to campaign appearances on behalf of newly in-peril Republicans in Nebraska and Kansas. "Without their courage and skill, today's verdict would not have happened."

With the verdict a chance to recall Saddam's December 2003 capture by U.S. troops in a hole in the ground — still one of the high points of the war for Bush — he repeated these points later during campaign visits to two of America's reddest states.

"Today we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq," Bush said in western Nebraska, where he was trying to boost GOP state Sen. Adrian Smith in a tightened race against Democrat Scott Kleeb. Delivered in solid Bush Country, in an arena awash in red clothing, the president's Iraq lines earned the most sustained cheering of his speech.

"My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision and the world is better off for it," he said to raucous applause.

An Iraqi court convicted Saddam earlier Sunday and sentenced him to die by hanging for ordering the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shiites from the city of Dujail in 1982. Six subordinates were also found guilty of crimes against humanity, which came after what Saddam said was an assassination attempt against him.

Shiites rejoiced at the death sentence for the former dictator who terrorized their population. But Saddam's fellow Sunnis paraded through his hometown in protest. With sectarian violence already pushing Iraq to the brink of civil war, presidential counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush is confident U.S. forces and Iraqi soldiers were prepared to contain any spike in bloodshed.

Democrats — hoping for large gains that could put them in control of the House and possibly the Senate — moved quickly to both applaud the sentence and repeat their campaign-trail argument that Bush's leadership on Iraq has been a failure.

"The scope of that failure is not lessened by the results of Saddam's trial," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., poised to become House speaker if Democrats wrest the majority from the GOP.

A history of Election Day disappointments and a constantly shifting pre-election landscape appeared to have Democrats a bit jittery. New York Sen. Charles Schumer, in charge of Democratic campaign efforts in the Senate, said, "I don't think (Saddam's) conviction makes much of a difference in this election, even though it's a very good thing that happened."

Other Republicans backed Bush's contention of the verdict as evidence of success in Iraq. "The United States and the world are safer because Saddam Hussein sits on death row, not in a palace in Baghdad plotting to harm millions of innocent Americans and Iraqis," said House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.

But at least one Republican said the news must be viewed in the context of the difficult situation in Iraq.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a step forward because it was a result of a legal system in operation, not a dictator in operation, so that's the good news," Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said on CNN's "Late Edition." "But when you look at the institutions of government in Iraq, they're all under siege. ... We just need a strategy to provide better security to get this right."

Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come," the president said.

He emphasized that Saddam was extended rights of due process and appeal "that he denied the Iraqi people."

"Iraq has a lot of work ahead as it builds its society that delivers equal justice and protects all its citizens," Bush said. "Yet history will record today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

Campaigning Bush Seizes On Saddam Verdict (AFP-Y)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, November 6, 2006

US President George W. Bush seized on Saddam Hussein's death sentence to defend the Iraq war as US elections shaped by the unpopular conflict headed to a hard-fought finish.

"Today, we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death by the Iraqi high tribunal," Bush told cheering supporters at a rowdy Republican rally here.

"It's a major achievement for this young democracy," he said, urging the crowd to "give our thanks to the men and women of America's armed forces. Without their courage and skill, today's verdict never would have happened."

Two days before Tuesday's vote, dozens of congressional races were too close to call and two national public opinion surveys favored Democrats overall but suggested a late burst of energy among Bush's Republicans.

Bush was in Nebraska and Kansas as part of an 11th-hour political rescue mission for struggling Republican candidates facing unexpectedly strong Democratic challenges in part because of anger at the war in Iraq.

"Saddam Hussein was a threat," he said, amid signs the conflict could cost his party control of the US Congress. "My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off for it."

White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed as "preposterous" any suggestion that US and Iraqi officials manipulated the timing of the sentence to help the Republicans and said it was "absolute proof" that Iraq now possessed an "independent judiciary."

Democrats hailed the sentence against Saddam but warned it would not solve the challenges US forces face in Iraq, which was plagued by a raging insurgency and escalating sectarian strife that has fed a rising US death toll.

"Justice for the Iraqi people was finally served today," but "Iraq is in the middle of a civil war and growing sectarian violence will be an even greater concern following this verdict," said Democratic party chief Howard Dean.

In a statement on his way to Nebraska, Bush acknowledged that "Iraq has a lot of work ahead" but said he would stand by the country's fledgling government, which recently has been at odds with Washington.

The Democrats needed a net 15 seats out of the total 435 in play on Tuesday to control the House. They hoped for a gain of six Senate seats out of the 33 at stake that would give them the edge in the 100-member upper chamber.

A Democratic victory would dramatically reshape the political landscape for Bush's final two years in office and the 2008 election to choose his successor.

While expert forecasts of a Democratic victory in at least one and possibly both chambers have heartened the opposition party, two new national polls showed their once double-digit advantage sharply narrowed in recent weeks.

The Washington Post and ABC television poll showed likely voters favoring Democrats to Republicans by a 51 percent to 45 percent edge, with a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points. In an October 22 survey, the Democrats had led 55-41.

And a poll by the non-partisan Pew Research Center that specializes in public opinion found a 47-43 lead for Democrats among likely voters, down from 50-39 two weeks ago. The margin of error was three percentage points.

The US president has been fiercely attacking Democrats, accusing them of plotting to raise taxes and charging that they cannot be trusted to manage Iraq or the war on terrorism he launched after the September 11, 2001 attacks.

The Washington Post/ABC poll still had bleak news for Bush, with his approval rating at a dismal 40 percent and almost twice as many registered voters saying they would cast their ballot as an anti-Bush gesture rather than a show of support.

Control of Congress would provide the Democrats with a powerful tool for controlling the political agenda over the next two years and launching a series of public investigations into Iraq and other Bush policies.

But the White House has strongly signalled that it will not change course in Iraq, with Vice President Dick Cheney saying in a recent interview that "it doesn't matter" that most of the US public has turned against the war.

Washington pundit Charlie Cook forecast "a very strong Democratic wave" on election day. Analysts gave the party a strong shot to win the House but said the Senate hinged on a few key races in states such as Virginia and Missouri.

Voters in 36 states also are casting votes for governor Tuesday. Democrats hold significant leads in five of nine open seats: Ohio, Arkansas, Colorado, New York and Massachusetts, and are favored to displace Republicans in Maryland, Arkansas, and Minnesota.

Hussein Sentence Could Heighten Rifts In Iraq (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

The death sentence given to former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein for crimes against humanity could deepen Iraq's sectarian rifts and inflame the anti-American insurgency.

In a Baghdad courthouse, Mr. Hussein, in his customary black suit, remained seated as the judge read the verdict finding him guilty of ordering the killings of 148 Shiite-Arab civilians as retribution for a botched 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

"I will listen to the judgment, but I will not stand up," Mr. Hussein told the judge. Mr. Hussein reacted to the death sentence with the traditional Islamic incantation of "God is greater," and then disparaged the Iraqi judges for allegedly doing Washington's bidding: "You are the servants of the colonizers."

With violence on the streets of Baghdad at its highest level in years, the verdict is unlikely to alter the pattern of the sectarian conflict or attacks against U.S. troops, but it will provide another divisive issue for a country struggling to hold itself together.

In the Iraqi capital, reaction to the verdict was mixed. In several Baghdad neighborhoods, many Shiite Muslims, who form the majority of Iraq's population and who were persecuted by Mr. Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime, broke into celebratory gunfire and honked car horns. "All the people who were tortured and killed by Saddam are happy in their graves today," said Jawad Kadham, a 35-year-old Shiite construction worker.

But many in the country's Sunni Muslim minority, embittered at the current Shiite-led government and the American occupation, said the widely expected death sentence wasn't fair and the real crimes lie in the inability of the current rulers of Iraq to stop murders and bombings on the streets. "The people who tried Saddam are worse than Saddam; it's all about revenge," said Salim Mahmoud, a 40-year-old Sunni engineer.

Such conflicting reactions to Mr. Hussein's death sentence reflect the sectarian gulf widening between Iraq's Sunnis and Shiites, 3½ years since the U.S.-led invasion. The Sunni-led insurgency, driven in part by secular supporters of the old regime, also drew in Sunni religious extremists eager to wage holy war against the Americans. Using radical Sunni ideology, these extremist groups decreed Iraq's Shiites to be apostates and sanctioned their killing. The resulting bombing attacks and murders of Shiite civilians led to the rise of Shiite militias who in turn began to target regular Sunnis for reprisals. The sectarian conflict continues, while the U.S.-backed and Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki appears unable to stem the violence.

Mr. Maliki, who spent years in exile as a member of a prominent Shiite religious party opposed to Mr. Hussein, hailed the verdict and appealed to the insurgents to stop fighting. "This is the disgraceful end to the person who brought ordeals, pain and reckless wars to this country," the prime minister said in a televised speech. "I say to all deluded remnants of the previous regime: The period of Saddam and his party is gone."

In Mr. Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, some residents marched in protest, vowing to avenge the former Iraqi leader.

In a sign of how embittered the Sunnis are at Iraq's current leadership, Saleh al-Mutlaq, another Sunni politician, warned that the verdict could lead to more sectarian attacks for which the Shiite government will bear responsibility.

The verdict marks the end of a trial that lasted a year and became familiar to most Iraqis because the proceedings were televised. With U.S. congressional elections taking place this week, many Iraqis suspect the Bush administration somehow influenced the timing of the sentence to benefit the Republican party. White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the idea as "preposterous" Sunday. President Bush said in a statement Sunday that "history will record today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

Under Iraqi law, the death sentence is subject to an automatic appeal. If the appellate chamber upholds it, the sentence must be carried out within 30 days. Alongside Mr. Hussein, two other defendants were sentenced to death: Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and former intelligence chief; and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court.

Bush Applauds Hussein Verdict (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

GRAND ISLAND, Neb., Nov. 5 -- President Bush and politicians from both parties hailed the conviction of Saddam Hussein on Sunday but disagreed on its larger meaning as campaign strategists tried to gauge the political impact just 48 hours before hard-fought midterm elections.

Speaking in the shadow of Air Force One on a Texas tarmac and at later campaign events, Bush called the verdict a "landmark event" in Iraq's transition to democracy, and aides hoped it would be seen as vindication of his decision to go to war. Democrats were quick to agree that justice had been done for a vicious tyrant but argued it would not fix what they see as the debacle in Iraq.

The timing of the verdict, which had been scheduled weeks ago, stirred anxiety among Democrats who worried it could be a "November surprise" that would persuade Republicans to turn out, much as the release of an Osama bin Laden tape just before the 2004 election was credited with helping to put Bush over the top. Some voiced suspicions that the Bush administration had orchestrated the court schedule to influence the vote, a contention the White House rejected.

Some key strategists in both parties, however, said they doubted the verdict would make much difference. In a campaign that has been dominated by debate over the Iraq war, it provided a rare day of good news for Bush at a key moment, they said, but most voters had already made up their minds about how they view the situation there.

"It makes the environment incrementally better but only incrementally," said Ed Rogers, a Republican lobbyist close to the White House. "It reminds everybody of what a bad guy Saddam was. It reminds everybody of why we were there in the first place. I don't know that it drives any votes at this point. I wish it did, but it doesn't."

Hussein "was a brutal, evil dictator" who is "getting the punishment that he deserves," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who runs the Senate Democratic campaign arm, said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." But, he added, "I don't think his conviction makes much of a difference in this election, even though it's a very good thing that it happened."

Hussein has been a regular feature of Bush's stump speech for weeks as the president tells audiences that he made the right decision in removing the Iraqi leader from power and argues that the world is better off. By the time the verdict was announced in a Baghdad court, aides traveling with Bush on the campaign trail were ready with talking points. White House press secretary Tony Snow was booked on television programs starting at 7 a.m., and his office sent e-mails touting other reactions.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," Bush told reporters before leaving Texas for campaign stops here and in Topeka, Kan. "It's a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government."

Although he did not predict whether it would help the reconciliation process in Iraq, Bush portrayed the trial as a chance to expunge Hussein's legacy. "The man who once struck fear in the hearts of Iraqis had to listen to free Iraqis recount the acts of torture and murder that he ordered against their families and against them," he said. "Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come."

He then introduced the verdict into his campaign speech later in the day, using similar language. When he announced the verdict at a boisterous rally here in a hall filled with flags, cornhusks and hay bales, the crowd cheered.

Other Republicans, who have been on the defensive over the war as U.S. troop casualties spiked to a two-year high, quickly jumped on the bandwagon. "This verdict is a victory for justice and a victory for the Iraqi people and all freedom-loving people in the Middle East," said House Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio). His whip, Roy Blunt (Mo.), said the world is "safer because Saddam Hussein sits on death row, not in a palace in Baghdad plotting to harm millions of innocent Americans and Iraqis."

Democrats praised the verdict while still bashing Bush. "Tragically, I believe today's verdict does not change the fact that the administration's policy in Iraq has been the most incompetent execution of American foreign policy in my lifetime," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.). Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said "the Iraqis have traded a dictator for chaos. Neither option is acceptable, especially when it is our troops who are caught in the middle."

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called the court's decision "a great verdict" and said Hussein "is a war criminal and he's getting what he deserves." But, Dean said, the war remains a mistake. "This was a miscalculation by people who didn't understand what they were getting into. And if they'd listened to Colin Powell and the rest of the military, they wouldn't have gotten into it."

Democratic leaders avoided publicly accusing the Bush administration of orchestrating the verdict's timing but privately some raised questions, and liberal Internet blogs have been full of angry discussion about it. The Iraqi court originally planned to render a verdict in October but delayed it until two days before the election, prompting a defense lawyer for Hussein to write a letter accusing Bush of manipulating the proceedings for campaign purposes.

Snow dismissed the suggestion as "preposterous" and absurd. "Are you smoking rope?" he replied when a reporter asked about timing manipulation aboard Air Force One on Saturday. "Are you telling me that in Iraq, that they're sitting around -- I'm sorry, that the Iraqi judicial system is coming up with an October surprise?" Corrected on the date, he expressed incredulity, "A November surprise. Man, that's -- wow."

Bush Trumpets Hussein Verdict To Rally Support (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 5 — President Bush on Sunday seized on the conviction of Saddam Hussein as a milestone in Iraq, seeking to rally Republican voters with the issue of national security as some polls suggested that his party might be making gains in the final hours of the campaign.

The White House said the timing of the announcement, two days before Election Day, had nothing to do with American politics and had been dictated by the Iraqi court. But Mr. Bush moved quickly to put it to use in what has been his central strategic imperative over the past week, trying to rouse Republican voters to turn out.

“Today we witnessed a landmark event in the history of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was convicted and sentenced to death by the Iraqi High Tribunal,” Mr. Bush said to roars of approval in a hockey auditorium packed with supporters in Grand Island, Neb. “Saddam Hussein’s trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people’s efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.”

The announcement out of Baghdad came as polls suggested some gains for Republicans. A Pew Research Center Survey released on Sunday found that the number of likely voters who said they would vote for the Democrats was now 47 percent compared with 43 percent who said they would vote for Republicans. Two weeks ago, Democrats had an edge of 50 to 39. A Washington Post-ABC News poll found a similar tightening.

These kinds of polls, about the so-called generic ballot, measure national trends and do not necessarily provide an accurate measure of what is happening in individual House and Senate races. Andrew Kohut, the president of the Pew Center, said the poll nonetheless found that Republicans were becoming more enthusiastic as Election Day approached, a sign that the party was making progress in addressing one of its main problems this year: a dispirited base.

With at least 20 House races and 3 Senate races virtually tied in polls over the past week, Republican officials have looked to the huge voter turnout operation the party has developed over the past six years as its last-stand defense to prevent Democrats from making big gains on Tuesday.

A series of Mason-Dixon polls published on Sunday suggested a tightening in two Senate races, Rhode Island and Maryland, that Democrats had been confident of winning.

Republicans over the past week have spent heavily in Maryland on behalf of Michael Steele, the Republican candidate seeking to fill the seat being vacated by Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat. In Rhode Island, Senator Lincoln Chafee, the Republican, has spent heavily and banked on his family’s long history in the state’s politics to help him survive in a heavily Democratic state.

Ken Mehlman, the Republican chairman, said polls showed that Republicans and conservatives “were coming home,” which he said “is what happens when voters focus on the choice before them.”

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democrat leading his party’s effort to win control of the House, said, “It’s inevitable that there would be some tightening in the end.”

DOJ_NMG_0091218

Still, Mr. Emanuel, who has been careful this campaign to avoid the public expressions of optimism voiced by other Democrats, added, "This is making me nervous."

Across the country, Democrats also hailed the verdict in Baghdad but argued that it would make no difference in delivering stability to Iraq and would have little bearing on Tuesday's vote.

"I think it's a great verdict — I mean, Saddam Hussein is a war criminal and he's getting what he deserves," Howard Dean, the Democratic national chairman, said on "This Week" on ABC. "But I don't think it has any impact on the safety of America."

Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has become the face of his party's opposition to the war in Iraq, said the verdict was the right one but predicted it would not make a difference in this campaign. What would matter more, Mr. Murtha said, were editorials in military papers being published Monday calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"When The Army Times, The Navy Times, The Marine Corps Times, they have all said that we're not supporting the troops, that they're losing confidence with the administration, that's what's important," Mr. Murtha said, campaigning in Croydon, Pa., outside Philadelphia, for Patrick Murphy, a Democrat seeking to unseat Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick.

The fact that Mr. Bush was spending this last Sunday before Election Day in two of the most Republican states in the nation was testimony to how bleak a year this has been for the Republican Party and the president. And in Florida, the home state of his brother, Mr. Bush received what appeared to be another reminder of his political unpopularity when Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor, backed out of a planned appearance with Mr. Bush in Pensacola on Monday.

Mr. Crist said that he needed to spend the day in more competitive parts of the state and that he was not joining the list of other Republican candidates who had snubbed Mr. Bush this year.

The White House, however, said this week that the president was heading to Florida specifically to help Mr. Crist, who, according to Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, invited Mr. Bush in the first place.

But an official with Mr. Crist's campaign, who would not talk for attribution, said that Mr. Crist had never confirmed the appearance.

On the final Sunday of the election cycle, the leaders of the four Congressional campaign committees took their seats around the table of "Meet the Press" on NBC, appearing together for the first time in the midterm contest — and promptly diving into a sharp exchange over the war in Iraq.

"To pull out, to withdraw from this war, is losing, there's no question about it," said Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "The Democrats appear to be content with losing."

Mr. Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, turned sharply toward Mrs. Dole, his face lined with outrage.

"You should take that back, Senator," he said. But Mrs. Dole kept speaking over him, creating a minute of partisan cacophony on the television set.

"I will not sit idly by with an accusation that Democrats are content with losing," Mr. Emanuel said.

Mr. Bush was unambiguous in hailing the conviction of Mr. Hussein as welcome news from a country where good reports have been in short supply this election season. That said, there have frequently been developments in Iraq over the past two years that Mr. Bush has proclaimed as turning points, only to see them followed by renewed violence and further deterioration.

And while these announcements of Iraqi milestones have at times produced a lift for Mr. Bush in the polls, the gains have tended to be fleeting.

Still, just before an election that is this close, Republicans suggested that the events of Sunday could be politically helpful.

A senior Republican Party official, who insisted on anonymity to speak about the political implications of the announcement, said it would invigorate Republican voters distressed about Iraq but would not have much effect beyond that. And Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is heading the Democratic effort to win back the Senate, said, "People are worried about the future of Iraq, not the past."

Senior aides to Mr. Bush scoffed at suggestions that the announcement of the verdict had somehow been orchestrated by the White House.

"Are you smoking rope?" Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said Saturday in anticipation of the verdict. "Are you telling me that in Iraq, that they're sitting around — I'm sorry, that the Iraqi judicial system is coming up with an October surprise?"

White House officials were clearly prepared for the news, posing Mr. Bush before Air Force One to make a celebratory announcement as he left Waco, Tex., and inserting remarks about it into his speeches. On Sunday morning, Mr. Snow made a round of the talk shows to praise the development, echoed throughout the day by Republican surrogates and candidates.

Representative J. D. Hayworth, a Republican in a close race in Arizona's Fifth Congressional District, used a previously scheduled early morning appearance on the Fox News Channel show "Fox and Friends" to declare the Hussein sentence "a victory for the Iraqi people." Mr. Hayworth said it offered Americans heading to the polls "a chance to take stock" of the war's dividends.

From California to Missouri to Connecticut, candidates put up their final advertisements.

In Pennsylvania, Karen Santorum, Senator Rick Santorum's wife, speaks directly into the camera in a 60-second advertisement, looking almost mournful as she says that she has found attacks on her family for living in Virginia hurtful, explaining that they moved there to be closer to Mr. Santorum when he is working.

Saddam Ordered To Hang For '82 Massacre (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- An Iraqi court yesterday sentenced Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, convicting the former dictator and six subordinates in the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail in 1982.

Shi'ites and Kurds, who had been tormented and killed by the tens of thousands under Saddam's iron rule, erupted in celebration -- but braced for a potential backlash from the Sunni community that some fear could push the country into all-out civil war.

Saddam trembled and shouted "God is great" when Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman declared the former leader guilty and sentenced him to hang.

The televised trial was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. Saddam was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for his political harangues, and his half-brother and co-defendant, Barzan Ibrahim, once showed up in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

The nine-month, 39-session trial had inflamed the nation. Three defense lawyers and a witness were killed.

"Long live the people and death to their enemies. Long live the glorious nation, and death to its enemies," Saddam cried out after the verdict, before bailiffs took his arms and walked the once all-powerful leader from the courtroom. There was a hint of a smile on Saddam's face.

With justice for Saddam's crimes done, the U.S.-backed Shi'ite prime minister called for reconciliation and delivered the most eloquent speech of his five months in office.

"The verdict placed on the heads of the former regime does not represent a verdict for any one person. It is a verdict on a whole dark era that was unmatched in Iraq's history," Nouri al-Maliki said.

The White House praised the Iraqi judicial system and denied that the U.S. had been "scheming" to have the historic verdict announced two days before American midterm elections, widely seen as a referendum on the Bush administration's policy in Iraq.

President Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"It's a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government," the president said. "Today, the victims of this regime have received a measure of the justice which many thought would never come."

But many nations voiced opposition to the death sentences, including France, Italy, the Netherlands, Spain and Sweden. A leading Italian opposition figure called on the continent to press for Saddam's sentence to be commuted to life imprisonment.

Saddam was found hiding with an unfired pistol in a hole in the ground near his home village north of Baghdad in December 2003, eight months after he fled the capital ahead of advancing American troops. Twenty-two months later, he went on trial on charges that he ordered the torture and killing of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail.

Saddam said those who were killed had been found guilty in a legitimate Iraqi court for trying to assassinate him in 1982. But about 50 of the accused died during interrogation before they could be executed, and some of those hanged were children.

Ibrahim, Saddam's half-brother and intelligence chief during the Dujail killings, also was sentenced to death, as was Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, which issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents.

Former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder and sentenced to life in prison.

Three defendants were given up to 15 years in prison for torture and premeditated murder. Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid and his son, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, were party officials in Dujail, along with Ali Dayim Ali. They were thought to be responsible for the Dujail arrests.

Mohammed Azawi Ali, a local Ba'ath Party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

In the streets of Dujail, a Tigris River city of 84,000, people celebrated and burned pictures of their former tormentor as the verdict was read. In Baghdad, the Shi'ite bastion of Sadr City exploded in jubilation.

But in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, not far from Dujail, 1,000 people defied the curfew and carried pictures of the city's favorite son through the streets. Some declared the court a product of the U.S. "occupation forces" and condemned the verdict. Policemen wept in the streets.

"By our souls, by our blood, we sacrifice for you, Saddam," the Tikrit crowds chanted.

The death sentences automatically go to a nine-judge appeals panel, which has unlimited time to review the case. If the verdicts and sentences are upheld, the executions must be carried out within 30 days.

A court official said the appeals process was likely to take three to four weeks once the formal paperwork was submitted. If the verdicts are upheld, those sentenced to death would be hanged despite Saddam's second, ongoing trial on charges of killing thousands of Iraq's Kurdish minority.

Saddam Hussein Death Sentence A Milestone (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD

Celebratory gunfire swept across parts of Baghdad and other Iraqi cities Sunday as Saddam Hussein and two former top Iraqi officials were sentenced to die for crimes against humanity.

Defiant as the historic verdict was read, Mr. Hussein accused the judge of the US-created tribunal of being a "mouthpiece of occupation and colonialism," and cursed "your law and your articles and clauses."

Amid fears and explicit warnings that a death sentence would deepen bloodshed, Baghdad and two restive provinces were placed under an open-ended curfew for vehicles and pedestrians.

The tribunal is the first such court since Nuremburg's Nazi war-crimes trials to hand down a death sentence. After appeal, Hussein faces hanging.

The tribunal's creators had hoped that the forum would play a central role in closing the door on 30 years of ruthless oppression under Hussein. Indeed, Shiites and Kurds, who bore the brunt of tens of thousands of deaths at the hands of the regime, were jubilant. But that joy was tempered among Sunnis disenfranchised by Hussein's overthrow, and angry over what many saw as a political trial overly dependent on American experts and resources. The result, experts say, is a positive step for Iraqi justice, but one that reveals a deep and continuing weakness in the rule of law.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki heralded the result as "the end of a dark era," and a reason for hope among Iraqis battered by 3-1/2 years of Sunni-led insurgency and sectarian violence that the UN says takes nearly 3,000 Iraqi lives each month.

"Maybe this will alleviate the pain of the widows and orphans, and those forced to bury their loved ones," Maliki said. "The era of Saddam is now the era of the past. It is an era of dictators like Mussolini and Hitler. We are determined to build an Iraq without mass graves, without Anfal, and without wars, without military coups."

US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad called the verdict an "important milestone" for Iraq.

The tribunal, partly due to its heavy reliance on American resources and expertise and the blatant interference of senior Iraqi officials, has drawn criticism from international legal experts. Maliki recently said: "God willing, the verdict of death will soon be issued against the tyrant Saddam."

"This tribunal has suffered an unusual number of problems, compared to other tribunals" such as those of the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, says Miranda Sissons, head of the Iraq program of the New York-based International Center for Transitional Justice.

Deteriorating security has been a crucial issue, experts say, along with the inexperience of Iraqi judges and lawyers, and little reference to lessons learned from other international tribunals, or to non-US experts.

"If there is one thing that will make this court a laughing stock, it is continued executive interference in its work," says Ms. Sissons. "Mistakes were made in setting up the tribunal that shouldn't have been made."

Still, she adds, "this was not a sham trial. It was always an ambitious undertaking. The judges have done their best in difficult circumstances, coming from a very low base."

Amnesty International, which opposes capital punishment, said on Sunday that the tribunal had missed an opportunity to establish the rule of law in Iraq, and to ensure "truth and accountability for the massive human rights violations perpetrated by Saddam Hussein's rule."

The case dealt with a 1982 assassination attempt against Hussein in the town of Dujail, which prompted revenge killings of 148 people, deportation of 400, and razing of orchards. One intelligence document indicated the level of torture used against the 148, noting that "of those who were sentenced to death, 46...had been eliminated or died during the investigation."

But it is only the first in a dozen or so being prepared against Hussein and the former regime by the troubled Iraqi High Tribunal, which has been dogged by legitimacy issues, the murder of three defense lawyers, the resignation of one chief judge, an array of confusing testimony, and a multitude of farcical in-the-dock antics by Hussein and his codefendants.

The second, much larger case, charges genocide and covers the 1988 Anfal campaign against the Kurds in which up to 180,000 were killed. Legally, Sunday's death sentences will go through an automatic appeals process with no deadline. If the verdict is confirmed, the sentence must be carried out within 30 days. Hussein had requested execution by firing squad, normally reserved for the military.

Death sentences Sunday were also delivered to Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half-brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was sentenced to life in prison; three lesser officials were handed 15-year jail sentences. The oldest defendant, a local Baath Party official in Dujail at the time, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

The Iraqi High Tribunal was expressly set up to enable Iraqis to feel "closer" to justice in the "New Iraq" created by the 2003 US invasion and subsequent occupation.

When the first trial began in October last year, Iraqis were at first riveted by the proceedings of the court, in which tearful witnesses - often testifying anonymously from behind a curtain - spelled out their suffering after the Dujail incident.

But it was not long before the novelty began to wear off of seeing Hussein and his co-accused engaging in feisty, irreverent arguments with judges and even guards during the trial's 39 sessions. Average Iraqis became more focused on day-to-day survival amid ongoing carnage. Sunday's verdict, finally, caught the nation's attention again.

"Saddam deserves to face such a court and I don't know how he could escape a guilty verdict for Dujail or more important cases," says Wamidh Nadhmi, a political science professor in Baghdad who manages a Sunni-led political coalition. "But now we are seeing more killing, more bloodletting than during his era."

Mr. Nadhmi helped Hussein in 1959, when he fled to Cairo after participating in a botched assassination attempt against the sitting leader.

"They promised us - the Americans - there would be democracy and human rights. But we see them violated in every day's happenings," says Professor Nadhmi. "The majority of Iraqis think the drastic failure of this regime and the Americans to bring security and human rights to Iraq, does not entitle them to conduct such a trial [or] issue a guilty verdict."

But the sentencing, regardless of its imperfections, is likely to be seen as justice by Iraqis who often did not grasp the magnitude of Hussein regime crimes - often heard about, but rarely physically encountered - until scores of mass graves began being unearthed starting in 2003.

Besides the Dujail and Anfal cases, tribunal investigators say they have documented evidence of more than 100,000 people tortured and killed in the aftermath of the 1991 Shiite uprising.

Some 5,000 Kurds were killed by chemical weapons in Halabja in 1988. Hussein ordered his armies into Iran in 1980, sparking nearly a decade of war that left 1 million dead and wounded, and in which Iraq used chemical munitions. And Iraqi troops occupied Kuwait in 1990.

Iraqis reeled from the legacy of those acts, but could rarely quantify them until the regime fell. Among the most poignant scenes came in late April 2003, just two weeks after the fall of Baghdad, at a graveyard adjacent to the Abu Ghraib prison. There, some 993 graves were marked only with crude numbered signs, until families, most of them Shiites, found lists that matched victims' names with numbers. "O my father, my father!" lamented Mustapha al-Fadil at the time, weeping uncontrollably at grave No. 659, when his family came to dig up the remains for reburial.

Fadil Sadoun, an overtly religious man, had been arrested in 1996 and never came home. "You should be happy," mourned the son. "Saddam is gone."

The scene repeated itself hundreds of times that day, with broken families taking home the broken remains of executed loved ones. At least they could be identified; most mass graves around Iraq are filled with anonymous victims.

But if state-sanctioned violence defined the former regime, Hussein threatened its use again on Sunday, when defense lawyers reported, after a lengthy talk with their client, that the former Iraqi dictator vowed to "die with honor and with no fear."

Americans in Iraq, defense lawyers quoted Hussein as saying, "will see rivers of blood for years to come. It will dwarf Vietnam," [a news service] reported.

Days earlier, Hussein's chief defense counsel, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said after a guilty verdict, "The doors of hell will open in Iraq, the sectarian divide in the country will deepen, and many more coffins will be sent back to America."

But Iraq's prime minister, whose own Islamic Dawa Party had claimed responsibility for the Dujail assassination attempt, saw it differently. "The martyrs and all Iraqis have a right to smile," said Mr. Maliki.

Saddam Verdict Is Met With Mixed Reactions In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The trial of Saddam Hussein that ended Sunday with a guilty verdict and death sentence for the former Iraqi leader, once viewed as a means of reconciliation and justice, instead seemed to fuel the sectarian division that grips the country.

DOJ_NMG_0091222

Some Shiites and Kurds celebrated. Some Sunnis mourned angrily. For large swaths of the Iraqi people, Saddam has ceased to be the mesmerizing patriarch who once towered over their nightmares and lives. Many interviewed on Sunday and in recent months said they had laid him to rest long ago, more worried about the internecine violence wracking the country.

"The verdict was right, but prolonging it faded the cheerfulness," said Sameer Asadi, a 38-year-old taxi driver in the southern Iraq city of Basra.

Though Iraqi government officials argue that putting him to death could stymie the hopes of Sunni insurgents, many of those battling daily against U.S. and Iraqi forces long ago dispensed with Saddam as an inspiration, perhaps even before he was found and arrested by U.S. troops nearly three years ago.

The verdict, however, will be felt by many in Iraq as another in a series of divisive jabs in the ongoing battle between Iraq's long-oppressed majority Shiite Muslims and once-powerful Sunni Arabs now incensed over their loss of centuries-old dominance.

Saddam and seven co-defendants faced charges of crimes against humanity for the deaths of 148 Shiite Muslims, who were killed after a failed assassination attempt against the Iraqi leader in the town of Dujail in 1982. Saddam and two other defendants received the death penalty Sunday, which will be automatically appealed, while four defendants received lesser sentences and another was acquitted of charges.

The yearlong trial may or may not have met international standards for war crimes tribunals. Several human rights organizations that monitor such trials said Sunday that it didn't. "We're concerned that flaws in the trial process will jeopardize much of the trial's impact," said Miranda Sissons, head of the International Center for Transitional Justice's Iraq program said in a release.

U.S. officials hailed the verdict as a triumph of "transparency" and an example of the kind of due process denied Iraqis under the former regime.

"Saddam Hussein's trial is a milestone in the Iraqi people's effort to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," President Bush told reporters in Waco, Texas. "It is a major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government."

But such lessons on the healing power of the courtroom and virtues of law may well be lost in contemporary Iraq, where the hundreds who die each week in civil warfare dwarf the 148 Iraqis slain by Saddam's regime after the 1982 assassination attempt in Dujail.

As the verdict was broadcast on television, war cries broke out on both sides of the sectarian divide.

Noisy demonstrations broke out in Shiite districts of the capital. Revelers pointed their AK-47s into the air and let loose a 15-minute burst of celebratory gunfire. Many held of posters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose followers nightly snatch Sunni Arab men off the streets and torture them with electrical appliances before shooting them in the skull.

"God avenged the killer of my sons," said a 65-year-old woman in the Shiite city of Najaf who gave her name as Um Hassan.

She said lost two of her four boys to Saddam's security forces in the 1991 crackdown on a Shiite insurrection in southern Iraq. "The death penalty is not enough," she said. "I want him to be buried alive twice as he did with my sons."

Even Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, the pious Islamic activist leading this fragmented country, joined in the celebration of fellow Shiites.

"This is the day where you see the dictator after arresting him in his miserable hole, being tried facing the penalty he deserves," comparing him unfavorably to al-Sadr's father and uncle, who were both famous Shiite clerics slain by Saddam's regime.

"Iraqis have the right to smile and rejoice a little for the death sentence issued against this criminal and his minions," he said in a television address.

In Sunni Arab towns and neighborhoods, however, there was sullen anger and public displays of support for the former dictator. Clashes and mortar-fire in Sunni neighborhoods in the capital left at least four dead. They held up Iraqi flags and framed portraits of the man they still call "our president," humiliated that he was to be hung like a common criminal.

"He did not throw them into a big hole and set them on fire," Ameen Adib, one of Saddam's defense lawyers, said of the 148 victims from Dujail. "He just gave them justice. If I were to judge Saddam Hussein I would have given him a medal for his conduct in this issue."

Before the verdict, Khalil Dulaymi, Saddam's lead attorney, described the tribunal examining the Dujail case as an "Iranian court," as if Shiite prosecutor Jaffar Mussawi and Kurdish Judge Raouf Abdul Rahman did not even qualify as fellow Iraqis.

"The judges and the prosecution were appointed according to a sectarian criteria," he said. "They're all either Kurds or Shiites."

DOJ_NMG_0091223

Demonstrations in support of deposed former president broke out Sunday in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, as well as other Sunni enclaves, despite a ban on vehicular and pedestrian traffic. In the nearby town of Dorr, hometown of fugitive Saddam loyalist Izzat Douri, rioters torched the local courthouse.

"This is a phony court," said Adel Hussein 27, a Sunni mechanic in the city of Samarra. "This court was formed on sectarian basis and it contains the judges that are related to (al-Maliki's) Dawa Party and other parties that are in the government now."

In the courtroom Sunday, Iraq's sectarian divide -- the two worldviews battling for supremacy of Iraq -- also played out. Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, a member of the defense team, had submitted a brief questioning the court's legitimacy and by extension the U.S.-led invasion and the Shiite- and Kurdish-dominated government it spawned.

The judge exploded. "Out, Out!" he hollered in English at the befuddled Clark, who appeared befuddled as he was escorted out by several bailiffs. "Get him out. He's coming from America to insult the Iraqi people and the court."

Applause erupted from the visitors' gallery.

After acquitting one defendant and sentencing the three others to 15 years each in prison for their roles in the Dujail killings, the judge sparred with former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan, sentencing him to life in prison.

Ramadan exploded. The facts, the witnesses and the testimony in presented in the case were all for show, a cover for a vendetta, he charged.

"It is very clear that the verdict was previously set and had nothing to do with all the trial sessions," he said.

The judge quickly handed a verdict of death by hanging to Awad Hamed Bandar, the chief judge of Saddam's Revolutionary Court. Both the visitors in the gallery and Bandar began chanting, "God is great."

"God is greater than the unjust," Bandar said as Abdel Rahman completed the verdict. "God is greater than the occupier. God is greater than the colonizers. God is greater than the collaborators."

Saddam, wearing his signature black suit and white tie, walked into the courtroom with an air of somberness and gravity, casting himself as the wounded symbol of the Sunni Arab pride that was the cornerstone of his Baath Party's ideology.

"I will listen to the judgment," he said, looking much more somber and downcast than he has in past court appearances. "But I will not stand up."

A bevy of bailiffs surrounded him, forcing him to stand up. One glared at him with what appeared to be a mocking smile as the former president was sentenced to hang for crimes against humanity, including murder, imprisonment, torture, forcible imprisonment and relocation.

"Long live Iraq!" Saddam said, holding up a green Quran. "Long live the Arab nation. Down with the agents! God is great! Long live the people!"

Then Saddam, who helped launching Iraq's sectarian and ethnic divides by targeting Shiites and Kurds throughout the 1980s and 1990s, took on the role of healer of a country being torn asunder by sectarian passions.

"We recommend the great Iraqi people forgive all those who strayed and we recommended the great Iraqi people not to be angry at the people of the countries that participated in occupying your country," he said.

"Don't push," he told the bailiff escorting him out the courtroom. "I am your brother."

Iraqis Consider The Impact Of Verdict (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Celebratory gunfire that erupted Sunday after the announcement of Saddam Hussein's death sentence dissipated quickly as Iraqis went about their lives in a city fractured by sectarian violence.

In other areas, the verdict was denounced. Demonstrators in Tikrit, the former Iraqi leader's hometown, defied a curfew and carried his picture through the streets. Residents of some Sunni neighborhoods in the capital traded gunfire with police, while mortar shells burst in other Sunni areas.

“I don't think it will have much effect,” said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of parliament. “The whole trial hasn't been all fair or free. There have been a lot of defects from the trial from the start. So people aren't caring so much.”

Othman said the court's decision could worsen tensions between Sunnis and Shiites. Sunnis ruled Iraq under Saddam, who ruthlessly persecuted Shiites and Kurds. Now, Shiites dominate the government.

Many in Iraq's majority Shiite population were joyous. Residents of Sadr City, a Shiite neighborhood here, poured into the streets.

Mahmoud Fadhil's brother Mohammed was executed in 1985 by Saddam's government. When the verdict was read, Fadhil, 39, ran into the street and fired his AK-47 rifle into the air. “God's justice has been achieved today, but I'm afraid that they will delay the execution,” he said. “I will not feel comfortable before seeing the rope wrapping Saddam's neck.”

DOJ_NMG_0091224

One Sunni leader said Saddam's hanging could spawn more killings. “This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands whose blood will be shed,” Saleh al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told Al-Arabiya television.

The government sought to minimize violence, banning vehicle and pedestrian traffic in Baghdad and other restive provinces indefinitely.

The trial's climax came nearly three years after Saddam was pulled from his hide-out by U.S. troops. The delay between his capture and conviction, and the deterioration of security conditions here, sapped the news of some of its power, Othman said.

Hussein Sentenced To Death By Hanging (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 -- A divided and violence-ridden Iraq broke into starkly disparate displays of emotion on Sunday after judges in Baghdad condemned former president Saddam Hussein to hang for crimes against humanity.

In the south, a Shiite Muslim father held aloft the tiny, shrouded remains of a young son killed long ago during Hussein's armed campaign against the majority sect. The father danced with his son's bones in the street among celebrating crowds, elated at the news.

In the north, a Sunni Arab man in Hussein's home city strapped an explosives belt around his waist and vowed to avenge the death penalty handed to the former dictator.

"Today's sentences were a death sentence on righteousness, and this makes it obligatory to take the revenge for Iraq," said the man, 29-year-old shopkeeper Ibrahim Yahya, joining other Sunnis in jabbing rifle muzzles and pistols in the air in angry protest.

Elsewhere, Kurds pounded giant drums in traditional celebration. Shiite boys and men threw candy and fired into the air. Bitter-faced Sunni men clasped Hussein's portrait in one hand, a weapon in the other. The varied reactions demonstrated how long-standing divisions have widened in Iraq since Hussein's fall and threatened to divide and bloody the country further.

In Baghdad's Green Zone, a five-judge Iraqi panel announced a unanimous sentence of death for Hussein and two of his seven co-defendants, including Hussein's half brother. Four other defendants were sentenced to prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and an eighth was acquitted.

The sentences of death and life imprisonment will be automatically appealed, with no time limit set for the appellate judges' decision.

If Hussein is executed, it would cut short his prosecution for campaigns in the 1980s and '90s in which his government allegedly killed tens of thousands -- or more -- of Shiites and minority Kurds. The charges on which he was convicted Sunday arose from an incident of lesser magnitude: the retaliatory executions of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s.

The United States largely funded Hussein's trial, and U.S. officials close to the trial said Sunday's outcome vindicated the policy of having courts in individual nations try cases involving war crimes and crimes against humanity. The Bush administration has been a leading opponent of international tribunals, fearing that U.S. soldiers could be tried before them for political reasons.

After a meandering, year-long trial, Sunday's sentencing was rapid-fire, brusque and volatile.

"Make him stand up," Chief Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman ordered after Hussein, wearing the same dark suit and open-collared shirt he had worn for most of the trial, took a seat when he entered the courtroom and refused to rise.

Six Iraqi guards hauled Hussein to his feet and held his arms behind his back as his fate was declared. The former leader broke into shouts as soon as Abdel-Rahman began reading. In the five minutes that followed, each man shouted increasingly louder to be heard over the other.

"Long live the nation! Down with the criminal invaders! Down with the spies! Down with the occupiers!" Hussein declared, thrusting his finger in the air, his body shaking with rage.

One of the Iraqi guards put his face within a few inches of Hussein's to watch the former leader's reaction as the death sentence was read. Smacking gum open-jawed, the guard smiled mockingly, then laughed.

"The court has decided to sentence Saddam Hussein al-Majid to death by hanging," Abdel-Rahman said.

"Go to hell! You and the court!" Hussein shouted. "You don't decide anything, you are servants of the occupiers and lackeys! You are puppets!"

"Take him out!" the judge shouted at the end of a declaration convicting Hussein on five of six charges of crimes against humanity.

"Long live the Kurds!" the 69-year-old leader shouted as the guards pulled him to the courtroom door. "Long live the Arabs!"

DOJ_NMG_0091225

His co-defendants heard their fate with equal defiance. "It's all in the hand of the Almighty! It's all in the hands of the holy warriors!" shouted Taha Yassin Ramadan, a vice president under Hussein, as the guards pushed him out of the courtroom after his life sentence was announced.

Minutes earlier, at least six guards had surrounded former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark, one of the defense attorneys, and hustled him out of the courtroom. "Get him out! Get him out!" Abdel-Rahman shouted in English, outraged at a court filing submitted by Clark that apparently referred to the trial as a travesty. "He's coming from America to insult the Iraqi people and the court," the judge added in Arabic.

Above the courtroom, VIPs in a visitor's gallery hidden from view applauded when Clark was ejected. "God is greatest!" the unseen spectators cried later, when the first death sentence was announced. Officials said the spectators included some of the survivors of the campaign in Dujail as well as Iraq's current interior minister and other politicians.

The Shiite politicians who lead Iraq's coalition government went on television after the court session to congratulate the victims of Hussein and condemn his leadership. "The Saddam era is over, and his party has become part of the past," Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said on al-Iraqiya state television. Maliki's Dawa party carried out the 1982 assassination attempt in Dujail that led Hussein to order the executions.

Jubilant men and boys poured onto the streets of Shiite communities across southern and central Iraq, despite a curfew imposed to try to prevent violent reactions to the verdict. In Baghdad, officers in the Shiite-dominated police forces celebrated by handing out candy from their patrol vehicles and blaring cassettes hailing Shiite political leaders.

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, in the south, the celebrating crowds included boys and young men marching in the old military uniforms of fathers allegedly killed by Hussein's government.

A white-haired, gray-robed man in his 50s, who identified himself only as Abbas, walked among them holding up the swaddled bones of his son Hassan. All of Abbas's sons disappeared in 1991, along with thousands of other Shiites, as Hussein's forces crushed a Shiite uprising after the Persian Gulf War.

Only last week, Abbas had recovered the remains of Hassan, who was 4 when he disappeared, after an official's chance discovery of an old grave holding five bodies. On Sunday, Abbas had been taking his son's body for burial, but when he saw the demonstration, he stopped his car in the middle of the road. Soon he was jumping up and down among the crowd, holding up Hassan's bones for all to mourn.

"Saddam took my sons from me," Abbas said. He began crying. "What was the crime that my son committed? He was only 4."

North of Baghdad, in Hussein's birthplace of Auja, black-robed women with reddened eyes walked along Saddam Hussein Road to a house belonging to members of Hussein's extended family, where they joined the women there in a kind of wake.

"The grief we are going through is unbearable, and we wish we were dead before seeing or hearing this verdict," said Suad Mohammed, 40, her voice hoarse with tears and shouting.

"What happened today at the court gives us the resolve and the power to go ahead on the road of holy war," said Marwan Hakam, a teacher in the city of Tikrit, not far from Auja. "All must now carry arms to fight the Americans."

"I have sworn by God that I shall not go home and will detonate this explosives belt on American forces," said Yahya, the Tikriti shopkeeper.

Samarra and other predominantly Sunni cities and towns also saw protests, with crowds at times shooting at or setting fire to government buildings. They revived a chant that had dominated their lives during Hussein's 24-year authoritarian rule: "Our blood and our souls we sacrifice for you, Saddam."

Many Shiites and Sunnis, however, said that the sectarian violence since Hussein was toppled by a U.S.-led invasion in 2003 has made life now far grimmer. Some warned of worse to come: "This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands whose blood will be shed," Salih al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told al-Arabiya satellite television.

Hussein To Die By Hanging (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein was pronounced guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced Sunday to death by hanging, capping a long and arduous first trial against the notorious former dictator.

As Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman of the Iraqi High Tribunal read the verdict, Hussein defiantly shouted over him, ridiculing the court, the Iraqi government and the U.S.-led military presence in Iraq.

"Long live the Iraqi people, damnation for the damned. You are the servants of the colonizers," he bellowed at the panel of judges, wagging his finger and trembling throughout the outburst.

DOJ_NMG_0091226

"Long live the people, long live the Arab nation! Down with the agents. Down with the occupier."

Despite a curfew and heavy security precautions in some parts of Iraq, the verdict was quickly greeted with both street celebrations and protests.

In heavily Shiite areas of southern Iraq, jubilant crowds danced in the street and celebrated the outcome. In Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, about 2,000 Iraqis took to the street in defiance of a government curfew and peacefully protested the verdicts.

Meanwhile, in Baghdad, clashes were reported in the Sunni neighborhood of Ahdamiyah and celebratory gunfire resounded through the mostly quiet streets of other parts Baghdad--which was also on a security lockdown--as the sentencing against Hussein was announced.

In the trial for the 1982 killings of 148 people, two of Hussein's co-defendants, Barzan al-Ibrahim, the former Iraqi intelligence chief and Hussein's half-brother, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the Revolutionary Court judge, also were sentenced to be executed by hanging.

The court also convicted former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan of premeditated murder and sentenced him to life in prison. Three other co-defendants of Hussein -- Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, Ali Dayih Ali and Abdullah Kazim -- were convicted of murder and torture and sentenced to up to 15 years in prison.

An eighth defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, a low-ranking Baath party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

When Hussein was brought into the dock, he immediately sat down in his chair and initially refused to comply with the judges order to stand for the reading of his sentence. He mockingly told the judge that he could hear him just as well from his chair.

Eventually, two bailiffs were ordered to lift the former dictator to his feet, and he remained standing for the rest of the proceedings.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said he hoped that the verdict would help bring about reconciliation. He invited former regime elements that "do not have Iraqi blood on their hands" to join the political process.

"It is the end of the black period and the start of a new period in Iraq," al-Maliki said in a televised address from his office in Baghdad's Green Zone.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad offered congratulations to the Iraqi people.

"A former dictator feared by millions, who killed his own citizens without mercy or justice, who waged wars against neighboring countries, has been brought to trial in his own country – held accountable in a court of law with ordinary citizens bearing witness," Khalilzad said in a statement.

"Although the Iraqis may face difficult days in the coming weeks, closing the book on Saddam and his regime is an opportunity to unite and build a better future. As the Iraqi people move forward, the United States will support them in their efforts to build a just and democratic society."

The verdict comes nearly three years after U.S. forces captured the dictator, unkempt and burrowed away in an underground hiding place in the village of Adwar.

The verdict and sentencing automatically will be sent for review to a nine-member appellate court. It could be several months, if not longer, before the sentences are carried out.

The capital remained on lockdown as the rulings against Hussein and his co-defendants were read in the courtroom deep in the Green Zone, the tightly-guarded compound in central Baghdad that is also home to the U.S. embassy and various Iraqi government buildings.

Fearful that there would be a surge in violence in response to the verdict, the government banned people from the streets of the capital on Sunday. Beyond Baghdad, a curfew was imposed on the Salahuddin province, which includes Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, and the restive provinces of Diyala.

On Friday, the Iraqi government ordered its security forces on high alert, canceling leaves for police officers and soldiers. The government, fearing that former regime loyalists would target Dujail, deployed extra troops to the village.

Hussein's lawyers, Khalil al-Dulaimi and former U.S. Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark, have warned that a death sentence for Hussein surely would lead to increased violence. Both lawyers also protested the timing of the verdict and sentencing, just two days before U.S. voters go to the polls to vote in mid-term congressional elections.

Before the session began on Monday, Clark was ejected from the courtroom after handing the judge a memorandum in which he called the trial a travesty.

Those involved in the trial have faced constant danger since the court convened last year. Three defense attorneys were killed, 200 relatives of victims of Dujail have been murdered and several families of witnesses have been moved inside the Green Zone because of safety concerns, said Bassem Ridha, the Iraq government's court observer (this sentence as originally posted has been corrected).

DOJ_NMG_0091227

The Dujail trial centered on Hussein's government systematically rounding up and killing 148 Shiite Muslims from the northern Iraqi town after an attempt to assassinate Hussein there in July 1982.

During the 40-session trial, the prosecution presented incriminating documents. They included an execution order for 148 people signed by Hussein, and an investigative report presented to Hussein that indicated only 10 people were involved in the assassination attempt. Hussein acknowledged that he issued an order to have the village's orchards destroyed and said he had entire families in Dujail detained together.

Another Iraqi government document unveiled during the trial described the mass relocation of 399 people from Dujail to a desert camp in Al-Muthanna province.

Al-Bandar, head of the Revolutionary Court that issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents, admitted in court that all the victims were found guilty in a seemingly perfunctory one-day trial.

Nearly four dozen of the victims died in captivity, and posthumous orders for their execution were issued afterwards. In a matter-of-fact tone, al-Bandar told the court it wasn't all that unusual for detainees to die during interrogation.

One Dujail witness, who avoided being executed because of a bureaucratic snafu, said he did not even recall a trial for the accused.

Throughout the trial, the defense characterized the 148 victims as Shiite militants backing the Iranian government. The incident happened in the midst of the Iran-Iraq war, and the authorities had no choice but to respond with strong measures to an assassination attempt on a head of state, the defendants and their lawyers argued.

In finding Hussein guilty, the court affirmed that the evidence and testimony met the burden of proof that the former president had "command responsibility" for the slaughter committed at Dujail and did nothing to prevent it. He knew about atrocities committed at Dujail but did nothing to stop it or to punish those who carried out the killings, the court ruled.

A second trial of Hussein and six co-defendants is underway for their roles in Operation Anfal, a 1987-88 campaign against Iraqi Kurds in which about 180,000 people were killed. In that case, Hussein and one co-defendant face charges of genocide.

The impact a guilty verdict Sunday might have on U.S. elections remains unclear, with pollsters and analysts saying that a single incident may not be enough to offset voters' deep dissatisfaction with a war in its third year.

In an interview Friday, one Washington political analyst, Charlie Cook, predicted that the verdict would not have a positive impact for the Republican Party, which has been dogged by public disapproval of the Bush administration's handling of the war.

"Unless they take him out to a firing range and shoot him on live American television on Monday, this is going to have no impact on the elections," Cook said. "There's no good news for the Republicans anymore. This election is not about Saddam Hussein."

The verdict capped a year-long trial in which a chaotic, circus-like atmosphere often overshadowed the gripping testimony by victims and witnesses of the systematic roundup and killing of 148 people in Dujail.

Both of Hussein's trials have been marked by rambling monologues from the defendants, harsh rebukes of the court's legitimacy and several boycotts of the proceedings by the defendants and their lawyers.

U.S. officials advising the court complained that despite the noise and distractions caused by the defendants, Hussein received a fair trial.

The court heard testimony from 130 witnesses, and the accused were given the opportunity to mount robust defenses. Unlike other modern despots, including Slobodan Milosevic, Idi Amin and Pol Pot, Hussein and his henchmen were brought to justice in their own country by their own people, the U.S. advisers argued.

"If you really look at the [trial's] chaos, it was really brought [about by] the activities of defense attorneys walking out…or the activities of the defense," said one U.S. official close to the court, who briefed reporters prior to the verdicts.

"Overlaying all of that was the constant receipt of the evidence, the testimony of complainants and witnesses, the documentary evidence, the experts….It goes a long way in saying this was a fair trial."

Hussein Is Sentenced To Death By Hanging (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 — Three and a half years after American troops captured Baghdad and ended the dictatorship of Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi court set up to judge the brutalities of his 24 years in power found him guilty on Sunday of crimes against humanity and sentenced him to death by hanging.

An automatic appeal of the death sentence will delay it, but some Iraqi judicial officials privately held out the possibility that Mr. Hussein could go to the gallows in a matter of months, perhaps before next spring. That may depend on behind-the-scenes maneuvering by Mr. Hussein's embattled successors in Iraq's new government, who have already shown that they are not hesitant to pressure judges in the case.

For Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the death sentence was a welcome relief from bad news on the war front and appeared to be an opportunity to score gains with his own fractured constituency of Shiite religious groups. Mr. Maliki, who has said that he favors the swift execution of Mr. Hussein, appeared on television to proclaim that the former Iraqi ruler got what he deserved.

The case that brought death sentences for Mr. Hussein and two other defendants, including one of his half-brothers, focused on the ruthless repression of a small Shiite town north of Baghdad after what was said to be an assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein in 1982. Judged against the sweep of terror under Mr. Hussein, the case was a narrow one, involving the execution of 148 men and youths from the town of Dujail, and what the court found to have been a "widespread and systematic" persecution of the town's inhabitants in the years that followed.

The contrasting reaction to the verdicts, in the heavily fortified courthouse in Baghdad and across Iraq, was a testament to the bitter divisions sown by the toppling of Mr. Hussein in April 2003, and to the country's spiraling descent since then into a near-anarchy of insurgency and sectarian killing. From Mr. Hussein and his unreconciled supporters among Iraq's Sunni minority, there was an explosion of anger.

Among the newly empowered Shiite majority, there was an eruption of joy, and volleys of celebratory gunfire from pistols and automatic weapons.

As the chief judge read out the death sentence, a defiant but exhausted-looking Mr. Hussein shouted: "Long live the people! Long live the nation! Down with the occupiers! Down with the spies!" Thrusting his right forefinger into the air, then raising a heavily thumbed Koran with his left hand, he repeatedly chanted the traditional Muslim invocation, "God is Great!" As two court bailiffs moved to hold his arms down, he called one "stupid" and demanded, "Don't twist my arm." Then he mocked the judge, Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman. "Go to hell, you and the court!" he said.

The verdicts were greeted with a similar divide in opinion outside Iraq. President Bush described the trial of Mr. Hussein before the Iraqi High Tribunal, the court set up to try the top officials of the ousted government, as "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

The reaction was negative from some in other Arab countries and from Western legal-monitoring and rights groups, which had been critical of procedures at the trial, saying they were loaded in favor of "victor's justice" and that the Bush administration should have insisted that an international court hear the cases.

Before the verdicts, Mr. Maliki had imposed an around-the-clock curfew on Baghdad and other regions with heavy Sunni populations or a volatile mix of Sunnis and Shiites, including Mr. Hussein's hometown, Tikrit. Iraqi security forces were placed on high alert and American aircraft — unpiloted reconnaissance drones flying low, and fighter jets roaring high above — crossed the capital. Around the courthouse, in the former headquarters of Mr. Hussein's Baath Party, American troops tightened the already formidable cordon that has protected the trial, with turret gunners in dirt-brown Humvees watching all approaching traffic intently.

But the curfew was widely flouted. In Shiite areas, including Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, residents flooded the streets, whooping and dancing and honking car horns. Abdul Razzaq Hassan, 43, a casual laborer, shouted his exuberance down a telephone line, straining to make himself heard over the throng. "This is a very great happiness! I will never forget this day!" he said.

Mr. Hassan said two of his brothers had been killed by Mr. Hussein, one in 1982 and the other in 1988. Both were members of the Islamic Dawa Party, one of the Shiite religious groups decimated in Mr. Hussein's purges. The party was the principal target of the repression in Dujail. Now, through their election sweep in January, the Shiite groups control the government. "Because of this happiness," Mr. Hassan said, speaking of his lost brothers, "I can let them go."

But a grim and retributive mood settled over predominantly Sunni areas. Fighting broke out between gunmen and Iraqi soldiers in Adhamiya in northeastern Baghdad, said an Interior Ministry official, but American forces suppressed the violence. Police and military authorities reported no other outbreaks of major violence and no deaths.

But hundreds of demonstrators marched in Tikrit, carrying photographs of the former leader, firing weapons in the air, and vowing to avenge him. In nearby Samarra, protesters chanted, "The ground will be burned." Witnesses said they were escorted — and in some cases, given rides — by officers from the American-trained police.

For Mr. Hussein, the sentencing, nearly three years after American troops pulled him from a stifling earthen bunker that had been his hiding place near Tikrit, the sentencing was rife with ironies. For all his insistence during the trial that he remained Iraq's lawful president, he seemed a shrunken figure, nondescript in the ill-fitting charcoal suit and tieless white shirt provided by his captors.

The Baath Party building, a vast, pillared structure in the imperial style he favored for the hundreds of palaces he built across the country, is only a short drive from the Republican Palace, once the epicenter of his power beside the Tigris River, and now the base for top American military commanders and officials.

Combative throughout the trial, Mr. Hussein seemed to be beside himself with frustration and anger as the death sentence was announced. Judge Abdel-Rahman tried briefly to calm him. “There’s no point in this,” he said as the former ruler conducted an unbroken monologue, trying to shout the judge down.

But Mr. Hussein, 69, would not be assuaged. As the judge moved rapidly through the counts of crimes against humanity on which the five-judge panel court had found him guilty — willful killing, unlawful imprisonment and forced deportation of hundreds of Dujail’s townspeople to a desert camp in southern Iraq, torture and “other inhumane acts” — the last four counts each carrying lengthy jail terms — Mr. Hussein, exhaustion showing in the strained timber of his voice and the heavy bags under his eyes, continued to fulminate.

When the judge came to the critical words — “the court has decided to sentence Saddam Hussein al-Majid to death by hanging” — Mr. Hussein offered the bitter riposte that was the coda for many of his fiery denunciations during the 10-month trial. “You don’t decide anything,” he told the judge. “You are servants of the occupiers and their lackeys! You are puppets!”

In less than five minutes, the judge ordered the former ruler forcibly led from court. “Take him out,” he said. Still, the last words belonged to Mr. Hussein. “Long live the Arabs! Long live the Kurds!” he said as he walked, bailiffs clutching his arms, to the door leading to the courtroom cells, and from there back to custody in an American detention center near Baghdad airport where he will remain, American officials said, until the appeal has been completed.

Court officials who spoke with reporters after the sentencing said a nine-judge appellate court would automatically review the death sentences imposed on Mr. Hussein; Barzan Ibrahim Hasan al-Tikriti, his half brother, who was head of the feared Mukhabarat intelligence agency at the time of the events at Dujail; and Awad al-Bandar, who, as chief judge of Mr. Hussein’s revolutionary court, handed down the 148 death sentences against the townspeople. A fourth defendant, Taha Yassin Ramadan al-Jizrawi, a former vice president under Mr. Hussein, was sentenced to life imprisonment, and court officials said that his case, too, would go to appeal.

The Dujail trial was originally conceived as a way of building up to the much bigger cases under preparation, involving the killing of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis under Mr. Hussein. A second trial, involving the so-called Anfal military campaign against Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, and what the prosecution witnesses have said were at least 180,000 deaths, is already under way, with Mr. Hussein again the principal defendant.

But as the pressures of the war here have mounted, so have demands from the country’s new leaders, both Shiites and Kurds, for an early execution of Mr. Hussein, to eliminate him as a rallying point for Sunni militants fighting to restore, if not Mr. Hussein personally, at least some form of Sunni minority rule.

A year ago, before the sharp worsening in the killings across Iraq, court officials were saying that they favored deferring Mr. Hussein’s execution, if ordered by the Dujail court, until after he had been held accountable for far more catastrophic crimes.

On Sunday, Iraqi court officials made a point of saying that nothing in Iraqi law would prevent Mr. Hussein being executed before the Anfal trial ended. Some said privately they hoped for his execution within as little as three months. The officials said the appeal would begin within 30 days, after prosecution and defense lawyers had time to prepare their submissions. Iraqi law provides that any death sentences the court upholds must be confirmed by the country’s presidential council and carried out within 30 days.

In his televised speech, Mr. Maliki compared Mr. Hussein to Hitler and Mussolini, and said “this insulting end” — meaning the death sentence — was fitting for “a man who subjected Iraq to a series of wars and murderous campaigns that ripped the social fabric of the country, wasted its resources and served only his sick dreams and illusions.”

Testimony in the Dujail trial described how no more than 10 men fired at Mr. Hussein’s motorcade, with most of the gunmen killed almost immediately. Within hours, Mr. Tikriti, the intelligence chief, and Mr. Ramadan, then leader of a Baath militia known as the Popular Army, began a sweeping punishment.

Witnesses said hundreds of people were arrested, taken to Baghdad and tortured, with 46 of the 148 later sentenced to death dying from mistreatment before reaching Mr. Bandar’s court. Hundreds of others were sent to a desert detention camp, and tens of thousands of acres of orchards, Dujail’s main livelihood, were bulldozed. Mr. Hussein’s lawyers said that the would-be assassins were Iranian-backed Shiites, and that he was justified in ordering the crackdown because Iraq was at war with Iran.

Three local Baath party officials from Dujail — Abdullah Kadhim Ruweid, his son Mizher Abdullah Ruweid and Ali Dayeh Ali — were also found guilty of willful killing, forcible deportation, and torture for their role in the repression at Dujail and sentenced to 15-year prison terms. Another Baath party official, Mohammed Ali Azzawi, was found not guilty and ordered released.

A photographer with a clear view of Mr. Tikriti, Mr. Hussein’s half-brother, said he appeared on the verge of tears when his death sentence was read. As given to tirades as Mr. Hussein during the trial, he seemed to have at least temporarily lost his will to fight. “Congratulations, your honor, for reaching this decision,” he told the judge.

Mr. Ramadan seemed stunned, despite being spared the death sentence. He had argued that his role in the Dujail events was limited to overseeing the razing of the orchards. His head dropped as he heard the judge sentence him to life in prison. "May I say something?" he asked Judge Abdel-Rahman. "I am so surprised at this sentence. Tell me, who did I willfully kill?"

In A Divided Iraq, Reaction To Saddam Death Sentence Conforms To Sectarian Lines (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 — The day in Baghdad belonged to the Shiites. Their government had returned. Their dead were resting easier. And the generous humor that used to grace faces here was back.

Saadi Hamid, 63, sat in his photography shop staring up at a television carrying the second broadcast of the sentencing. He cried when he saw it the first time.

But this time, when Saddam Hussein began to shout, "Long live the Iraqi people!" Mr. Hamid looked away and smiled broadly.

"Long life for Iraqi people, and he killed everyone," he said. "No one can help him now."

As the pop of gunfire echoed jubilation in Shiite and Kurdish neighborhoods across Iraq on Sunday, and gloom spread over Sunni ones, a surprise emerged. The death penalty for Iraq's former ruler would be a political blessing for the one now in power.

Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, was not in the courtroom when a panel of judges sentenced Mr. Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, but by late afternoon in Baghdad's Shiite neighborhoods, he was the one receiving the credit.

"We have a government now," grinned Fuad Haithem Jassim, a 35-year-old police officer standing near a lively soccer game on a street in central Baghdad, largely emptied by a curfew.

A Shiite man at one of Baghdad's many funerals was similarly reassured. "Saddam was the snake head, and you have to cut that head, and they cut it," he said in English. "The government began the first step. All the people say we agree with you now, we agree."

It was an unexpected boost for Mr. Maliki, whose political fortunes have faltered as he has struggled to meet American demands to stop Shiite militias on one hand, and to stay as close as possible to his increasingly frustrated Shiite base on the other.

Those Shiite supporters experienced a long-awaited moment of release, as thousands who lost loved ones to Mr. Hussein's brutal state poured into the streets like water — laughing, singing, crying, and holding pictures of dead loved ones to their chests.

But the verdict divided Iraqis as well, humiliating minority Sunni Arabs and raising fears among Iraqis that Sunni militants would unleash a harsh new series of attacks.

A brooding bitterness settled into Sunni areas, where residents saw the trial as a fraudulent affair that had followed an American-authored script. Many cited this week's election in the United States as evidence of such a fix.

"It's just like a satirical play," said a 23-year-old named Ali in western Baghdad, who was occupying himself on a PlayStation to take his mind off the day's events.

Though flare-ups between angry Sunnis and Iraqi soldiers and police officers occurred in Baghdad and several other cities, the country was relatively free of violence. This was seen as a credit to the efforts of American and Iraqi security forces, which enforced broad curfews. The United States military reported five American deaths, in Baghdad and western Iraq.

A carefree and celebratory atmosphere settled into Shiite blocks. In Sadr City, the largest Shiite neighborhood in the capital, women, chased by children, handed out chocolates in chanting crowds. Young men sprayed stringy foam at cars.

But there was a bitter edge, too, from the long decades of oppression and the loved ones lost then.

"I waited for this day for a long time," said Muhammad Hussein Ali, a Shiite in Najaf whose brother's body was found in a mass grave after the American invasion. "I feel sad for my brother. But now I feel satisfied that his blood didn't go for nothing."

Shiites praised Mr. Maliki for taking a tough stand against Mr. Hussein, but said they feared what might come next. Sunnis were angry, they said, and attacks seemed imminent.

"They had good lives before," said Ali Rashid, a police officer leaning against his truck with other officers and drinking a soft drink in Karada, a middle-class neighborhood in central Baghdad. "He treated them well. They'll take their revenge."

News of the verdict caught Riyadh al-Adhadh, a physician and a Sunni city council member from Adhamiya, busily tending to a request for hospital supplies. Six people were killed and 20 were wounded the night before in two mortar attacks, and more blood was needed. He was more tired than angry.

When Mr. Maliki praised Iraqi security forces in televised remarks after the verdict, the words felt particularly hollow to Dr. Adhadh.

DOJ_NMG_0091231

"Maliki can't do anything," he said by telephone from his house in Adhamiya. "What is his system? His system is militias." He added, "How can he dissolve them if they are supporting him?"

Mr. Maliki, meanwhile, found fault with Sunni broadcasts, and temporarily closed two Sunni satellite channels for running what a government spokesman said was incendiary programming.

Iraqis are dying at a tremendous rate these days, Sunnis noted. One pointed out that Mr. Hussein was convicted for 148 deaths — a number that is not all that far from the daily death toll in today's Iraq, which hovers around 100.

"He's a murderer, he's a dictator, but now we have many tyrants," said a teacher in Adhamiya, who, like many in Baghdad these days, did not want to give her full name because she was afraid.

Even among the jubilant Shiites, there were shadows that showed just how far apart Iraqis have moved in the past year. "There are no friends between Sunni and Shiites now, just relatives because they were together before," said Samer, 28, a Shiite walking with friends on a quiet block in Karada. Violence had destroyed chances for new mixed relationships, he said.

"Civil war is happening in Iraq," he said before hurrying to catch up with his friends.

Two women walked purposefully down the Karada sidewalk. One was a Christian, who said she was happy if the Shiites were happy because they were the ones with the power now. Another, Haloud, gave a piercing gaze, but not her sect, and grabbed a reporter's hand as she spoke in broken English.

"I'm not happy for anything in Iraq," she said with almost desperate intensity. "I'm very sad for Iraq. For that road. For that woman. For that chair. For that man.

"I'm very sad for my country. That's it. O.K.?" And she rushed off, her black abaya billowing behind her in the wind.

Verdict Was Expected in Mideast

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 5 — As news of the verdict against Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants spread throughout the Middle East on Sunday, many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair.

"There was no mystery or suspense here; everyone knew what the result would be," said Daoud Kuttab, a news media critic and founder of Ammannet.net, an independent internet radio station in Amman. "The only reason people watched today was to see the reactions on the defendants' faces."

Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair.

"This is the first trial of its kind of an Arab president in contemporary history, and it could have had many implications," said Salah Amer, professor of international law at Cairo University.

"They should have been anxious to make sure it adheres to international legal standards," he said. "But there is a huge question about when this sentence was issued and in what kind of conditions in Iraq."

Amnesty International said it deplored Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

Reactions To Verdict Reflect Shifts In Iraqis' Fortunes (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Salih Dehema

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 5 -- On a momentous day in a locked-down city, two men who live on adjacent streets sat alone in their bedrooms Sunday morning to watch the same televised event, but for different reasons. Husam Muhammad, a Sunni Muslim, ordered his family not to disturb him. Mahmoud Abdallah, a Shiite Muslim, simply closed his door.

"I knew I was going to cry," said Muhammad, 55, a former Agriculture Ministry official. "And it's a shame to cry in front of my family."

"I wanted to enjoy this moment by myself, without interruption," said Abdallah, 26, a merchant who sells electrical appliances.

Less than an hour later, deposed Iraqi president Saddam Hussein and two co-defendants were convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to death by hanging. Muhammad cried. Abdallah smiled.

"I lost control at that moment," Muhammad said. "Iraq without Saddam Hussein, or a man like Saddam Hussein, will never be Iraq."

"This man is a dictator," said Abdallah. "He insulted this country and its people. He deserved this punishment."

Here in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiyah, Hussein's death sentence evoked strong and divergent emotions, mirroring sentiments across Iraq. They spoke to the dramatic shift in fortunes of Iraq's two major sects that began after the U.S.-led invasion and continues to unfold in this fourth year of war.

For the Sunnis of Kadhimiyah, the verdict drove another nail into the coffin of the man many still see as the leader of their community, which once ruled Iraq but now feels more besieged than ever. The sentence, some said, was the work of a victor's court that was more interested in vengeance than judicial fairness.

"Every honest and free Iraqi person will be very sad about the verdict," said Ali Safar, 52, a Sunni merchant. "And every person who is not honest and free will be happy."

The verdict also deepened Sunnis' fears about their future in an Iraq dominated by a Shiite-led government and plagued by sectarian strife. "You've heard at the airport the term 'The visibility is zero'?" Muhammad asked. "Just like that, for us the visibility is zero. We cannot see what's next for us."

For the more numerous Shiites of Kadhimiyah, after decades of repression under Hussein's government, the verdict delivered the justice they have long sought. Many vividly remember the executions of 148 men and boys in the town of Dujail ordered by Hussein following a botched assassination attempt in 1982. They also remember the Anfal campaign, in which Hussein is accused of ordering the mass killings of ethnic Kurds in the late 1980s.

"We were waiting for this day more than 20 years," said Hani Ismael, 35, a Shiite laborer who lives five houses down from Muhammad. "I do not wish him to be hanged, but I wish him more torture in his grave."

Shiites also rejoiced in the hope that their political future in Iraq and in the region would become more secure. Would the verdict persuade Hussein loyalists to abandon the Sunni Arab insurgency? Would it boost the chances of embattled Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, to stabilize his divided country? "I am optimistic for the future. This will help the Shiite leaders," Abdallah said. "I feel this gang that was controlling the country is now finished. God willing, those people supporting Saddam and his Baathists, when they hear about this decision, they will be finished."

After the verdict was announced, the streets of Kadhimiyah erupted in celebration, despite a government-imposed curfew, as Shiites unleashed their joy. Shiite policemen played religious songs and chanted the names of Shiite martyrs. Some danced, wagging their handguns. Others handed out candy to residents who defied the curfew.

Jubilant Shiites shot guns into the air, so much that representatives of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr were dispatched to houses to order the revelers to stop. The bullets, they told the gleeful gunmen, were needed to strike at their enemies.

Sunnis, however, stayed inside their homes, fearing for their safety. Muhammad, who is bald, with thick eyebrows and mustache, said he is the only Sunni left on his street. Sectarian tensions chased the rest away. As celebratory gunfire popped around his house, he said he spent Sunday listening to news reports. He took some comfort that two human rights groups, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, condemned the death sentence, saying the trial was unfair and marred by serious flaws.

"Saddam was accused of killing 148 people. Now, more than 148 innocent people are getting killed in Iraq every day," Muhammad said. "His era is better than the era we are living in now."

Some Shiites in Kadhimiyah, a bustling community built around a gold-domed shrine and nestled along the Tigris River, agreed.

Naseer Muneer, 25, a Shiite who works in the Social Services Ministry, said that under Hussein's secular government, sectarian divisions seldom burst into the open. The people who support Sunday's verdict, he said, "do not realize the danger and the consequences of what will happen, because the simple fact is that this government has not achieved anything for the Iraqi people up till now."

Muhanned Hussein Okeily, 23, a Shiite working with the Iraqi military, predicted that Hussein would never be executed. "They announced the verdict to distract the people from the lack of social services, security, stability and [from the] sectarian violence," he said.

But Abu Sajad, 34, a Shiite history professor, said the verdict "lets the world know that every tyrant will have a dark end," especially other authoritarian rulers in the Middle East. "I wish for Saddam to be cut to pieces and hanged on the Baghdad streets to be a lesson for the Arab rulers to not repeat what Saddam did to his people."

Abdallah said he worries about the reverse: that Sunni Arab rulers in the region, concerned about the presence of a Shiite government in Iraq, would use their influence to prevent Hussein from being executed, keeping the hopes of many Iraqi Sunnis alive. Or that the Iraqi government, concerned about greater instability, might lack the political will to carry out Hussein's sentence.

"The fear I have is an internal push against executing Saddam," Abdallah said.

Despite their differences, Abdallah and Muhammad share a similar prediction for the immediate future. "I am expecting a big reaction from the terrorists in response to the Saddam verdict," Abdallah said.

Said Muhammad: "The civil war is coming."

Saddam Hussein Sentenced To Hang (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091233

Saddam Hussein and two senior members of his regime were on Sunday sentenced by an Iraqi special tribunal to death by hanging for carrying out a campaign of collective punishment against a Shia village where the deposed president suffered a 1982 assassination attempt.

Mr Hussein exhibited more of the defiance he has shown throughout the trial. He at first refused to stand for the verdict and had to be lifted to his feet by guards. He shouted "Long live the people!" and "God is greater!" as the sentence was pronounced.

Awadh al-Bandar, a former revolutionary court judge under Mr Hussein's regime who sentenced to death more than 140 residents of the Shia village of Dujail after the 1982 incident, and Mr Hussein's half-brother and former intelligence chief Barzan al-Tikriti were also sentenced to hang.

Former vice-president Taha Yassin Ramadan received life imprisonment, while three comparatively minor officials from the former ruling Baath party in the village received sentences of up to 15 years in prison.

According to Iraqi law, death sentences should be carried out within 30 days of the defendants' final appeal. The appeals court might not give a final decision until well into next year.

The sentence sparked celebration in Shia areas, and angry demonstrations in Sunni Arab ones.

Immediately following the verdict, Iraqi TV reported that mosque loudspeakers in Baghdad had issued calls not to fire weapons into the air in celebration. Iraqi TV showed crowds dancing in the streets, waving pictures of radical Shia leader Muqtada al-Sadr whose father was killed by presumed regime agents in 1981.

One guard in the heavily-fortified Green Zone, whose said his brother was killed by Mr Hussein in 1981, had little sympathy for the defendants. "They would condemn people to death without any process, no evidence, judgment, then one minute later the grave." He spat at the screen as the deposed president shouted defiance at the court.

The trial had been plagued by allegations that Iraq's Shia-led government used its influence to affect the outcome. Amnesty International, the human rights group that documented thousands of cases of torture and disappearances under Mr Hussein, said the trial was unfair.

The court is expected to produce a long written explanation of its judgment in the coming weeks, which legal experts say will be crucial in determining whether Mr Hussein and his co-defendants were given a fair hearing.

George W. Bush described Mr Hussein's conviction as a "major achievement for Iraq's young democracy".

Mr Bush, who on Sunday was conducting last-minute campaigning in the US mid-term congressional elections, which take place on Tuesday, said the verdict was a "milestone" on the path to Iraqi freedom.

In what was an indirect rebuke of John Kerry, the losing 2004 Democrat presidential candidate, who last week "botched" a joke that appeared to denigrate the educational achievements of US soldiers serving in Iraq, Mr Bush also emphasised praise for the "young men and women who serve in uniform".

On Sunday Rahm Emanuel, leader of the Democratic campaign for the House of Representatives, reminded voters that Mr Bush had described Mr Hussein's capture in December 2003 as having "turned the corner" in the Iraq war. He said there was as little evidence now, as then, that the former Iraqi president's conviction would change the picture on the ground.

Opinion polls suggest the Democrats, who have campaigned for a "phased redeployment" of US forces out of Iraq, are on course to retake at least one house of congress. It is unclear what, if any, impact Mr Hussein's sentencing will have on voter sentiment in the US.

Margaret Beckett, the UK's foreign secretary, welcomed the judgment: "It is right that those accused of such crimes against the Iraqi people should face Iraqi justice."

Mideast Expected The Verdict But Doubts Whether It's Fair (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Nov. 5 — As news of the verdict against Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants spread throughout the Middle East on Sunday, many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair.

"There was no mystery or suspense here; everyone knew what the result would be;" said Daoud Kuttab, a media critic and founder of Ammannet.net, an independent internet radio station in Amman. "The only reason people watched today was to see the reactions on the defendants' faces."

Many analysts and others in the region who followed the trial said that what mattered was how the court had reached its judgment and that the process had seemed highly flawed. But critics and supporters of Mr. Hussein, the former dictator, said they were left with more frustration than closure.

Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair. They said it had seemed politicized, that the judges had not seemed to be in control of the process and that rulings about procedures had seemed contradictory. Almost everyone agreed that the verdict was unlikely to stop the violence gripping Iraq.

"This is the first trial of its kind of an Arab president in contemporary history, and it could have had many implications," said Salah Amer, professor of international law at Cairo University. "They should have been anxious to make sure it adheres to international legal standards. But there is a huge question about when this sentence was issued and in what kind of conditions in Iraq."

Mr. Amer and other analysts said the timing of the verdict, on a day of the week when the special tribunal does not normally hold session, and just two days before midterm elections in the United States, underscored the perception that the proceedings had been politically charged.

"His sentencing now is a deliberate attempt to boost the Republicans in the U.S.," said Imad Shueibi, president of the Data and Strategic Studies Center, a private research organization in Damascus. "They're expecting big losses in the upcoming elections, and they figure maybe this sentence might give an illusion of some success. But of course only the naïve will believe that."

Amnesty International said it deplored Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

Makram Mohamed Ahmed, a columnist with the Egyptian government-backed Al Ahram newspaper, said Mr. Hussein "was a burden to his nation and a burden to the entire Arab world and he might have truly deserved this fate, if only the court's legitimacy was not in question."

The verdict, Mr. Ahmed said, had even failed to send a message to other Arab leaders to loosen their grip and reform. "I don't think any of the Arab leaders will come to think that this can happen again because Bush's administration is losing its popularity, and the democrats may get a majority in the Congressional elections."

On the streets of some Arab cities, some defended Mr. Hussein. "Saddam was only defending himself in the Dujail incident and is therefore not a criminal," said Imad Suadi, 43, a taxi driver in Amman. "If any other leader faced the same ordeal, he would act the same. But this verdict is a blow to Arab leaders, warning that anyone of them who raises his head up will face the same fate."

Not everyone was interested. In Damascus late Sunday night, many cafe patrons tuned in to a local soccer game, hardly discussing the verdict. One shop owner, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want any repercussions, said he was aware of the sentencing, but had not thought much of it. "May God protect us from such things," he said.

World Opinion Divided On Saddam Sentence (AP)

By William J. Kole

AP, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein's death sentence was celebrated by some on Sunday as justice deserved or even divine, but denounced by others as a political ploy two days before critical U.S. midterm congressional elections.

Worldwide, the range of reactions — including a European outcry over capital punishment and doubts about the fairness of the tribunal that ordered Saddam to hang — reflected new geopolitical fault lines drawn after America's decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and depose its dictator.

The European Union welcomed the verdict but said Saddam should not be put to death. At the Vatican, Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues, called the sentence a throwback to "eye for an eye" vengeance.

"This is not the way to present the new Iraq to the world, which is different from Saddam, who was behind hundreds of thousands of deaths as well as death penalty sentences," said Hands Off Cain, an Italian organization working to rid the world of capital punishment.

Islamic leaders warned that executing Saddam could inflame those who revile the U.S., undermining President Bush's policy in the Middle East and inspiring terrorists.

"The hanging of Saddam Hussein will turn to hell for the Americans," said Vitaya Wisethrat, a respected Muslim cleric in Thailand, which has its own Islamic insurgency in the country's south.

"The Saddam case is not a Muslim problem but the problem of America and its domestic politics," he said. "Maybe Bush will use this case to tell the voters that Saddam is dead and that the Americans are safe. But actually the American people will be in more danger with the death of Saddam."

Bush called the verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

Praising the Iraqi judiciary for its independence, the White House denied arranging for the verdict to be announced just two days before pivotal elections in which Democrats are fighting for control of Congress.

"The idea is preposterous," said Tony Snow, Bush's spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0091235

Yet there was a touch of contempt as well, reminiscent of the international response when the United States failed to find the weapons of mass destruction Bush insisted had made Saddam such a threat.

Intervening militarily was "a grave error," said Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, whose country withdrew its troops from Iraq, contending that conditions there have worsened since the U.S.-led invasion.

Although some voiced doubts that Saddam would actually be hanged, the International Federation for Human Rights denounced the death sentence, warning that it "will generate more violence and deepen the cycle of killing for revenge in Iraq." The Council of Europe called it "futile and wrong" to execute Saddam.

Louise Arbour, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, urged Iraq to ensure a fair appeals process and to refrain from executing Saddam even if the sentence is upheld.

In Pakistan, an opposition religious coalition claimed American forces have caused more deaths in Iraq in the past 3 1/2 years than Saddam did during his 23-year rule, and insisted Bush should stand trial for war crimes.

"Who will punish the Americans and their lackeys who have killed many more people than Saddam Hussein?" asked Hafiz Hussain Ahmed, a senior lawmaker from the Mutahida Majlis-e-Amal coalition, which is critical of Pakistan's military cooperation with the United States.

In the Arab world, some Muslims saw the sentence as divine retribution, but others decried it as a farce.

"Saddam is being judged by traitors, Americans and Iranians, and those who came on the backs of American tanks," said Mahmoud al-Saifi of the Arab Liberation Front.

Iran, which fought an eight-year war against Saddam's Iraq and is a bitter opponent of the United States, praised the death sentence and said it hoped that Saddam — denounced by one lawmaker as "a vampire" — still would be tried for other crimes.

Key U.S. allies — including Britain and Australia — welcomed Sunday's verdict, which had been widely expected.

"Appalling crimes were committed by Saddam Hussein's regime. It is right that those accused of such crimes against the Iraqi people should face Iraqi justice," British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett said in a statement.

"The whole process of the trial is a sign of democratic hope and I believe the world should see it as such," Australian Prime Minister John Howard told the Nine Network television.

Amnesty International questioned the fairness of the trial, and international legal experts said Saddam should be kept alive long enough to answer for other atrocities.

"The longer we can keep Saddam alive, the longer the tribunal can have to explore some of the other crimes involving hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," said Sonya Sceats, an international law expert at the Chatham House foreign affairs think tank in London.

"The problem really is that this tribunal has not shown itself to be fair and impartial — not only by international standards, but by Iraqi standards," she said.

Chandra Muzaffar, president of the Malaysian-based International Movement for a Just World, also voiced concerns that Saddam's trial "violated many established norms of international jurisprudence."

Even so, "Saddam was undoubtedly a brutal dictator, and even though I wouldn't subscribe to the death penalty, he deserves to be punished severely for the enormity of his crimes," he added.

Konstantin Kosachyov, the Kremlin-allied head of the international affairs committee in Russia's State Duma, or lower house of parliament, said the sentence would deepen divisions in Iraq.

But Kosachyov expressed doubts that Saddam would actually be executed.

The verdict, he said, was mostly symbolic — "retribution that modern Iraq is taking against Saddam's regime."

Analysis: Verdict May Not Stop Violence (AP)

By Robert H. Reid

AP, November 6, 2006

The future of Iraq may depend little on whether Saddam Hussein hangs. The Sunni insurgency is so deeply entrenched and sectarian bloodlust so strong that Iraq seems set to continue spiraling into violence — regardless of its former president's fate.

Some fear that the Saddam verdict, by angering the Sunni minority, could intensify the violence once a curfew in Baghdad is lifted. Others say they hope the verdict gives Iraqis a chance "to unite and build a better future," in the words of the U.S. Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

But in the end, Saddam's fate is not what's driving the violence in Iraq now. Instead, religious, nationalistic and sectarian passions have taken over and are tearing the country apart.

Even if it causes a spasm of violence, Saddam's verdict is just a symbol of the deeper, underlying problems. Sunnis are alarmed at the prospect of Shiite domination. Shiites are fed up with attacks by Sunni extremists.

DOJ_NMG_0091236

Without an effective government to protect them, both communities have become locked in a murderous cycle of reprisal killings that looks set to continue.

The insurgency started with Saddam loyalists.

But it long ago expanded into a multi-faceted conflict waged by different groups with different goals: nationalists seeking to drive foreigners from Iraqi soil; Sunni militants fearing domination by the Shiites; and religious zealots waging a global jihad against America.

The death of Saddam would matter little to religious extremists, for example, willing to sacrifice their own lives for their cause.

Likewise with the sectarian violence that has pushed the country to the brink of civil war. It started when Sunni insurgents began attacking Shiite civilians, considering them collaborators with the Americans.

With U.S. and Iraqi forces unable to stop those attacks, Shiite militias took the law into their own hands, sending death squads to exact vengeance on Sunni civilians. Since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February, sectarian reprisal killings have spiraled out of control.

Those hatreds will continue to drive the violence — regardless of what happens to Saddam. Neither the Americans nor their Iraqi partners have found a way to control them.

It's not that Saddam's fate has no effect at all: The sectarian fighting has, indeed, served to boost his image among many of his fellow Sunnis, even those who were happy to see him ousted from power three years ago.

With their minority community under siege since they were ousted from decades of power, many Sunnis have rallied around Saddam, forgetting the abuses suffered by all communities under his hard-line rule.

Thus, Saddam's execution could turn him into a martyr for some Sunnis, who consider the trial simply a smokescreen for the failures of the Americans and their Shiite and Kurdish allies.

"I believe that this trial is politically motivated and not a judicial one," said hardline Sunni cleric Harith al-Dhari. "If Saddam is charged with crimes, then the trial should be postponed until the occupation ends."

But the fact is that Sunnis are likely to remain unhappy even if Saddam were to live. It is their diminished role in the post-Saddam Iraq that most distresses them.

Saddam also matters, without question, to the majority Shiites: The violence has reinforced the determination of the Shiites and Kurds, who suffered immensely under Saddam's brutal rule, to put an end to any chance that the former regime might make a comeback.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, hailed the verdict, proclaiming that it marks "the end of a dark era and a beginning a new epoch" where the rule of law "will be supreme."

Yet al-Maliki's real problem is the burgeoning civil war — and he will make little progress at any unified government, much less a united country, until he can convince Sunnis that they have a future in the new Iraq.

In short, until Iraq's communities reach political agreement on the future of their country, chances for peace appear bleak.

And that could take a very long time.

"You need to look at it in the long term and in the long term, I think the Iraqi people are going to be proud that they gave (Saddam and his defendants) a fair trial," said Christopher Reid, who served as an adviser to the Iraqi court.

But, he adds, acknowledging the current violence: "You can't look at this thing in the short term."

Hussein Trial Was Flawed But Reasonably Fair, And Verdict Was Justified, Legal Experts Say (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

The yearlong trial that ended yesterday with a sentence of death by hanging for Saddam Hussein had serious legal flaws that left doubts about whether he was allowed to present a full defense, international legal experts said.

Lawyers and human rights advocates broadly agreed that the Iraqi tribunal's proceedings frequently fell short of international standards for war crimes cases. But even critics of the trial said the five Iraqi judges who heard the case had made a reasonable effort to conduct a fair trial in the face of sustained pressure from Iraqi political leaders for a swift death sentence. American lawyers pointed to substantial evidence offered by the prosecution implicating Mr. Hussein in the crimes against humanity with which he had been charged.

"Did this meet the standards of international justice?" asked Jonathan Drimmer, who teaches war crimes law at Georgetown University Law Center in Washington. "The answer is no. But to look at the ultimate verdict, it certainly is consistent with the evidence presented."

Miranda Sissons, a senior associate at the International Center for Transitional Justice, a group that has severely criticized some of the trial proceedings, said, "This was not a sham trial," and added, "The judges are doing their best to try this case to an entirely new standard for Iraq."

Mr. Hussein was accused along with seven co-defendants in the executions of 148 men and boys in Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, in 1982. The mass killings came after what was said to be an assassination attempt against the Iraqi leader.

Whether the trial is seen to have been fair is a vital issue for the United States-backed Iraqi government. When the tribunal was created in December 2003, American and Iraqi officials hoped that it would advance the justice system in Iraq, left moribund under Mr. Hussein, and would help bring some reconciliation between the majority Shiites and minority Sunnis.

Since then the country has descended into factional strife. The trial was fair enough to justify the elation yesterday among Iraqis who suffered under Mr. Hussein's rule but also had enough defects that Mr. Hussein's Sunni supporters, who dominated his government, could still contend that it had been victor's justice, as Mr. Hussein's defense lawyers, led by Khalil al-Dulaimi, said yesterday.

The trial was troubled by extreme security issues. Three defense lawyers were assassinated.

Critics cited frequent efforts by Iraqi officials to speed up the trial and influence its outcome. The first chief judge, Rizgar Muhammad Amin, an Iraqi Kurd, resigned in January, saying he was tired of criticism from top Iraqi officials of his handling of the case. A second judge who was in line to succeed him was barred from becoming chief judge because he was said to have had ties to Mr. Hussein's Baath Party, said human rights advocates who have been following the trial.

"The message by politicians and the executive has been quite unambiguously that if the judges do not do what public expectation demands, they will be in trouble," Ms. Sissons said. "Iraqi officials have sent the message, 'We can reach into this court.' "

Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman, who took over as chief judge and presided to the end, was much less tolerant than his predecessor of outbursts by the defendants, who challenged the legitimacy of the court. The chief judge frequently allowed the prosecutor, Jaafar al-Mousawi, to summon evidence and witnesses without first showing them to defense lawyers, violating a basic tenet of trial fair play.

"There was a certain amount of trial by ambush," said Richard Dicker, who has been monitoring the trial for Human Rights Watch, a New York-based group.

On June 13, seemingly in a fit of impatience, Judge Abdel-Rahman abruptly cut off the defense case. "There was a lack of impartiality and judicial temperament" from Judge Abdel-Rahman, Mr. Dicker charged.

However, several American criminal lawyers said the prosecution marshaled surprisingly convincing documents, including those showing Mr. Hussein's signature on orders of execution. "Saddam was convicted on the strength of his own documents," said Michael Scharf, a professor at Case Western Reserve University School of Law who advised the Iraqi tribunal during the trial.

But many trial observers were withholding final opinions yesterday because the Iraqi judges had not issued their written judgment, a voluminous document expected to come out this week.

American lawyers in Iraq dismissed suspicions that the verdict had been delayed to give the Bush administration a political victory in Iraq close to Tuesday's elections.

Accusations by Mr. Hussein's supporters that the trial was manipulated by United States officials were not borne out, American lawyers who followed the case said. An office organized by the United States Embassy helped the tribunal with the investigation and provided legal and logistical assistance. But the Iraqi judges frequently ignored their advice and generally insisted on sticking with familiar procedures from the Iraqi justice system.

"The U.S. government was not the puppet master of this tribunal," Mr. Scharf said.

Mr. Drimmer said that "the trial conduct was a step back from the kind of international justice we had hoped for," and added, "But ultimately having Saddam Hussein prosecuted in a transparent proceeding is a major step for Iraq."

Saddam Sentenced To Death By Hanging (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi Special Tribunal sentenced former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and two of his co-defendants to death in a case charging that they ordered the execution of 148 innocent people in a botched 1982 assassination attempt.

In their verdict, the court made a clear distinction between high-ranking government officials who ordered the attacks and lower-level officials forced to carry them out.

As his sentence was read, Saddam aggressively yelled "God is greater!" to Judge Raouf Abdul. Rahman read the sentence: death for murder, 10 years for forcible deportation, 10 years for torture.

DOJ_NMG_0091238

"Long live the Iraqi people, damnation for the damned," Saddam told the panel of judges. "You are the servants of the colonizers."

His half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, the former head of intelligence, and Awad Hamad al-Bandir, former head of the Iraqi Revolutionary Court, also were sentenced to death by hanging.

Bandir kept shouting "God is Great" repeatedly over the reading of the verdict.

Taha Yassin Ramadan, Saddam's vice president at the time the regime fell, was sentenced to life. Abdullah Kathim Ruwaid, his son, Mizhar Abdullah Kathim Ruwaid and Ali Dayih Ali - all local Baath Party officials in 1982 when someone shot at Saddam's convoy during his visit to the mostly Shiite city of Dujail - received a 15-year sentence.

One defendant, a lower-ranking Baath official in the city of Dujail, where the case centered upon, was released immediately.

Seven guards surrounded Saddam, who wore a suit and carried a Koran, as he entered the courtroom. He initially refused to stand up as the verdict was being read, only doing so after two guards forced him up.

Some of those in the visitor gallery were reprimanded by the judge for cheering too loudly. In Baghdad's mostly Shiite neighborhoods, there was rapid gunfire more than a half-hour after the verdict was read. In Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, protestors immediately took to the streets.

In a statement, U.S. envoy Zalmay Khalilzad said: "Although the Iraqis may face difficult days in the coming weeks, closing the book on Saddam and his regime is an opportunity to unite and build a better future. As the Iraqi people move forward, the United States will support them in their efforts to build a just and democratic society."

The court adjourned immediately after reading the verdicts without elaborating on how it reached them.

The nation braced itself for what some feared would be a new round of violence by Saddam's supporters in an already turbulent nation.

Indeed, all of the nation's security forces were ordered to work, and the government issued a curfew. Others hoped it would rejuvenate hopes in the country's national government and judicial system.

The verdicts were decided by a five-judge panel who read their written statements to each defendant, beginning with Mohammed Azawi Ali, who was immediately cleared of all charges. Many had agreed that prosecution had presented the weakest case against Ali.

The trial, which began in October 2005, charged that Saddam and his cohorts rounded up innocent residents of Dujail, took them off to camps and killed and tortured - all in response to an apparent assassination attempt against Saddam. And they said large parts of the orchards in the city were razed in the search for attempted assassins, in some cases ruining their farming livelihood. Saddam was visiting the town in 1982 when someone fired on his convoy.

In all, Saddam faced seven charges, including murder and crimes against humanity.

While Iraqis were glued to their television sets during the beginning of the trial, they lost almost all interest by the end. Some complained it was a long, drawn-out soap opera, not a swift legal proceeding. Others said the death of 148 people two decades ago now seems insignificant in today's Iraq, where on average 100 people are killed a day nationwide.

In all, 27 residents testified about their ordeal, sometimes retelling their stories verbatim. Some testified while facing the former dictator directly; others from behind a curtain. Another 32 gave their testimony in statements read in court.

In between, the head judge stepped down and three defense attorneys were assassinated. The remaining defense attorneys walked out of the proceedings toward the end of the hearings.

During the trial Saddam and Bazran al-Tikriti often delivered long diatribes, questioning the legitimacy of the court, while sitting in a cage placed in the middle of the courtroom that faced the five-judge panel. The prosecutors sat one side; the defense team on the other.

In one session, Saddam told the judge to "go to hell."

U.S. officials concede the process did not always proceed smoothly, but said overall, it was monumental - the first trial that brought a former dictator to trial in front of his countrymen.

And residents were again glued to their television sets Sunday to see watch the verdict being read, many locked in their homes because of the curfew.

U.S. officials said Saddam's most self-incriminating statements occurred March 1 when he admitted ordering the executions, saying as the leader of Iraq, he was ultimately responsible.

"I demolished the orchards," the former dictator said to stunned courtroom. "That was a Revolutionary Council decision to modernize the orchard, and I signed that order."

He went on to say "nobody forced me to sign that decision" and concluded by asking the court: "Where is the crime?"

Saddam has faced the death sentence before in his life. As an early member of the Baath Party, he was part of a failed attempted assassination attempt of then-Iraqi Prime Minister Abdul Karim Qassim. Saddam fled to Egypt and was sentenced to death in absentia in 1963. When he returned to Iraq a year later, he was jailed, only to escape in 1967. The following year, he was part of a bloodless coup that brought down the government and named him vice president.

Like all things in this country now, the reaction to the verdict fell largely along sectarian lines, only breaking for those who were directly harmed by the former dictator during his three-decade reign.

In Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, residents promised a rise of retaliatory attacks if the former president is killed. And they said that Saddam's crimes pale compared to what is happening now.

"A death sentence is unfair," said Qusai Abdullah, a 30-year-old taxi driver, from Tikrit. "What happened in Dujail in 1982 is happening now, maybe worse. And neither the government nor the Americans are taking responsibility of what's going on."

In the mostly southern Shiite cities of Basra and Najaf, there was not much enthusiasm for the verdict either, namely because residents said Saddam would likely never be executed.

Others charged that the verdict would primarily serve America's political interests, not the Iraqis' need for justice, noting that it came two days before the U.S. elections.

"It will be only an attempt for an electoral gain for the U.S. and they don't care about the price the Iraqis will pay for it," referring to fears of increased violence, said Sumaiya Abdul Wahab, 33, a university lecturer.

In one hearing, Saddam asked that he be killed by a firing squad, saying he is entitled to that as head of the armed forces. But Iraqi law says that, if executed, he should be hung. Minister Nouri al Maliki, said Saturday that Saddam would be hung, already presuming the former dictator would be found guilty in what some took as another sign of his sectarian slant.

But first, there is an automatic appeals process for anyone convicted to life imprisonment or death. And Saddam still is being tried for allegedly gassing thousands of Kurds in the late 1980s. So it could be months before he faces his court-ordered execution.

Iraqis' Emotions Flow After Verdict (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, November 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Celebrations and some protests erupted in Iraq on Sunday after Saddam Hussein was convicted of crimes against humanity for ordering the deaths of 148 Iraqis in 1982. He was sentenced to be hanged.

Shortly after the verdict was announced, clashes with police broke out in north Baghdad's Azamiyah district, a mostly Sunni Arab area. Sunnis were Saddam's main supporters.

“This government will be responsible for the consequences, with the deaths of hundreds, thousands or even hundreds of thousands,” Saleh al-Mutlaq, a Sunni political leader, told Al-Arabiya satellite television.

Celebratory gunfire also rang out in Baghdad. In Dujail, the Tigris River city where the 148 Shiites were killed, people celebrated and burned pictures of Saddam.

Saddam's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said his client called on Iraqis to reject violence. “His message to the Iraqi people was, ‘Do not take revenge on the invading nations and their people,' ” al-Dulaimi said. The lawyer called the trial a “farce” and said defense attorneys will appeal within 30 days.

Fadhil Kadhim, 70, a farmer from a mainly Shiite district in Baghdad, said Saddam's forces killed his son in 1985. “Does the bloodshed of Iraqis stop after today?”

“It is a verdict on a whole dark era that was unmatched in Iraq's history,” said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite.

President Bush called it “a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.”

Saddam refused to stand when the judge was ready to read his sentence. He stood after two marshals entered his holding pen. As the sentence was read, he shouted, “God is great!” and “Down with the occupiers!”

The former leader and his seven co-defendants were accused of revenge killings in Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, after an assassination attempt on Saddam. Two others also were sentenced to death, one received a life sentence, three were sentenced to up to 15 years, and one was acquitted and freed.

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein, who lost two major wars against the United States, has been a reliable villain in American politics for at least 15 years, longer than Hitler, who ran Germany from 1933 until his ignominious suicide in a bunker in 1945. Yet yesterday's images from Baghdad of Hussein being sentenced to die at the end of rope had little of the visual or emotional impact one might have expected from this late chapter in the tyrant's life story.

DOJ_NMG_0091240

A gray-bearded man with deep bags under his eyes gestured impatiently at the camera. The sentence was pronounced. And like some pundit or politician on a Sunday morning talk show, Hussein raised his voice over the cross talk, vilifying, as he has done so often throughout his odd trial, the Americans who forced him from power.

It's a Shakespearean certainty that a deposed king will seem small and even pathetic without his regalia and the surrounding spectacle of toadying courtiers. Yet Hussein seemed less pathetic than angry yesterday, angry just as he's been since he scrubbed off the grime of his spider-hole hideout three years ago. With the exception of some woolly pictures taken just after his capture, the dictator's equivalent of a Hollywood mug shot, Hussein has mostly stayed in character throughout the war and its aftermath. He was angry and imperious when we saw him before the invasion, firing shots into the air from a balcony. He was angry and imperious as he faced news of his execution yesterday.

For Americans, he's always been a figure bristling with lethal energy. He aged over the years, but the gestures and the posture and overheated bellicosity, which always sounded strange in translation, remained mostly unchanged since we first encountered him as public enemy No. 1 during the lead-up to the first Gulf War. Hitler and Stalin killed into the millions. Hussein earned his way into their ranks when he killed tens of thousands of Kurds and invaded Kuwait. He bedeviled his neighbors and terrorized his citizens and earned the epithet "murderous"; Syria's Hafez al-Assad, who also bedeviled his neighbors and killed tens of thousands of his own citizens, was always known as just wily. The crime for which Hussein will die was the killing of 148 men and boys from a town north of Baghdad, where an attempt was made on his life in 1982.

When he was in power, his anger signified danger to America. Throughout his trial, it came to represent the explosive internal dangers of postwar Iraq, every outburst a microcosm of the larger anger of his Sunni supporters, just as the chaos of the trial reflected the larger chaos in Iraq. Images of Hussein's sentencing were anticlimactic on arrival because they offered no real sense of closure. Unlike trials in postwar Germany or post-apartheid South Africa, Hussein's trial didn't seem to puncture history with a new beginning. It clearly brought no reconciliation to warring parties in Iraq and it placed no period after the initial success of the invasion. Even the courtroom, seen in brief snatches on the nightly news, was a place calculated to deflate history. It felt small and was badly lit (at least for the cameras), and justice didn't seem to stare down evil so much as bicker with it.

And yet Hussein managed to remain consistent to his prewar public image throughout it all. The military fatigues came off, but with his Koran in hand and the formulaic and economical arm gestures of an impatient despot he never seemed anything less than entirely convinced that he was still Saddam Hussein, a latter-day incarnation of Nebuchadnezzar. Throughout it all, he had a loyal audience. Even when it was certain that he would lose his case and be sentenced to die, he still found sympathy among some Sunni supporters, and perhaps that audience bolstered him in his defiance.

A broken man doesn't take such care with his cuffs, nor stuff a handkerchief in his breast pocket, as Hussein did for his court appearance. Only the fatigue in his eyes and the gaunt appearance of his face suggested any sign of soul searching -- and even that reading of his visage is probably wishful thinking. Otherwise, Hussein's public presence suggests a man primarily frustrated by his inability to hold forth to a world audience. A man still clamoring for the microphone of history is a man who still feels he has a strong case to make to the world.

In the streets of Iraq, his case -- that age-old argument that a fractious country needs a brutally pragmatic leader -- was being made for him car bomb by car bomb. Violence has been so bad of late that a curfew was called before the sentencing. But there were still demonstrations in the streets. Shiites and Kurds fired guns in the air to celebrate; and Sunnis fired guns in the air to protest the news in Hussein's home town of Tikrit.

Hollywood would do this so much differently. There'd be more clarity about the meaning of it all. There'd at least be a stirring anthem and hugs and tears and general rejoicing. But the reaction was much more mixed. And in that ambiguity, that ambivalence about the war, is the wiggle room of history that Hussein, with his snarling consistency and his natty dark suit, will do his best to exploit to the advantage of posterity.

In the United States, approval was general, though it differed in enthusiasm between supporters and opponents of the war. The president hailed the news as "a major achievement" and "a milestone." Democrats were more guarded, with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid noting both the justice of the verdict and the chaos in the country. And a few people turned straight from the news of Hussein's demise to parsing tomorrow's elections.

"Man, oh man, do I hope that Rove's much-reported giddy confidence about the election wasn't hinged on a hoped-for tidal wave of support stemming from the Saddam verdict," wrote Jonah Goldberg on the National Review Web site. Images of Hussein defeated (symbolically when his statue fell in Baghdad; personally when he was dragged from his hiding spot; and legally, with yesterday's sentencing) have taken their place among the larger collection of images of this war. But they have yet to offer what so many people want: one final image that sums up the conflict in a way that everyone can live with. In a war this politicized, this divisive, this unpredictable, that image may never arrive.

The Saddam Hussein Verdict (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0091241

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

Saddam Hussein's horrendous crimes deserve exemplary punishment. During his own dictatorship, that would have meant a gruesome death, after a staged trial or no trial.

In an Iraq fully liberated from his evil thrall, it might have been something very different — an exemplary exercise in the rule of law, aimed at holding Mr. Hussein fully accountable, but also at healing and educating a nation he so ruthlessly divided.

Regrettably, yesterday's sentence to death by hanging in a case involving the execution of 148 Shiites in the 1980s fell somewhere short of that goal. Mr. Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

From the beginning, the now dominant Shiite and Kurdish politicians have been determined to use Mr. Hussein's trial and punishment to further their own political ends, as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has continued to do in recent days.

Mr. Hussein, as expected, repeatedly tried to mock the proceedings. More seriously, powerful politicians regularly tried to influence the outcome, judges were not allowed to rule impartially, and defense lawyers were denied security measures and documents they needed.

The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds.

Criminal Against Humanity (WSJ)

By L. Paul Bremer

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

The decision by Iraq's Special Tribunal to convict Saddam Hussein of some 150 murders is a welcome step on Iraq's painful journey toward its more hopeful future.

Without resolving Saddam Hussein's fate -- and the human-rights record of the regime he led -- the Shiites and Kurds can never make true peace with their Sunni fellow citizens. So the verdict should be seen as a necessary, though not sufficient, step in helping Iraq's persecuted majority put behind them the awful years of Saddam's brutal rule. And it is a bright note in the dangerous period through which the country is now passing.

This trial didn't teach Iraqis anything new about Saddam's brutality. They had lived with it for decades. But by casting a light into the depth of his tyranny, the process should remind Americans of how awful Saddam's rule was. And that, despite the difficult events on the ground today, America did a noble deed in liberating Iraq from this evil man.

The strong Iraqi urge to redress Saddam's crimes was made clear on the first day of Iraq's Governing Council -- July 13, 2003. The very first decree the Council passed that day, with unanimous support from its Shiite, Kurdish, and Sunni members, was to demand the establishment of the Special Tribunal to punish Saddam and his top Baath Party officials. This step -- which took the Coalition by surprise given the lack of any prior discussion -- showed how deep the scars were from Saddam's rule.

It is impossible to overstate the psychological and physical damage that Saddam inflicted on his countrymen.

In May 2003, the Coalition found the first of Saddam's mass graves. After the 1991 Gulf War, the Shiites, representing some 60% of Iraq's population, rose up to try to throw off his dictatorship. Saddam ordered his army to savagely crush this uprising. Iraqi army units went into Shiite towns south of Baghdad and rounded up men, women and children indiscriminately, threw them onto flat bed trucks, drove them into nearby fields and machine-gunned them to death. Their bodies were thrown into common graves and covered over.

I visited that first mass grave a few days after I arrived in Iraq. It made a searing impression on me, as it did on all who visited it. In an area about the size of three football fields, bones and clothing had been collected into little piles. Women in black robes, ignoring the sweltering heat, were scrabbling through the dirt and bones with their fingers, desperate to find a scrap of clothing, a faded ID, or a piece of jewelry which would identify the remains as those of their mother, or husband or daughter. Uncounted thousands of bodies were in that grave alone. By the time I left Iraq 14 months later, we had found over 300 mass graves.

Saddam's brutality was not limited to the Shiites. He is also standing trial for the crime of genocide against the Kurds, another 20% of the population. For a decade, Saddam's army tortured and murdered hundreds of thousands of Kurdish men, women and children. On the sunny morning of March 16, 1988, the army used chemical weapons on the peaceful Kurdish town of Halabja, killing 5,000 civilians in only a few hours. A few months after I arrived, Secretary of State Colin Powell and I visited this village and spoke with the horribly scarred survivors of this chemical attack. They were living proof that Saddam had possessed weapons of mass destruction, and had been prepared to use them, even against his own countrymen.

Visiting police stations in towns all over Iraq, I saw that each one had a torture chamber -- because under Saddam torture was legal. Most stations, including the Central Police Academy in Baghdad responsible for training Iraq's police, also had a rape room. I saw the human shredding machines into which Saddam ordered his enemies to be thrown.

Nor did the Sunnis go unscathed under Saddam. Though Sunnis dominated the Baath Party and his vicious security and intelligence forces, they, too, were tortured and killed when it suited Saddam's purposes. Sunnis, Kurds, Shiites, Christians, Turkomen -- no Iraqi group escaped his brutality. The most conservative estimate is that during his regime, Saddam killed over a half-million of his countrymen, though since more than a million and a half Iraqis are still unaccounted for, the actual total is, no doubt, far higher.

Saddam's trial is also another step in establishing the rule of law in free Iraq. The trial certainly had its flaws, as one would expect in a post-conflict country. The first judge lost control of the process and had to be replaced. The correct comparison is not with some illusory perfect system, but with what went before. Saddam made the rules, wrote or tore up the laws, and established or abolished courts according to his wishes, whims or political objectives. The Iraqi people wanted -- and deserved -- better. And the Coalition helped them get it.

Iraqis are proud that theirs is the land of Hammurabi, the Babylonian king who 4,000 years ago created the world's first code of laws. Before Saddam took power, Iraq's legal profession was generally recognized as the best in the region. The Coalition found a large group of able and dedicated Iraqi lawyers ready to serve their free country despite decades of repression.

In my first meeting with the new Iraqi Minister of Justice, Hashim al-Shibli, in September 2003, that respected jurist recounted how Saddam had suborned the justice system and terrorized Iraqi judges. He told me how the independence of Iraq's judiciary, a vital component of democratic checks and balances, had been abolished when the Baathists seized power. He asked that the Coalition re-establish its independence. We did that, and now that independence is affirmed in the new Iraqi Constitution, ratified a year ago.

Of course, no constitution alone can ensure respect for human rights or the rule of law. That must be done by men and women cooperating and compromising in a democracy. Iraq is going through a difficult period now. In his comment on the verdict, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki repeated his call for all Iraqis to unite in rebuilding their country. We Americans should do everything possible to see that they succeed, for failure in Iraq would endanger the lives of every American. And establishing a democratic Iraq, in the heart of a deeply troubled region would be a signal event for all the peoples of the Middle East.

Mr. Bremer was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in 2003-04.

Verdict For Saddam Hussein (WP)

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

IT'S BEEN nearly three years since U.S. troops pulled Saddam Hussein from his spider hole, so the justice that came yesterday, in the form of a death sentence from an Iraqi tribunal for crimes against humanity, was not particularly swift. Nor was his nine-month-long trial the model of fairness that the Bush administration and many Iraqis had hoped for: Three defense lawyers were murdered, a judge was pressured into resigning and many of the 39 courtroom sessions were chaotic.

There nevertheless can be little doubt that justice was delivered in the trial of a tyrant who never hesitated when ordering the summary murder of tens of thousands of Iraqis. The prosecution, planned as the first of several, focused on one small example of that record: Saddam Hussein's complicity in the torture and killing of at least 148 people in a single town, Dujail, after an assassination attempt against him in 1982. During the course of the heavily publicized hearings, Iraqis heard their former dictator confess to ordering the arrest of the innocent civilians, and they saw the death warrants he signed. They heard the testimony of townspeople whose lives were destroyed by this savagery and whose pain echoed that of millions of Iraqis who endured one of the bloodiest tyrannies in the modern history of the Middle East.

Tragically, the remediation that ought to come from the verdict has been shaded not only by the tumult of the trial but by the escalation of lawless violence around Iraq. Yesterday Shiites in Baghdad justifiably celebrated the sentencing of a man who carried out indiscriminate massacres against their sect. But Shiite militias, some of them embedded in government security forces, now abduct, torture and slaughter dozens of Sunnis a day. Sunnis in Iraq and in neighboring Arab countries are more likely to see the verdict as an act of vengeance by the Shiite-led government -- or a preelection gambit by the Bush administration -- than as a legitimate judgment.

In the short term, Saddam Hussein's conviction and eventual execution may worsen Iraq's civil conflict. His trials nevertheless may come to be seen as milestones in the slow and painful attempt to construct a more civilized Iraq from the poisonous wreckage of his regime. Like the rest of that enterprise, the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded.

Justice For Saddam (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

The temptation, and in some quarters the desire, is to dismiss yesterday's conviction of Saddam Hussein for war crimes as a historical footnote. Would that this were possible. While it is certainly a case of justice being done, it should also remind us about the enemy our troops continue to face, and the U.S. could yet lose to, in Iraq.

For even as Saddam will now hang for his crimes, his legacy survives in the vicious insurgency that his former intelligence agents and Baath Party colleagues are prosecuting. This continues to be the main enemy in Iraq, aided by the likes of Syria and Iran. Its assaults are what finally this year caused the Shiites to respond with death squads of their own that are contributing to the "sectarian violence" so evident in Baghdad. And it is one of the main mistakes of the Bush Administration during this war that it has failed to maintain military and American public attention on the nature and strategy of this enemy.

There's an honest debate over whether Saddam planned the insurgency before he was ousted from power. Whether or not it was planned in detail, however, there is little doubt that the Sunni element of the insurgency has long since formed into an organized movement. At its heart is Saddam's old intelligence service, the Mukhabarat. The Baath Party also continues to function in secret and to communicate to the extent it can.

Only last month, newly independent Iraqi newspapers obtained and reported on a terrorist assassination list with the names of 60 government, military and political figures. The document was dated September 5, 2006 and issued from Thi Qar Operation HQ in the name of the "Martyr Qusay unit/Karkh sector," which is Baghdad. Qusay is Saddam's son, who was killed in Mosul in 2003.

Addressed to "comrades" and "commanders of Special Operations," the order translated into English declares that "Approval of deputy combatant comrade, treasure of the country (Baath Party-Iraq branch), and the supreme commander of armed forces was granted, and communicated to us by the letter from the country treasure office . . . Execution punishment regarding criminals, agents, apostates, names below, in addition to their first, second, and third degree relatives. Execution (of the order) by your units is according to the plan and to your suitable timing discretion."

The list includes major Shiite, Kurdish and Iraqi political figures, as well as Sunnis who are participating in the government. And the killings seem to have already begun with the murder of several relatives of men on the list. We keep being told by our own intelligence services that the Sunni insurgency is leaderless. But tell that to those on this list or to their relatives.

The goal of the terrorists who created this list is to intimidate Iraqis from joining the government, and to maintain as much disorder and violence as possible so the U.S. will lose patience and withdraw. Then they will take their chances with the majority Shiites, who they have beaten before. The Saddamists will have won, even if Saddam himself is dead.

None of this is intended to diminish the importance of Saddam's conviction and likely execution after appeal. The verdict reminds the world of his crimes, specifically the 1982 murder of 148 Shiites in Dujail, which in its systematic revenge recalls Hitler's slaughter at the Czech town of Lidice during World War II. That the U.S. and its allies were willing and able to depose, and his countrymen then try and punish, a national leader who ordered those crimes is a warning to other tyrants. The U.N. routinely deplores the Saddams of the world but never has the will to act against them -- whether in Rwanda, Darfur, Kosovo, Bosnia, Cambodia, or Kurdistan. In Iraq, the U.S. finally acted.

Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq. But to make it permanent, the U.S. must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the U.S. commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job.

Cheney: Vote Will Not Deflect Us In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

The Bush administration's strategy in Iraq will remain "full steam ahead" regardless of the outcome of US mid-term elections that take place on Tuesday, Dick Cheney, the vice-president, said in an interview with ABC news on Sunday.

Opinion polls predict that the Democratic party, which is arguing for a phased redeployment of US troops out of Iraq over the next 12 to 18 months, are on course to win control of the House of Representatives for the first time since 1994 and possibly the Senate, for the first time since 2002.

Mr Cheney, who, along with George W. Bush, has stepped up his election campaign schedule for the final days before voting, said that since neither he nor the president were running for office they would continue to "do the right thing" in Iraq.

Mr Cheney also said that a US withdrawal from Iraq would undermine the "war on terror" by sending the wrong signals to allies such as Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, and Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan.

"You cannot make national security policy on the basis of that [election outcomes]," he said.

"These are people who are running for Congress and they are entitled to their own views ... It may not be popular with the public. It doesn't matter, in the sense that we have to continue the mission [in Iraq] ... and that is what we are doing."

Mr Cheney made the comments at the tail-end of an election in which the unpopularity of the war in Iraq has featured prominently on the campaign trail. Republican leaders, including Mr Cheney, have sought to portray the Democrats as weak on national security and as the party of "cut and run" from Iraq.

However, recent polls suggest that a consistently large majority of the US public believes that the Bush administration is pursuing the wrong course in Iraq. On Sunday leaders from both parties said the conviction and sentencing of Saddam Hussein, the former dictator, in an Iraqi court was unlikely to have any impact on the US elections.

Regardless of Tuesday's outcome, attention is expected to revert to the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission of inquiry into the Iraq war led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker.

According to leaks from the group, which is expected to publish its recommendations next month or in January, it will offer a clear change of course in Iraq, including greater emphasis on achieving stability rather than democracy and a possible redeployment of troops from Iraq into the region.

Mr Baker who is close to George H. W. Bush, the president's father, has already recommended that the Bush administration hold direct talks with Iran and Syria, both of which are allegedly helping to destabilise Iraq.

On Sunday Mr Cheney also said that he would "probably not" agree to appear before Congress to be questioned on the conduct of the Iraq war even if a Democratic-controlled house issued subpoenas requiring him and Mr Bush to do so.

The Democrats have played down rumours that they would try to impeach Mr Bush if they took control of Capitol Hill. But they have pledged to restore "oversight of the executive" particularly on the administration's controversial eavesdropping programme and its alleged misuse of intelligence to launch the war in Iraq.

"I have no idea that I'm going to be subpoenaed," said Mr Cheney. "Obviously, we'd sit down and look at it at the time. But probably not, in the sense that the president and the vice-president are constitutional officers and don't appear before the Congress."

Win, Lose Or Draw, Bush Faces Unfamiliar Terrain (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 5 — If the balance of political power in Washington changes on Tuesday, will President Bush change with it?

From the moment Mr. Bush took office after winning the election but losing the popular vote, he has governed as if he became president by a landslide. Bad news — legislative losses, plunging approval ratings, chaos in Iraq — seems only to stiffen his resolve. Good news — a dip in the unemployment rate, the conviction of Saddam Hussein — reinforces his confidence that his polices at home and abroad are correct.

On the campaign trail, there is little to suggest that will change. "My vision is clear," Mr. Bush likes to say. Vice President Dick Cheney echoed that theme on Sunday, giving a hint of Mr. Bush's attitude when asked by ABC News whether the election would alter Mr. Bush's Iraq policy. Mr. Cheney replied that there might be some effect in Congress. But the attitude in the White House, he said, would remain "full speed ahead."

"We're not running for office," the vice president said. "We're doing what we think is right."

In recent weeks, President Bush, as well, has appeared to dig in his heels on the war in Iraq, saying he would consider changes in tactics but not strategy.

Yet with Mr. Bush facing the likelihood of a remade political landscape in Washington, even if his party holds on to both houses of Congress, the White House is sending signals that Mr. Bush is open to a shift in approach. After six years of virtually ignoring Democrats as he pressed his own party to do his bidding on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush and his aides are charting a course that they say will take the president back to his roots as Texas governor, when he worked in a more bipartisan way with Democrats.

They are piecing together a domestic agenda that includes reviving the president's failed bid to overhaul entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, White House officials and allies of the administration said. The president has assigned Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to spearhead the effort, and the White House says it is quietly reaching out to Democrats on Capitol Hill.

But it is not clear how much bipartisanship is possible, even if Mr. Bush proves serious about it. His approval numbers remain low, emboldening Democrats, who in any case are distrustful of him. The 2008 presidential campaign is about to start, complicating political calculations on both sides. Members of both parties say Mr. Bush will be unable to accomplish much at home until he gets Iraq under control.

Even so, Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, said Mr. Bush was determined not to focus exclusively on foreign policy, as so many presidents have done in the final two years of a second term.

"I think his hope," Mr. Bartlett said, "is that maybe, maybe we can enter into an era where the president will not be viewed as such a threatening force to Democrats who are more eager to get some accomplishments done."

Mr. Bush enters the final phase of his presidency knowing his future depends on Tuesday's election and Iraq, both of which are largely beyond his control. No matter who controls Congress, he will have a more difficult time governing.

The situation is in stark contrast to the one two years ago, when Mr. Bush sounded ebullient about his prospects for a successful second term after defeating Senator John Kerry.

"Let me put it to you this way," Mr. Bush said at the time. "I earned capital in the campaign, political capital, and now I intend to spend it."

Today, the political capital Mr. Bush intended to spend is so vastly diminished that one longtime ally, the conservative organizer Paul M. Weyrich, estimated it at "zero" in an interview on Friday.

A sense of poignancy has set in. Jetting about the country on Air Force One, Mr. Bush has been playing hearts and gin rummy with his longtime political adviser and confidant, Karl Rove; Mr. Rove usually wins. At each stop, the men share memories of where they were two years ago, or four, reminding themselves of Texas and happier campaigns gone by.

"Any time we're on the campaign plane, it's reminiscent of past elections," Mr. Bartlett said, recounting the card games. But he insisted that Mr. Bush was looking ahead, not back: "There's no cruise control into '08 for this president. He believes that two years is a long time and a lot could get done."

Even if Republicans keep both chambers, there is universal agreement that they will do so with slimmer majorities, further reducing Mr. Bush's clout on Capitol Hill.

"Obviously, his power is waning quickly," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, a close ally of Mr. Bush. "But it doesn't have to be that way if we have a bipartisan desire to tackle tough problems."

On the campaign trail, Mr. Bush has already been calling on Democrats to join him in reauthorizing the No Child Left Behind Act, his signature education legislation, which was passed with bipartisan support early in his first term. But Democrats who joined him the first time are wary, said Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the chief Democratic sponsor of the bill.

"It's all going to be decided by what the president does with the budget," Mr. Kennedy said.

The last two years of a second term are challenging for any president. Bill Clinton, facing impeachment, spent most of his time traveling, devoting himself nearly exclusively to foreign policy. Harry Truman was stuck trying to explain a war on the Korean Peninsula that ended in stalemate, and it took years for his reputation to be restored.

For Mr. Bush, Iraq will loom over everything. His own aides concede they had once hoped that by Tuesday's midterm election, American troops would be steadily withdrawing from Iraq. Instead, 150,000 are still there.

"The fortunes of his last two years, in terms of his own political capital, will very much be a part of what takes place in Iraq," said Senator Mel Martinez, a Republican from Florida who was housing secretary during Mr. Bush's first term.

But one of the biggest guessing games in Washington is whether Mr. Bush will seize the opportunity to act in ways he could not with an election looming. Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, wrote earlier this week that "the preferred European scenario — Bush hobbled — is less likely than the alternative: Bush unbound."

Mr. Bush's first decision may be whether to move on Iraq before a report is issued by a bipartisan group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, the former congressman from Indiana.

Whatever Mr. Bush does, on either the foreign policy or the domestic front, comes with the knowledge that the clock is ticking. As Mr. Bartlett spoke in his West Wing office Thursday afternoon, a digital "countdown clock," distributed to the president's closest aides by Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff, revealed precisely how much time, at that moment, remained in Mr. Bush's term: 809 days, 21 hours, 21 minutes and 42 seconds.

Parties Crank Up Voter Turnout Efforts (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim VandeHei

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

Republicans seized on signs of movement in their direction yesterday as they unleashed a massive election-eve voter mobilization operation in an effort to stave off potentially substantial losses in the House and preserve at least a slender majority in the Senate.

Democrats answered the Republicans' get-out-the-vote machinery with intensified efforts to contact infrequent and still-undecided voters in a handful of tight Senate races as well as in a dozen GOP-held House districts where races were too close to call.

A Pew Research Center poll showed a significant narrowing in the partisan advantage in House races that the Democrats have enjoyed for much of the year, findings that echoed those of a Washington Post-ABC News poll released Saturday showing the Democrats with a six-point edge.

The Pew poll showed that the Democratic advantage had dropped to 47 percent to Republicans' 43 percent among likely voters, down from 50 percent to 39 percent two weeks ago. The poll found a drop in Democratic support among independents, but Pew Director Andrew Kohut said the most significant change over the past two weeks is that Republicans now outnumber Democrats among likely voters.

Other weekend polls by Time and Newsweek magazines continued to show Republicans at a steep disadvantage, with Democrats enjoying double-digit margins in party preferences for the House.

GOP strategists said they believe their prospects continue to improve as voters digest the guilty verdict against former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, positive economic statistics and the prospect of Democrats taking control of one or both chambers of the legislative branch. "I have always believed that Republican voters in many cases come home later, particularly this year," said Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman.

President Bush campaigned yesterday in two conservative Plains states, Nebraska and Kansas, where there are no competitive statewide races but where Kansas Rep. Jim Ryun (R) is in trouble and where Nebraska state Sen. Adrian Smith (R) is struggling to win an open seat in a heavily Republican district.

A senior GOP strategist said party officials anticipated that the so-called generic vote -- the question of which party voters are likely to support in House elections -- would tighten, but they do not consider the shift significant enough to change the contours of this election. More than 20 GOP incumbents are tied with their opponents heading into the final days. "It is the 50-50 districts that turnout can help," said the strategist, who like others spoke on the condition of anonymity in order to talk about strategy.

Democrats, mindful of the Republicans' success in getting their voters to the polls in the past two elections, expressed nervousness at signs of tightening in some of the national polls. But they said private and some public polling in contested House districts continued to show their party in a position to win enough seats to claim the majority.

"I don't know what to make of it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Senate races in Virginia, Missouri and Montana, all for seats currently held by Republicans, remained among the closest in the country. Contests in Republican-held Tennessee and Democratic-held Maryland looked tight as well, depending on the poll. One survey showed the race in Rhode Island, a state Democrats must take to win the Senate, very close.

Strategists sought solace in any survey that looked good, but with less than 48 hours remaining before the polls close on Tuesday, both parties concentrated on direct voter contact, built on months of sophisticated analysis of the electorate and microtargeting of tens of millions of voters around the country.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee expected to spend roughly $25 million on its voter mobilization efforts; the DCCC was set to spend $10 million. The Democratic National Committee has given the other committees about $8 million for get-out-the-vote activities.

The Republican National Committee planned to expend about $30 million on its operations. While that was less than the Democrats, Republicans began with a significant advantage in technology and information, having spent tens of millions in earlier campaigns building voter lists and modeling the electorate. Democrats have tried to create those models this year.

Democratic strategists said privately that overall, there is less money flowing into key states this year than during the 2004 presidential election.

Democrats and Republicans were both counting on help from outside groups. Conservative groups were contacting their supporters, while progressive groups like MoveOn.org and America Votes were turning up their operations. MoveOn.org members made 800,000 phone calls yesterday and plan another 1.2 million each today and Tuesday. Organized labor said it would put 30,000 volunteers on the streets to contact union members.

Both sides boasted about their turnout operations. Democrats said they have signed up one volunteer for every 21 voters in Montana, while Republicans said they directly contacted one in 10 registered voters in that state on Saturday alone.

In Missouri, Democrats planned to contact several hundred thousand "drop-off voters" -- those who vote in presidential but not midterm elections -- and tens of thousands of undecided voters before Tuesday. Republicans were contacting about 200,000 targeted Missouri voters a day.

GOP officials said their biggest concern is the inability to turn out voters in districts they did not originally consider at risk. "We're able to move financial resources, but it's almost impossible to get human resources" into these newly competitive districts, said the GOP strategist.

It was that reality that took Bush to the Plains states yesterday. In heavily Republican districts, aides said, the president could make up for what the NRCC could not do. But Bush's schedule this weekend also showed that, because he has less sway with independents, there are many districts where his presence could do as much harm as good.

Elsewhere, in New Hampshire, Rep. Charles Bass (R) has seen his 20-point lead evaporate in the past five weeks, leaving the RNC with little time to implement even a bare-bones version of its mobilization plan, known as the 72-hour program. "We are not counting on them," said Matt Hagerty, campaign manager for Bass.

Instead, Bass is using an old-fashioned operation that relies on volunteers calling supporters, knocking on their doors and sending out 40,000 e-mails reminding them to vote. "We are running the same operation the congressman has run for the last six cycles," said Hagerty.

The DCCC identified 40 competitive districts in September and has continued to focus on them, rather than trying to build get-out-the-vote operations in some of these districts that have unexpected opportunities. Bass's Democratic challenger, Paul Hodes, is getting strategic advice from the DCCC but is relying mostly on a network of volunteers to turn out voters.

"You cannot buy G.O.T.V.," said Dana Houle, campaign manager for Hodes, referring to get-out-the-vote efforts. "You have to lay the foundation in terms of volunteer recruitment months beforehand."

Turnout operations can affect only races that are decided by a few thousand votes. With this in mind, the Philadelphia suburbs have become a key battleground. Both sides anticipated that the rematch between Rep. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.) and Democrat Lois Murphy could be decided by a percentage point or two, both plowed resources into the race over the summer in preparation for the final 72 hours of the campaign, and both expressed confidence in their operations.

But it is impossible to determine how voters will react. One group of GOP volunteers hit a leafy neighborhood over the weekend to rally support for Gerlach, but they made contact with only five of 73 GOP households they approached.

The NRCC rushed resources a month ago to New York's 26th District, where Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, chairman of the NRCC, was caught up in the finger-pointing over the handling of the Mark Foley House page scandal. Reynolds's team contacted more than 10 percent of the voters there on Saturday, and Democrats have installed some of their best veteran organizers in the district.

Activity has been especially intense in Indiana's 2nd District, where Rep. Chris Chocola (R) faces possible defeat by Democrat Joe Donnelly. Republicans said they contacted 124,000 households over the past few days -- more than half of all households in the district. One Donnelly canvasser visited so many households in the Logansport area that the local marshal forced him to register as a solicitor.

Contributing to this report were staff writers Peter Baker in Grand Island, Neb.; Charles Babington in St. Louis; Jeffrey Birnbaum in Logansport, Ind.; Juliet Eilperin in Blue Bell, Pa.; and Blaine Harden in Billings, Mont.

All Signs Point To A US House Run By Democrats (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

If most of the political prognosticators are calling it right, the House of Representatives is poised for a change of leadership: the first Democratic majority in 12 years.

Among the nonpartisan analysts who study the polls and dynamics of each of the 435 House races, the more cautious see the lower range of the Democratic net gain at about 20 seats - more than enough to achieve the 15-seat net gain needed to take control. On the higher end, the Democrats could achieve a more commanding takeover with net gains of 30 to 40 seats, they say.

Some Republicans, citing a superior turnout operation and a tendency among voters to "come home" to their political base on Election Day, are holding out hope that they can minimize losses and even hold on to a sliver of a majority. But privately, many Republicans are bracing themselves for a loss of at least the House, saying that national conditions - frustration over Iraq, scandals, economic insecurity, and an unpopular president - are likely to overwhelm the party's structural strengths. History also works against the GOP: Two-term presidents almost always see a loss of House seats by their party in the sixth year in office.

"If the Democrats can't win under these circumstances, then it's hard to imagine how they can ever win," says Gary Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California, San Diego.

The chairs of the two House campaign committees steered clear of forecasting net gains or losses Sunday, pointing instead to signs of hope for each side.

"Right now the 72-hour efforts by Republicans to turn their vote out will make the difference in what it looks like on Election Day," said Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York on NBC's "Meet the Press."

DOJ_NMG_0091248

Mr. Reynolds himself is fighting for his political life in a tough reelection battle, fueled in part by his role in the scandal over Florida Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate messages to male former pages. Reynolds has faced charges of appearing more concerned with holding onto Mr. Foley's seat than for the welfare of pages.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D) of Illinois, the Democratic campaign committee chair, resisted an overt prediction that his party will take over the House, and instead cited the scorecard on the eve of the election.

"There's one or two Democratic seats I'm concerned about, with about 48 Republican seats that we are contesting. I like those numbers," Mr. Emanuel said on "Meet the Press."

In some regions, the House electoral landscape presents a potentially bleak picture for Republicans. Clumps of seats with unfavorable local conditions - such as those of Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania - could go in a wave. The Republican Party of Ohio has been mired in scandal, putting Republicans up and down the ticket in trouble. Democrats are strongly favored to win the governor's and Senate races there, which could depress Republican turnout and boost Democratic House challengers, including some in historically Republican districts.

Rep. Steve Chabot (R) has held onto his seat in Cincinnati for six terms, despite Democrats' efforts election after election to pry him loose, but in this year's "wave" election, he could be swept out. Rep. Jean Schmidt (R), also of Ohio, who won a special election to fill the seat vacated by former Rep. Rob Portman (R) (now White House budget director) made national headlines for her criticism of Rep. John Murtha (R) when he turned against the Iraq war, and she has been in the Demo-crats' sights ever since.

House Republicans from New York also face the potential for depressed turnout, as polls show both the state's gubernatorial and Senate races will likely be blowouts favoring the Democrats. In Pennsylvania, also with strong Democrats topping their Senate and governor's races, at least four Republican-held House seats face varying degrees of vulnerability.

But most striking in this election cycle is how many once-solidly Republican seats have moved into the tossup column - seats in states such as Kansas, Florida, Arizona, Indiana, and North Carolina. The travel schedules of President Bush, Vice President Cheney, and other top administration officials betray a GOP playing defense, despite their rosy predictions that the party will hold onto Congress.

Some of the hard work by Republican officials on the ground may have paid off, making seats once assumed to be a lost cause appear competitive.

In Florida, the Foley seat is back in tossup range, and away from "lean Democratic" in most prognosticators' lists. The local GOP faces the challenge of educating voters that, in order to vote for Republican candidate Joe Negron, they must check off "Foley," since he resigned his seat too late to get his name off the ballot, but Negron is a popular state representative in a Republican district, and could win.

In Texas, the seat once held by Rep. Tom DeLay is also now a tossup, in spite of the fact that voters must write in the name of the replacement Republican - Shelley Sekula Gibbs - tapped to run for that seat after Mr. DeLay resigned amid scandal.

Hopes Run Low For Republicans (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Glenside, Pennsylvania

Financial Times, November 6, 2006

Marcel Groen, the chairman of the Montgomery County Democratic Committee, is feeling good.

“We will be responsible for electing a Democratic House,” he told a cheering crowd of 2,000 at a get-out-the-vote rally on Saturday. “But I don’t just want to win – I want to send a message.”

Parts of the county, just north of Philadelphia, are in three different congressional districts and victories by the Democratic challengers in each would go a long way to ensuring that the Democrats win the 15 additional seats they need to claim victory in Tuesday’s mid-term -elections.

Democrats in the state of Pennsylvania have been buoyed by Ed Rendell, the popular governor who is expected to defeat Republican candidate Lynn Swann by a wide margin. Democrat Bob Casey Jr, the son of a respected former governor, is expected to beat Rick Santorum, the conservative Republican senator and close ally of President George W. Bush.

The three Republican House incumbents in the Philadelphia suburbs – Mike Fitzpatrick, Curt Weldon and Jim Gerlach – have been battered by the unpopular war in Iraq, a series of Republican scandals, and broad voter dissatisfaction with Washington.

The Hotline, a Washington newsletter, includes them in the two dozen seats most likely to change hands.

Support for Mr Weldon, a 10-term incumbent, fell after the disclosure last month that the FBI was investigating whether he helped steer work to a public relations firm owned by his daughter and a long-time political ally. Mr Weldon’s campaign unveiled an unusual advertisement early last week, in which supporters said, “Would you give a friend the benefit of a doubt? Of course you would . . . He’s been there for us, now it’s our turn to be there for him.”

But at the end of the week the campaign cancelled most of its television advertising for the final days of the race, a sign that he is running out of cash and, perhaps, hope.

Mr Fitzpatrick, elected just two years ago, is still hard at work, with John McCain, the popular Arizona senator, set to appear with him at a rally yesterday. At a suburban station on a cold autumn morning, Mr Fitzpatrick struggled to get voters to stop to speak to him.

When they did, he talked about his long experience in the community and answered a few questions about the war in Iraq.

"The truth is, we invaded a country," he said, explaining why he favours a strategy for the withdrawal of US troops but opposes setting a fixed date for the chaos it would leave behind.

His opponent, Patrick Murphy, is one of about a dozen Democratic candidates who are veterans of US operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. He supports a timeline for withdrawal.

At the Saturday rally, Mr Murphy described riding through Iraq in a Humvee jeep "with no doors and no armour", then showed off the holes worn on the bottom of his shoes from weeks of campaigning. "Boots on the ground win elections," Mr Murphy said.

The close races have drawn a host of political celebrities. Al Gore, the former vice-president, and John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential candidate, both potential 2008 presidential candidates, made weekend appearances in the area.

Barack Obama, the Democratic senator from Illinois and another possible 2008 candidate, was the top attraction at Saturday's rally here, declaring Mr Murphy and other local candidates the "standard-bearers for what is going on all across the country".

Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader who is set to become speaker of the House if Democrats win a majority, echoed the theme. "You are the people that can make it happen," she told the crowd.

Republicans have also been rallying their troops. "You're the secret weapon in this campaign," Mr Santorum told a few dozen Republican volunteers in nearby Doylestown before they set out to knock on doors and remind voters to turn out.

Standing at the station, Mr Fitzpatrick said that if Republicans managed to keep control of Congress, he hoped the party leadership does not ignore the message of the past few months. "Things do need to change."

Braced against the morning wind, he seemed to concede that the results might be out of his hands.

"If we lose, it's not going to be because Patrick Murphy was a better candidate. It's because voters just want a change. If that's what happens, I'm OK with that."

Poll Finds U.S. Sentiment Similar To '94 (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — A national USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds remarkable parallels between the congressional elections Tuesday and the watershed elections in 1994 that swept Republicans into control of Congress.

·Then, likely voters by 51%-44% favored GOP congressional candidates. Now, 51%-44% favor Democratic ones.

·Then, 52% said they were paying "quite a lot" of attention to the elections, the highest since the Gallup Poll began asking the question in 1958. Now, 50% say they are paying "quite a lot" of attention.

·Then, disapproval of Congress was at 66%. Now, disapproval of Congress is at 70%.

"Based on history, a 7-point lead among likely voters still suggest Democrats will take enough votes to win a majority of seats in the House," says Frank Newport, editor-in-chief of the Gallup Poll. What gives some analysts pause, however, is the sophisticated redistricting over the past decade that has made most congressional districts less competitive.

What's more, President Bush's last-ditch push for votes and Sen. John Kerry's comments that seemed to denigrate the education level of U.S. forces in Iraq have helped energize Republican voters. A Democratic advantage of 23 percentage points a month ago and 13 points two weeks ago is now down to 7 points.

A Pew Research Center survey released Sunday also showed that an 11-point edge for Democrats on the congressional ballot two weeks ago had narrowed to 4 points among likely voters. "It's gone from a slam-dunk for Democrats to take the House to a pretty good chance," says Andy Kohut, director of the center.

The factors that created a difficult landscape for Republicans through the campaign remain unchanged. Six of 10 Americans in the USA TODAY Poll say they are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country. By 2-1 they say national issues, not local and state ones, are determining their vote. And on the dominant national issue, 56% call the decision to invade Iraq a mistake.

The survey of 1,362 likely voters, Thursday through Sunday, has a margin of error of +/-3 points.

The president and the war in Iraq remain at the center of this election: 36% of likely voters saying that are casting a ballot for a candidate to send a message that they oppose Bush; 20% to send a message that they support him.

DOJ_NMG_0091250

What has shifted is the determination of Republicans to vote. The Democratic advantage among registered voters was 11 points, but Republican voters were more likely to be judged as sure to go to the polls, making the edge among likely voters smaller.

A month ago, the Democratic margin among registered and likely voters was identical.

Bush and other Republicans have warned about the perils of electing a Democratic-controlled Congress, and they also accused Kerry of belittling U.S. troops in Iraq with comments he said were a botched joke.

In the Pew survey, 84% of voters said they had heard about Kerry's remark, and 18% of independent voters said it raised serious doubts about voting for a Democrat.

Even so, by 40%-33%, likely voters in the USA TODAY Poll say the country would be better off if Democrats, not Republicans, controlled Congress.

Enthusiasm about voting is high: 58% say they are more enthusiastic than usual about voting and 68% say they are "absolutely certain" to vote — both records.

One reason: Both parties have been in touch. Among likely voters, 15% had been contacted by someone urging them to vote for a Republican, and 15% had been contacted by someone urging a Democratic vote. What's more, 27% had been contacted by both sides.

Parties Pour 11th-hour Cash Into Close Races (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Both political parties are making huge last-minute cash infusions into close House and Senate races, underscoring their traditional importance in endgame spending and the Democrats' new financial competitiveness with Republicans.

Just since Friday, Republicans have put more than $2 million into Senate races in New Jersey, Tennessee and Virginia, federal reports show. Democrats have spent $1.1 million for Senate candidates in Maryland, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia.

On the House side, Republicans spent $1.1 million in a single day to help Peter Roskam in his race against Democrat Tammy Duckworth in Illinois. And in a sign of continuing concern, the Republicans invested $275,000 to help their embattled House campaign chief, New York Rep. Tom Reynolds.

A check of 10 tight House races shows that as of Friday, Democratic party committees had spent nearly as much as Republicans in Indiana, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington. They outspent Republicans in New Hampshire, Connecticut and Arizona.

In GOP Rep. Jim Gerlach's district near Philadelphia, Republicans had spent $3.9 million to the Democrats' $3 million as of Friday. Still, challenger Lois Murphy had more cash on hand as of Oct. 18.

"It's unprecedented that the Democrats have as much money as the Republicans," says Michael Malbin, executive director of the non-partisan Campaign Finance Institute. He says Republicans have spent an average $1.3 million in each of 38 top races involving GOP incumbents, while Democrats have spent $1 million — "not quite as high, but serious money."

The parties aren't the only ones making last-minute investments. Major players for Republicans include tax and abortion opponent groups, the American Medical Association and the National Rifle Association. Unions, environmentalists, backers of gay and abortion rights, and MoveOn.org are helping Democrats.

The latest spending by parties and outside groups is not just for ads but also for get-out-the-vote efforts, including phone banks and canvassing door-to-door.

In the 10 House races analyzed by USA TODAY, candidates on both sides were relying on money from corporate and ideological political action committees in the final week. In the Idaho contest between Republican Bill Sali and Democrat Larry Grant, more than 75% of the contributions of $1,000 or more came from such groups.

According to the Federal Election Commission and PoliticalMoneyline.com, which tracks money in politics, House candidates overall had raised nearly $679 million as of Oct. 18 — 25% more than they raised in 2004. GOP incumbents increased their fundraising 26%; Democratic challengers more than doubled their fundraising, and Democratic candidates for open seats raised 60% more than in 2004.

One source of increased funds is members of Congress. Their campaign committees now account for 15% of money collected by party committees, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. That's three times as much as in 2002.

Small donors are another growing force. Malbin says such contributions, generally defined as less than $200, account for 47% of what parties have raised this year, up from 28% in 2002. The main reason is the rise of online giving.

Both parties use the Internet, but it has been a particular benefit for Democrats. Unlike Republicans, who have long had an extensive direct-mail list of small donors, Democrats once relied on huge contributions from relatively few individuals. That's no longer possible under federal law. New technology has allowed Democrats to "leapfrog" to e-mail solicitations and other online fundraising rather than develop a mailing list, Malbin says.

The overall spending trend is ever upward. In Missouri's tight Senate race, parties are spending close to $10 million each and the candidates have raised about $20 million. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton had raised $38 million by Oct. 18 for her re-election campaign. That's about what the federal government estimated it would cost to wage a presidential primary campaign in 2000.

National Issues, Led By Iraq, Dominate Final Appeals In Congressional Campaigns (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 5, 2006

WASHINGTON CROSSING, Pa., Nov. 5 — Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick, a Republican in his first term, came here on Sunday to show off what in any other year would have been the perfect symbol of why to re-elect a congressman: a cornfield that thanks largely to his efforts would soon become a national veterans cemetery, close to the place where Gen. George Washington rescued the morale of his troops and the nation with his Christmas attack of 1776.

But this year, with morale sagging in a different war, Mr. Fitzpatrick finds himself in a tough battle of his own, trying to distance himself from President Bush — even on a day when the conviction of Saddam Hussein was announced in Baghdad — without turning off the staunch Republican voters he needs to hold back his opponent, an antiwar Democrat and Iraq war veteran named Patrick Murphy.

So, to rally his troops on the last big day of campaigning for the midterm elections, Mr. Fitzpatrick pulled out a favorite weapon of Republican candidates in the same predicament: Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, whose reputation as an outspoken maverick makes him an appealing attraction here in the Eighth Congressional District, where registered Republicans outnumber Democrats but voters have chosen Democrats for president in recent years.

Mr. McCain hailed Mr. Fitzpatrick as an independent voice, one who "represents the next generation of our party and of our nation" and "an independent who will reach across the aisle when necessary."

But Mr. McCain acknowledged voters' frustration with the war, as well as his own.

"It's long and it's hard and it's tough," he told a group of veterans, as Mr. Fitzpatrick stood behind him in the sunshine of a crisp fall day. "And a lot of mistakes have been made in the conduct of the war, and we're paying a very heavy price for it."

"But my friends, we are there today," he added. "And I'm convinced that if we set a date for withdrawal, as some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle want to do, I think you're going to see chaos in the region."

A few towns away, Mr. Murphy rallied other veterans alongside Representative John P. Murtha, the conservative Pennsylvania Democrat whose turnabout on Iraq a year ago has made him his party's face of opposition to the war.

"They say we're going to win, we're going to have a victory; they say we're going to have democracy," Mr. Murtha said. "Well let me tell you, that's not a strategy, that's a goal. And there's no strategy. The strategy is stay the course. Even though they say it's not stay the course, that's what they've been saying — his opponent has been saying stay the course. That doesn't work."

Both candidates had lost their voices after a weekend of rallies featuring the luminaries of their national parties: Mr. McCain for Mr. Fitzpatrick, and Mr. Murtha, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Vice President Al Gore for Mr. Murphy.

Like Republicans across the country, Mr. Fitzpatrick, a former county commissioner, has tried to make the campaign about local issues. He accuses Mr. Murphy, who grew up in northeast Philadelphia, on the edge of the district, of moving here only to run for Congress. In a debate, he asked him how many school districts Bucks County had, leaving Mr. Murphy flustered when he could not answer.

"Why are we voting for Mike?" an organizer shouted to the veterans at the Fitzpatrick rally. Then he answered himself: "He's one of us!"

At a boilermakers' hall, a busload of Harvard students had come for the weekend to volunteer for Mr. Murphy because he impressed them in a speech last year as a young voice for change. And at 33, he looks younger than some of them. He has no experience in elective office. But by talking about the war he saw up close, and arguing, as he did in a closing advertisement, that "George Bush and Mike Fitzpatrick have no idea how to fix this mess," Mr. Murphy has pulled himself up in the polls.

Sunday morning, he told volunteers he was five points ahead in his own poll.

"But polls don't vote," he reminded them, urging them to motivate other voters. "We're on the crest of greatness. Let's just go execute and make it happen."

At the rally with Mr. McCain, Joe Amodei, a 75-year-old Korean War veteran, lamented Mr. Fitzpatrick's position in a bad year for Republicans. "If it was just him against the other guy, and no outside national issues, he'd walk away with it," Mr. Amodei said. "His opponent has made it about larger issues. If he made it about the county, he'd have no chance to win."

DOJ_NMG_0091252

Across the country, candidates clashed Sunday over the war, immigration, the economy, ethics and the Bush administration, seeking advantage in the closing hours of an election that will determine control of the House and the Senate. With Mr. Hussein's death sentence injecting a late new element into the debate, Republicans sought to limit their losses and Democrats argued the need for change in Washington, as tens of thousands of volunteers on each side went door to door to rally voters.

Economy

Receding Gas Prices Quiet a Major Issue

SEYMOUR, Ind., Nov. 5 — There is uneasiness in being a marginal Republican incumbent in a longtime Democratic district.

It surfaced, briefly, at a country restaurant on Sunday when a friendly voice told Representative Mike Sodrel to rest easy about Tuesday.

Mr. Sodrel, a freshman Republican, demurred, replying: "I don't know if we got it made. But I think we're going to prevail."

That cautious note seemed appropriate in one of the tightest races in the country, here in Indiana's Ninth Congressional District, where an important economic concern — high gasoline prices — has been somewhat alleviated in the past few weeks as the price at the pump has edged down.

The district was held for 40 years by Democrats, including Lee H. Hamilton, the former Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, until Mr. Sodrel took it — barely — on President Bush's coattails in 2004. Now polls show the seat as a tossup between Mr. Sodrel and the Democrat he defeated, Baron Hill, who had held the seat for three terms.

The race has been as sharp-edged as the southern Indiana countryside is soft and undulating. Off a pastoral road, a billboard denounces Mr. Hill as a supporter of same-sex marriage, abortion and taking "God" out of the Pledge of Allegiance. Across the way a sign for Mr. Hill answers: "Stop the lies. Shame on Mike Sodrel."

The local airwaves are pulsing with commercials denouncing "Millionaire Mike" — Mr. Sodrel is a self-made trucking magnate — or "liberal Baron Hill."

On Sunday, Mr. Sodrel reduced this grudge rematch to a simple dynamic. "He wants his seat back," he said softly.

Mr. Hill, at a campaign stop in the courthouse square in Scottsburg, was all fire and aggression, denouncing the Bush administration's policy in Iraq, millionaire C.E.O.'s and Republicans caught in scandal.

Mr. Sodrel was sticking to his guns, greeting supporters at Graceland Baptist Church, a sprawling edifice in New Albany, and insisting that flag, marriage and abortion mattered more here than the war: "I always tell people, if Norman Rockwell exists, it is in the Ninth District of Indiana." War

Veterans' Support And Iraq at the Fore

DES PLAINES, Ill., Nov. 5 — Even as volunteers lined up Sunday morning to carry the last sacks of leaflets into a web of suburbs west of Chicago, Iraq loomed over the tense race for the Congressional seat that Henry J. Hyde, a Republican, is leaving.

One volunteer, Henry Nerwin, 81 and a Navy veteran, had a question for Tammy Duckworth, the Democratic candidate in the district, who sat in a wheelchair, having lost her legs when the helicopter she was piloting in Iraq took fire: Would she quit the Veterans of Foreign Wars now?

On Friday, Peter J. Roskam, the Republican candidate, announced that he had received the endorsement of the V.F.W.'s political action committee. It was the latest development in a campaign defined by punches and counterpunches in a flood of television commercials and daily leafleting that some voters complain has literally covered their porches.

Ms. Duckworth, who says the war in Iraq should never have been waged, said that she had never talked to the veterans group about an endorsement and that this was "just politics." Mr. Nerwin said he thought it was "reprehensible" that the V.F.W. had not endorsed her.

"I've been advocating for veterans since I was in my hospital bed," said Ms. Duckworth, who said she would maintain her V.F.W. membership.

A spokesman for Mr. Roskam, Jason Roe, said that Mr. Roskam, who did not serve in the military, had received the endorsement because he had sought it out and his positions on veterans' issues suited the group.

At a diner in Villa Park, Jean Sacco said she had been leaning toward Mr. Roskam until Ms. Duckworth appeared at her table on Sunday. They talked about immigration, but Ms. Duckworth's military sacrifice was also important to Ms. Sacco, who said her son was a service member. "That matters to me," she said.

At a pancake breakfast in Bartlett, Lee Ann Rydosz said she had long voted Republican, as most in this district have for Mr. Hyde's 32 years in office, and would again. Mr. Roskam has said that the troops should leave Iraq, though he is uncertain when the ideal time for that will arrive.

Anti-Incumbency

13-Term Congressman Fights Call for Change

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla., Nov. 5 — As a new poll suggested that he might be slipping behind his Democratic challenger, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. told volunteers Sunday that they were the "secret weapon" that would deliver him a 14th term.

The poll, which queried 400 likely voters and was published Sunday by The Miami Herald, found that 49 percent said they preferred the Democratic challenger, State Senator Ron Klein, to Mr. Shaw, the Republican, who drew the support of 40 percent of respondents; 6 percent were undecided. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus five percentage points.

For most of the race, Mr. Shaw, who has been asking voters to trust his seniority, has been in a dead heat with Mr. Klein, who has been promoting his status as an outsider.

Mr. Klein spent the day greeting voters at a parade and a festival, changing his schedule as his aides considered and reconsidered the most valuable use of his time.

Mr. Shaw was less frenzied, rallying volunteers at a lunch here with the message that the race was tight but that his turnout operation had more muscle. His spokeswoman said that 50 volunteers had arrived from Washington to join dozens already in the district, which runs along the coast from Fort Lauderdale to northern Palm Beach County.

"No one is organized like we are," Mr. Shaw said before the volunteers set out to walk precincts, run phone banks and wave signs along highways. "You have no idea how important you are. The other side does not have this support, and we are going to go out with our heads high and have a great celebration on Tuesday night."

Mr. Shaw continued to run advertisements attacking Mr. Klein. His latest accused Mr. Klein of siding with insurance companies as a state lawmaker and lobbyist while property insurance rates skyrocketed.

Mr. Klein's most recent advertisement does not mention Mr. Shaw but repeats Mr. Klein's mantra that Washington needs new and independent voices.

On Saturday, while Mr. Shaw and his wife greeted voters, Mr. Klein enlisted former President Bill Clinton to help drill home his anti-incumbency theme at a rally in Pompano Beach. Mr. Clinton said it was time to rid the nation of "the most special-interest-dominated government in my lifetime." ABBY GOODNOUGH

Social Issues

A Race for Every Vote (Left to Cast, That Is)

BELLEVUE, Wash., Nov. 5 — In Darcy Burner's final rush of campaign advertisements, she compares her opponent to President Bush and says he is out of touch with his constituents on the war and social issues. Ms. Burner's opponent, Representative Dave Reichert, is running advertisements saying she lacks experience, dodges difficult questions and wants to raise taxes.

Yet even as the tight race intensifies between Ms. Burner, a Democrat and former Microsoft executive with little political experience, and Mr. Reichert, the first-term Republican she is challenging in the Eighth Congressional District, it is also closer to over than many others across the country.

Both campaigns said Sunday that up to 40 percent of voters here had already sent in their ballots, taking advantage of the state's mail-in voting option, and that more than 70 percent were expected to do so by Election Day, leaving a small fraction to show up at the polls on Tuesday.

"Hitting them all at this point just annoys them," Ms. Burner said Sunday as she visited homes in this affluent suburb of Seattle that her campaign had pinpointed as potentially supportive. "So we're trying to be considerate and productive."

Mr. Reichert spent part of Sunday ringing doorbells but said he had also worked lines at the many Starbucks in his district, which pushes south and east from the more politically moderate Bellevue to rural areas where Republicans are strongest.

Mr. Reichert, who holds a narrow lead over Ms. Burner in most polls, said voters had told him they were concerned about the war, immigration and the federal budget.

Ms. Burner, however, said Mr. Reichert was "fiscally irresponsible and socially conservative," out of step with his well-educated, technologically savvy constituents on social and economic issues like abortion, stem-cell research and the minimum wage.

The congressman, after initially opposing embryonic stem-cell research, changed his position this year, going against President Bush. A campaign spokeswoman, Kimberly Cadena, said the shift was not politically motivated, adding, "It's based on his heart and what the science he found told him." WILLIAM YARDLEY

Immigration

In a Border State, a Bottom-Line Topic

DOJ_NMG_0091254

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz., Nov. 5 — As Harry Mitchell, a Democrat who has been giving Representative J. D. Hayworth a tough challenge, sought to energize the volunteers about to knock on doors for him in Phoenix on Sunday, he invoked the word that he believed summed up his campaign: change.

"We reflect the mood of the country," said Mr. Mitchell, a state senator and former mayor of Tempe. "And the mood of the country is 'We want change.' "

With that, the volunteers set out, hoping to deliver on his prediction in the predominantly Republican Fifth Congressional District, where Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Hayworth have argued over taxes, health care, their personalities and, of course, this being a border state, illegal immigration.

On Sunday, neither Mr. Mitchell, who appeared at get-out-the-vote rallies, nor Mr. Hayworth, a six-term Republican, focused on specifics in the illegal immigration debate, which originally drove the campaign. Instead they made more general pleas for voters to get to the polls on Tuesday.

Mr. Hayworth is known for an uncompromising approach to illegal immigration — he emphasizes building a border fence and vehemently opposes any program that would lead to citizenship for illegal workers — and often delivers fiery rhetoric on talk shows.

Mr. Mitchell brought in a supporter, Representative Xavier Becerra, Democrat of California, to increase turnout among Latinos angry at Mr. Hayworth's hard-line stance.

"Are we the party of fear?" Mr. Becerra called out at one rally.

"No!" he and supporters yelled.

Mr. Hayworth, meanwhile, had a morning interview on the Fox News Channel, walked through precincts and rallied supporters at a cowboy-themed steakhouse.

In the interview on "Fox and Friends," Mr. Hayworth dismissed Democrats and pundits in Washington who were speculating on, and in some cases predicting, his political demise.

"I am going to hang on to my seat," he said, "and I think there are going to be a lot of surprises on Election Day."

And at the restaurant here, Mr. Hayworth said his top concern was to secure the border. "National security," he said, "is border security." RANDAL C. ARCHIBOLD

Scandal

Using Abramoff Case, and Waving It Off

STOCKTON, Calif., Nov. 5 — On a warm, cloudless morning, Lawrence Talbot, a volunteer coordinator for Jerry McNerney, stood beneath a stand of palms, briefing his troops on the day's plans — and his candidate's positions.

"It's all about accountability and bringing integrity back to Washington," said Mr. Talbot, 35, who works in public relations. "And that's what we want to emphasize."

Mr. Talbot was one of hundreds of volunteers canvassing California's 11th Congressional District this weekend for Mr. McNerney, the Democrat locked in a tight campaign against the incumbent Republican, Representative Richard W. Pombo. On Sunday, both men crisscrossed the district, which sprawls over four counties east of San Francisco.

Mr. Pombo moved from a rally to a veterans event and then planned to call voters into the evening. Mr. McNerney hit a festival devoted to cranes (the birds, not the machinery), visited with volunteers and was scheduled to have dinner with a group of Native American voters.

Mr. McNerney, who was soundly defeated by Mr. Pombo in 2004, has based much of his campaign this time on his environmental credentials (he is a wind energy expert) and the tinge of scandal hanging to Mr. Pombo, who accepted tens of thousands of dollars in past campaign contributions from the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Pombo, who hails from a successful Central Valley real estate family, has denied any wrongdoing. And he counters questions about his tenure by saying that Mr. McNerney is little known in the district where the Pombo name adorns buildings and for-sale signs.

At an event in Pleasanton, Mr. McNerney's hometown, Mr. Pombo spoke briefly to a crowd of veterans even as McNerney supporters across the street waved signs paid for by the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund, one of several environmental groups that have spent heavily to try to defeat Mr. Pombo. Several amputees in wheelchairs echoed the theme of a McNerney campaign advertisement, which attacked Mr. Pombo for voting against prosthetic devices for soldiers in Iraq.

But Roy Huskey Jr., a Vietnam veteran, said he had decided to support Mr. Pombo, saying he thought he was an honest man. "The Democrats and Republicans both took money from Abramoff," Mr. Huskey said. "What do you expect? He's a lobbyist." JESSE McKINLEY

Bitter Campaign Boils Down To Party Turnout (WT)

By Charles Hurt

DOJ_NMG_0091255

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

Both Democrats and Republicans say that after months of ugly battles, tomorrow's election will come down to which party does a better job of getting its voters to the polls.

"We are feeling very good," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "This election has evolved into a national referendum on change."

But to take control of the House and Senate, Democrats must overcome a Republican ground game that exceeded nearly all expectations in the past two national elections.

Republican leaders, meanwhile, continued warning yesterday that Election Day could be bleak for them and urged their conservative base to turn out. Also, Republicans defended in the starkest terms possible the war in Iraq, which polls show has been a tremendous drain on their popularity during this election.

"We need to win the war, and it would be disastrous to lose," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, during an appearance with Mr. Schumer yesterday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"To pull out and withdraw is losing," she said. "The Democrats appear to be content with losing."

Mr. Schumer called her charge "outrageous" and said voters no longer trust President Bush and congressional Republicans to run the war.

"Democrats want to win the war, which is why we want to change the strategy," he said.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, ticked off five elections in the past 50 years where voters broke heavily to throw incumbents out of office.

"Every decade, the American people have a big election where they say no to the status quo and yes to a new direction," he said. "And this election is yes to a new direction, which is what Democrats are offering."

Mr. Emanuel said Democrats are defending one or two of their seats with hopes of capturing 48 seats held by Republicans. Democrats must score a net gain of 15 seats to assume control of the chamber.

Even Republicans have acknowledged privately in recent weeks that they expect Democrats to win the House or come within a handful of seats of doing so. But polling in recent days also suggests a shift in favor of Republicans.

Republican hopes were boosted by three separate polls released this weekend showing the party rapidly closing a gap in the so-called "generic ballot question," a measure of overall partisan trends.

Democrats' advantage in the generic ballot shrank from 14 percentage points to six points -- 51 percent to 45 percent -- in two weeks, according to a Washington Post/ABC News poll released yesterday. Similar results were reported in a Pew Research Center survey, showing that a 13-point Democratic advantage (53 percent to 40 percent) among likely voters in early October had dwindled to just four points (47 percent to 43 percent) in the first four days of November. And the latest Gallup/USA Today poll shows that a Democratic advantage of 23 points a month ago had tightened to seven points (51 percent to 44 percent) in the latest survey, conducted Thursday through yesterday.

"We're in a tough political environment," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said on "Fox News Sunday" yesterday. "But I've been on the road for these last five weeks. I've been in all these tough districts, and our candidates are doing what they need to be doing.

"They're running their grass-roots operation, the get-out-the-vote effort," he said. "And they're talking about the issues the American people care about, whether it's keeping taxes low, securing our borders or making sure the president has the tools to fight the terrorists."

Republicans say that Democrats have not offered viable alternatives for fighting the war on terror and accuse Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a liberal Democrat from San Francisco, of keeping a low profile in recent weeks so as not to ruin her party's prospects of seizing control of the House.

In an interview Friday with the San Francisco Chronicle, Mrs. Pelosi said she expects to pick up 22 to 26 seats and said her only concern was that Republicans will rig the election.

"That is the only variable in this," she said. "Will we have an honest count?"

Democrats are determined to "take back the country for the American people -- Democrats and Republicans alike -- because it's been held hostage by the radical right wing of the Republican Party," Mrs. Pelosi said. "This is a freak show, and it has to come to an end."

While Mrs. Pelosi has steered clear of toss-up races in conservative districts across the country, she campaigned over the weekend for Democrats in the Philadelphia suburbs and Connecticut.

Mr. Bush yesterday campaigned in Grand Island, Neb., where he delivered his carefully crafted campaign speech for a seventh time. The president urged a packed house of supporters to turn out the vote.

"I really do want to thank the grass-roots activists, the people who worked hard to get these candidates to where they are. And I just urge you to keep working for the next 48 hours," he said to cheers.

As he has done repeatedly during his six-day, 10-state effort to energize Republicans before Election Day, Mr. Bush took issue with inside-the-Beltway "prognosticators."

"I'm sure you've heard the same predictions I've heard," the president said. "The prognosticators have already decided the outcome of this election before the good people of Nebraska have voted. But don't worry about it, the same thing happened in 2004.

"Some of them up in Washington had already picked out their new offices in the West Wing," he said, provoking laughter from the Republican crowd. "They listened to the prognosticators. Then the people showed up to the polls, and the movers were not needed."

Later yesterday, Mr. Bush delivered his eighth rally speech, this time in Topeka, Kan. And today, Mr. Bush will make campaign stops in Florida and Arkansas before ending his campaign, as he always does, with a rally in Dallas.

Campaigns Implore The Party Faithful To Bring Their Loyalty To The Polls (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

The season of persuasion is over. This is the season of motivation.

From Nashville, Ind., where Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R) was urging business owners to help him stop Democrats from seizing the House and raising their taxes, to Nashville, Tenn., where Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) were suggesting to black churchgoers that God wants Ford in the Senate, candidates around the country spent last weekend preaching to their choirs.

In the campaign's final weekend, candidates weren't trying to turn out voters who might not vote their way. They were chasing the "ones and twos," political-junkie shorthand for the most likely supporters on their computer-generated lists, and firing up their volunteers.

President Bush stumped for red-state Republicans in Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska. Former president Bill Clinton rallied the Democratic base in New Jersey, Michigan, Florida and Maryland.

Republicans warned that if House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) becomes speaker, Democrats will impose hippie values on the heartland. Democrats warned that if Bush gets another rubber-stamp Republican Congress, America will "stay the course."

"This is our chance to finally -- finally! -- say no to George W. Bush," House candidate Diane Farrell told a breakfast of Democratic activists yesterday in Norwalk, Conn.

It's too late to raise money, win debates or unveil six-point health-care plans. Now it's time to get out the vote. So at a campaign rally in Blue Bell, Pa., Sen. Rick Santorum was telling Republican diehards to ignore polls showing big leads for his Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr. "Democrats have polls," he declared. "We have workers at the polls!"

A few minutes later, at a rally with Pelosi and the ubiquitous Obama in Norristown, Pa., Gov. Edward G. Rendell urged the Democratic faithful to ignore those same polls. "The only way we lose is if we ease up," he said.

Meanwhile, at the Owl Cafe in Laurel, Mont., Democratic Senate challenger Jon Tester was telling supporters to play close attention to polls that showed momentum shifting to the GOP incumbent, Sen. Conrad Burns. After leading in polls for months, while Burns was defending his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and making a series of foot-in-mouth blunders, Tester admitted yesterday that the race is now tied and begged the sympathetic diners to get five of their friends to the polls. "If you can do that, you'll have voted five times," he said.

In general, Democrats are trying to exploit widespread disapproval of Bush and the GOP Congress, while Republicans are arguing that Democrats would be worse. So the closing days of the campaign, like the rest of the campaign, have made "The McLaughlin Group" look like "Masterpiece Theatre."

Burns is making "robo-calls" claiming that Tester hasn't bought a hunting license in 15 years. Former representative Baron Hill (D-Ind.) is running ads attacking Sodrel as "Millionaire Mike," as in, "Millionaire Mike voted to cut veterans' benefits while accepting pay raises." Supporters of Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) are distributing leaflets with a photo of Farrell under the headline "Coffee Talk with the Taliban," because one board member of one organization that endorsed her favored negotiations over combat in Afghanistan.

"It's tough all around, I'd be lying to say anything else," Connecticut Republican activist Chuck Stango said with a shrug. "You never want to leave any stone unthrown."

Often, those stones are directed at politicians who won't be on the ballots in question. In Ohio, Republicans printed thousands of flyers with grainy black-and-white photos of Pelosi, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Sen. Hillary Rodham

DOJ_NMG_0091257

Clinton (D-N.Y.), warning that the "Hollywood values" of a Democratic Congress would make America "a haven for terrorists." At a meeting with supporters in Helmsburg, Ind., Sodrel warned that Pelosi "represents San Francisco very well."

"Scary!" one volunteer called out.

But while nasty ads and famous surrogates get the attention, activists expect the midterms to turn on voter outreach -- knocking on doors and working the phones. In 2002 and 2004, Republicans dominated the ground game, and they hope that will save them in 2006. "There's no secret to how I will win," Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) told a crowd of campaign workers crowded into a Waterbury storefront. "Three words: work, work, work."

Of course, reaching voters is not the same as mobilizing them, and Republicans are clearly nervous that the current political climate will keep their base home. In Missouri, one of numerous states where Obama was pumping up Democrats yesterday, Republicans were so desperate to find ones and twos that they risked calling voters while the Kansas City Chiefs were playing the St. Louis Rams.

In Ohio, they recruited door-knockers from a temp agency for $12 an hour. They gave Bush a raucous reception at his "Victory in the Heartland" rally yesterday in Grand Island, Neb., but even in friendly territory, they didn't fill the hall.

Still, turnout is a relative thing. You don't need to turn out everyone -- just more than your opponent.

"If we get out the ones and twos," Indiana Republican activist R. Dale Cassiday told a group of Sodrel's campaign workers, "we'll win this election."

Two Parties Far Apart In Turnout Tactics Too (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

BOCA RATON, FLA. — Jewish voters received a pamphlet about Israel's fight with Hezbollah. Spanish speakers heard radio ads about Fidel Castro. Seniors got recorded telephone calls from crooner Pat Boone, now 72, about Social Security.

As Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) fights to keep his seat in Congress, he is drawing heavily from the Republican playbook of dividing voters by their backgrounds and interests and appealing to them with tailored pitches. His success — along with his party's hopes for hanging onto its congressional majorities — relies in part on databases and search tools used to identify sympathetic voters and move them to the polls.

Shaw's Democratic challenger has a far different strategy. Instead of specialized appeals, state legislator Ron Klein repeats a simple message to nearly every audience: Iraq is a mess, and it is time for a change.

That contrast underscores a central question to be answered Tuesday in this South Florida House district and other competitive races across the country: Which political force will prove stronger — the niche-marketing effort, led by GOP strategist Karl Rove and powered by computerized outreach methods, or the classic "throw the bums out" mood of an electorate uneasy with the Iraq war and unhappy with one-party rule?

"We'll find out soon," said Klein as he walked through one of the many affluent neighborhoods in this seaside district, trying to persuade voters to oust an incumbent who has served in Congress for a quarter-century.

As the two campaigns make their final appeals, the differences suggest that many of the advantages that have boosted Republicans to victory in the past — more money, redrawn congressional districts and the superior voter targeting demonstrated by Shaw's courtship of Jews, Latinos and seniors — may be less potent this time.

The moderate 22nd District is one of three in Florida alone considered vulnerable for the GOP. Nationwide, about three dozen House races are competitive. To control the House, Democrats need to gain 15 seats; for the Senate, they must pick up six.

Shaw began the campaign with an arsenal typical of GOP incumbents, including a head start on fund-raising. But voter anger and a sense among donors that Democrats could control Congress have put Klein close to financial parity.

Now, the race is considered winnable for the Democrats, and Shaw's best hope comes from the GOP strategy of narrow-casting and voter identification.

On Friday, as in GOP campaigns across the country, the Shaw team's "72-hour plan" got underway — its final effort to reach people who, according to their profile in the party's national database, are likely to favor Republican candidates.

At a field office in Boca Raton, dozens of volunteers turned up to knock on doors and talk to voters. A staffer distributed clipboards with printed pages of names, addresses and detailed maps.

The printouts came from the "Voter Vault," the GOP's national database, which tagged voters with labels showing why they were worth contacting: Some were dubbed "socos" (social conservatives) or "fiscos" (fiscal conservatives) or "soft Dems" (crossover voters). Each had already been identified as ready to favor Shaw. The goal was to persuade each one, using hints from the database, to make the effort to go to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0091258

Party leaders have built a 72-hour plan for every significant GOP race in the nation. The effort was developed by Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman after the 2000 election, in which Democrats outpaced the GOP in grass-roots activism and nearly won the presidency.

The "Voter Vault" is a central element of the plan, and the party invested more than $15 million to update the system this year. So far this election cycle, it has guided 24 million phone or in-person contacts to conservative voters.

Following the plan, over the campaign's final three days, GOP field offices in Shaw's district must file updated spreadsheets every three hours to the state GOP in Tallahassee, showing how many voters have been personally contacted. State party officials report that data to national headquarters, where staff members make sure that individual campaigns are meeting their goals.

By contrast, Klein believes that his broad appeal on Iraq and the need for change in Washington hold the keys to victory. Still, he too has scrambled to reach targeted groups.

Klein acknowledges that the GOP has an advantage in voter turnout, but said his campaign has spent a year building a field organization and a competing database. However, his database received only limited help from the national Democratic Party, and it has less detail than the GOP's.

Despite fewer resources, Klein's field director developed a program to reach seasonal residents, or "snowbirds," at their homes outside Florida. Klein's campaign has tried to identify residents of gated communities that are off-limits to candidates and canvassers, and to recruit volunteers within the walls. It also used a visit by former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland, disabled in Vietnam, to reach out to veterans.

Klein says he has employed enough canvassers to contact 60,000 backers in the final three days; on Friday alone, the campaign says, it reached 7,000 people by phone or in person.

And Democrats are counting on additional help from an ambitious voter-contact program by labor unions, though it is not coordinated with Klein's campaign.

Yet Klein's campaign appears to be behind Shaw's, whose workers say they reached 15,000 people Friday and have a goal of contacting at least 100,000 in the campaign's closing days.

But for all of the sophistication of the GOP plan, there are signs it could fall short.

As one of Shaw's teams made its rounds Friday, carrying GOP door-hangers and dressed in T-shirts advertising the Republican candidate for governor, a voter identified as a Shaw supporter said she had no intention of supporting the Republican Party this year.

"I just don't know about the war," said Karen Rossen, 48, a dental office manager from Delray Beach. "I think the Democrats would be easier to deal with." A mountain of mail has arrived promoting Shaw and other Republicans, Rossen said, but she throws it all away, calling it "a waste of money."

Several voters targeted on one three-hour walk agreed to back the GOP ticket. But of 99 households assigned to this particular team of home-schooled teenagers, only 15 people were contacted directly. Many on the list had moved, or lived in buildings that banned solicitors. Two reacted angrily when asked whom they were voting for.

Nori Lapes, a longtime GOP volunteer, said she sensed a change in attitude this year as she canvassed. Some voters complained about the war and the House page scandal involving former GOP Rep. Mark Foley, who represented an adjacent district.

"Some people are more subdued," said Lapes, a clothing designer from Boca Raton.

But strategists say the power of the 72-hour plan is its ability to reach voters who might be hesitating. Lapes said she would spend 10 minutes or more standing in doorways, urging people to stick with the GOP.

"One man was so confused, he wasn't going to vote," she said. "But by the time I left, he had a smile on his face. I think he was convinced."

In addition to talking to individual voters, Shaw has used targeted messages to reach specific groups. He sent Jewish voters a pamphlet featuring pictures of him with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and wounded soldiers. He produced two radio spots in Spanish, even though the district has a minuscule Latino population.

Klein did not reach out to either group with specialized mailings, illustrating how the GOP remains more meticulous in searching for every possible vote. It also reflects the party's experience in 2000, when Shaw won by fewer than 600 votes.

After 2000, Shaw's district was redrawn by Florida's GOP-led legislature to include more Republicans. But this year, even some Democrats have heard from Shaw about his opposition to President Bush's stance on stem-cell research.

By Tuesday night, voters here and across the country will show whether such precision tactics can withstand the broader wave of anger that Klein hopes will send him to Washington. A poll in Sunday's Miami Herald showed Klein with a 10-point lead, suggesting that Democrats may soon be celebrating.

DOJ_NMG_0091259

But there's another election in just two years, when Iraq and GOP scandals may not dominate the debate. So what would Democratic incumbents, forced to combat all of the Republican advantages, do then?

"Maybe we can learn from them in the future," Klein said of the Republicans' tactics.

If not, even Democratic strategists concede, their party could soon find itself relegated again to the back bench.

In Campaigns' Last Hours, A Get-out-the-vote Contest (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

BETHESDA, MD.

Fueled by cans of Dr. Pepper and tubs of candy left over from Halloween, volunteers at the Democratic phone bank in a storefront here are deep into calls by mid-morning Saturday - an effort that could seal a victory for their party on Nov. 7 ... or not.

The question they're asking is the same across America: Can we count on your vote on Tuesday? If the answer is yes, there will be a follow-up call on Election Day: Have you voted?

Nothing is more basic in a campaign than getting out the vote. The Republican Party is famous for its well-oiled mechanism for identifying, finding, and prodding its voters all the way to polling sites, but this year, Democratic leaders say, they're ready to match the GOP's vaunted "72-hour plan" call for call.

Note: In the Bethesda office - campaign headquarters for US Rep. Benjamin Cardin, who is running for Senate in a tight race against Lt. Gov. Michael Steele (R) - no one is dialing a phone. Calls to targeted voters are automated, allowing volunteers to talk to as many as 100 probable supporters an hour. Instead of recording responses on sheets of paper, volunteers punch "1" (for "yes") on their phone keypads, and that voter's file is automatically updated.

These automated voter files can match data from other sources, revealing information such as an individual's ethnicity, race, religion, income, financial data, subscriptions, buying habits, and political history, even from states where a voter has formerly lived. Routes for volunteer canvassers are integrated with mapping software.

"Our use of data has become much better and more efficient," says Artie Harris of the Maryland Democratic Party. "We have thousands of volunteers and paid canvassers on the streets working very, very hard, contacting hundreds of thousands of voters."

In Maryland, polls show that the GOP's Mr. Steele, an African-American, could take a bigger bite out of the black vote in neighboring Prince George's County than Democrats had expected. It makes the get-out-the-vote effort here in Montgomery County all the more crucial for Mr. Cardin. Republicans turn on the jets

Until the 2002 campaign, Democrats, backed by labor union supporters, typically had the edge in turning out their voters. But the "72-hour" get-out-the-vote (GOTV) program developed by Karl Rove, President Bush's adviser, and Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee (RNC) chairman - which includes microtargeted voter lists and a nearly year-round mobilization effort - gave Republicans a strategic and technological edge that helped them hold onto the House and Senate in the past two elections. This year, the RNC promises "the biggest midterm GOTV operation in history."

Since then, Democrats have scrambled to catch up. By 2004, the Democratic National Committee had improved its automated voter files, but the operation was prone to glitches. Some state GOTV teams couldn't access the files until days before the election. After that campaign, the DNC launched an $8 million overhaul of its voter-file system and invested in training in all 50 states.

"Through Governor Dean's 50-state strategy, we put field staff on the ground in all 50 states a year ago," says DNC communications director Karen Finney.

"A lot of people criticized [Democratic National Committee Chairman] Howard Dean for his 50-state project. They wanted him to focus on a small number of battleground states," says Kim Gandy, chair of the National Organization of Women and its political action committee, who is spending her vacation helping to organize the phone bank here. "But what has happened in the last month shows the wisdom of what he has done, because there are competitive races in states we never thought there would be, and now there is a mechanism that could put these Democratic candidates over the top." Rebuilding in West Virginia

In West Virginia, the state Democratic Party started rebuilding its precinct captain structure in June 2005. With help from the DNC, it set up an automated, updated voter file accessible down to the precinct level. Volunteers can now see prospective voters' party identification, gender, age, how they voted in the past six to eight elections, whether an absentee ballot was used, plus appended microtargeting data such as estimated household income, occupation, magazine subscriptions, whether they have kids in school, and what they told previous party canvassers.

"Twenty years ago, Democrats here had an excellent get-out-the-vote system, and we're trying to get back to that ... and to branch out to traditional Republican areas," says Derek Scarbro, field director for the West Virginia State Democratic Party. "Our ability to track and manage that data has come a long way in West Virginia, and that's helpful. We even think we have an edge," adds Mr. Scarbro. The number of Democrats casting votes early is up 3 percent from the level in 2004. "Republicans are down a bit, and that's encouraging," he says.

Still, top GOP campaign advisers say the party's turnout plan can give Republicans the edge they need to win close races this week. "There are about 30 hotly contested [House] races, within the margin of error, and our 72-hour effort will make the difference on what it looks like on Election Day," said Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, on Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Some voting experts say the get-out-the-vote arms race is less than meets the eye.

"The Republican turnout machine is a myth," says Robert Richie, executive director for FairVote - The Center for Voting and Democracy, based in Maryland. "There's very little to indicate from the results that the Republicans are doing a better job at mobilizing people," he says. Republicans won in 2002 and 2004 not because they had higher-tech turnout toys, but because they persuaded people.

"Voter turnout is not very complicated. It's identifying voters, reminding them to vote, reminding them again, then making sure they vote," adds Mr. Richie. "You can call new techniques something fancy, but at the end of the day it's the most basic thing you do. Both sides do it."

The Green Card (WSJ)

By George Ball

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

After closing our fiscal year at Burpee Seeds, I noticed some intriguing figures in the sales of flower and vegetable seeds to home gardeners that, while displaying great differences, also show affinities that would warm a compost heap. Politics, in my opinion, is not so much a contest between different states of red and blue as between different shades of green -- a comforting reality in today's frosty political climate.

Let's first examine garden flowers. Both red-state Republicans and blue-state Dems grow sunflowers, zinnias and marigolds. However, the differences quickly bloom. Blue states buy many more impatiens, snapdragons and columbines -- expensive and sophisticated sun or shade flowers with varied and subtle colors. On the other hand, red states favor overwhelmingly boisterous morning glories, traditional nasturtiums and inexpensive four o'clocks. The sunny red states like to keep it plain and simple; the dappled blues like to make it diverse and edgy.

But wait -- in vegetable veritas. First, the comfort zone consists of a big garden with both Democrats and Republicans happily weeding squashes, cucumbers, peas and basil -- everyone grows a lot of them. But blue states grow a surprisingly wide range of tomatoes, along with both sweet and hot peppers and a fair amount of cilantro and dill. Think homemade salsas, poached salmon and heirloom vegetable collections. Yet red-staters are equally surprising and almost exotic in their preferences for green beans, onions, potatoes, carrots, sweet corn, parsley and oregano. When they do grow tomatoes, they choose only big slicers and paste types -- no fancy heirlooms. Again, they like vining in both vegetables and flowers, and easy-to-sow crops, half of them to be dug from the ground. To call red-staters "earthy" and blue-staters "well-branched" would be accurate.

Like a gardener with arms full of sweet corn, "green state" preferences run straight into the kitchen. Blue Dems are gourmet and fashion-conscious cooks; they like a few of every kind of tomato and pepper that exists, while their herbs tend to be diverse and savory. Red GOPers favor traditional cuisine, picnic fare, lots of stews and relishes, and enormous crops of green beans.

So, green is good. All gardeners agree on a patch that includes the basic "squash-cuke-pea-basil-tomato" requirement. But they also literally distinguish themselves in the backyard, just as in the voting booth. The Republican is a sun-drenched, green-bean, elbows on the table, vine-loving gardener, while the more passionate Democrat picks and chooses from a wider range of cultivars of spicy and savory peppers, European tomatoes, and flowers that prefer afternoon shade cast by mature trees. Let's rejoice that there are 50 states where we make up a mosaic of gardeners and gardens -- daring and avant-garde blue or tried and true, risk-averse red. But in the end, we are all still deep in the green.

Democrats Focus On Pennsylvania (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

LANCASTER, Pa. -- Top Democrats at several rallies in suburban Philadelphia this weekend worked to push their party's voters to the polls in a state where Democrats feel poised to sweep key races and oust the Senate's No. 3 Republican, Rick Santorum.

DOJ_NMG_0091261

Gov. Edward G. Rendell joined Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Democrat Bob Casey Jr., who leads Mr. Santorum in polls, to declare the year of the Democrats here.

"Once again, Pennsylvania will lead the way you did at the beginning of our country," Mrs. Pelosi told a crowd in Glenside, where the group stumped for Democratic House candidate Patrick Murphy.

"I want to see [Mr. Casey] as our senator for the next 30 years," Mr. Rendell said, telling the screaming Glenside crowd that if they work hard to turn out the vote, "November 7th is going to be a great day for Pennsylvania, a great day for the Democratic Party."

Polls show that five Republican-held House seats in the state are within reach of Democrats -- so much so that Mrs. Pelosi spent the final campaign weekend here stumping for Democratic challengers.

Mr. Murphy and fellow Democrat Lois Murphy have gained ground in two Republican-held suburban Philadelphia districts, where they are challenging Reps. Michael G. Fitzpatrick and Jim Gerlach, respectively. Republican Reps. Don Sherwood and Curt Weldon are entangled in high-profile scandals that have helped Democratic challengers in their districts.

In the Senate race, Mr. Santorum has spent the past week arguing that Mr. Casey, the state treasurer and son of a former governor, will be soft on national-security issues at a time when decisiveness is needed. Mr. Casey has condemned Mr. Santorum as a rubber stamp for President Bush, who has just a 36 percent approval rating in Pennsylvania, according to a Survey USA poll.

"We've had too much of them, and on the morning of November 8, we're going to be headed down a new road," Mr. Casey told a crowd Saturday in Norristown.

"If we put in the wrong people ... we will take our country in a direction that will harm our national security," Mr. Santorum said yesterday in Lancaster.

Mr. Santorum cited a "botched joke" last week by Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, who implied that students who aren't smart wind up in the military. Mr. Kerry's remark has incited the Republican base here, one party operative said.

Republicans said the Democrats are claiming victory far too soon. Mr. Santorum has trailed in the polls before but enjoys a strong ground operation, said Dan Ronayne of the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

"Anyone ready to count him out doesn't know the man," he said.

"If Democrats turn out at 38 percent and we turn out at 50 percent, you can take any polls and throw them out the window," Mr. Santorum said yesterday.

Mr. Santorum, a leading social conservative in the Senate, has fought his hardest battle yet against Mr. Casey, a pro-life Democrat.

University of Pennsylvania political science professor Jack Nagel said liberal Democrats are willing to accept Mr. Casey's more conservative stances.

"They're realizing they might have to sacrifice on some social issues," Mr. Nagel said.

Matt Cooley, a pro-choice Democrat from Ambler, gave Mr. Casey a tepid endorsement as a "thoughtful guy," but said Mr. Santorum is "way too extreme for me" and predicted the Republican will be "toast" on Election Day.

For Lana Hopkins of Glenside, the election is all about unhappiness with the war in Iraq.

"This seems like a presidential election year," she said of Democrats' excitement level.

Still, Republican State Party Chairman Robert Gleason Jr. said Friday that he expects victory for Mr. Santorum as well as House Republicans and gubernatorial candidate Lynn Swann because of the party's get-out-the-vote effort.

Some Democrats are worried. A man at the Democrats' rally in Norristown lamented, "All of us are wondering what Karl Rove's going to pull on us."

Party leaders warned their faithful against overconfidence.

"Polls never cast a vote," Mr. Rendell said.

For Republicans (USAT)

By Ken Mehlman

USA Today, November 6, 2006

From the narrowly averted plot to blow up airliners bound for the USA to North Korea's nuclear detonation to last week's missile test by Iran, we are constantly reminded of the threat against free nations by terrorists and despotic leaders who support them. The war we fight today is not a new war. For a generation, terrorists have attacked free nations, from the 1972 Olympic Games in Munich, to the U.S. hostages in Iran, to Beirut, to the World Trade Center in 1993, Riyadh in 1995, Khobar Towers in 1996, the U.S. Embassy attacks in 1998, and the USS Cole in 2000. Too often, free nations responded weakly or not at all, so the enemy grew emboldened, leading to 9/11.

DOJ_NMG_0091262

Today, the Republican Party has learned the lessons of Sept. 11, and understands the importance of using every single tool at our disposal to win this war — but some Democrat leaders would take those tools away. Democrats in the House and Senate voted against re-authorization of the USA Patriot Act. The overwhelming majority of House Democrats voted against legislation to make it easier to intercept terrorist communications. Democrats voted against tribunals that will help us get the information we need, and have time and again voted against missile defense.

Even more dangerous is that Democrats truly seem to believe that Iraq is completely separate from the greater war on terror. Al-Qaeda's leaders are not confused about the importance of Iraq to their goal of global jihad. Osama bin Laden's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has said his goal is to use Iraq as a base to launch further attacks, with the goal of creating a new caliphate in the Middle East. On Tuesday, we must ask ourselves: Would surrendering Iraq to the enemy so they can use it as a base from which to launch attacks make us more or less safe?

Voters face another choice Tuesday: Republicans have cut taxes every year since George W. Bush was elected president. Democrats, on the other hand, have said outright that they plan to raise your taxes. If you're a typical American family with two kids earning $30,000 a year, the Democrats would raise your taxes by more than $2,000. They'd raise your gas taxes just as gas prices are finally coming down. Where would it end? Well, the man who would be in charge of tax policy in a Democrat-controlled House came right out and said it: No tax increase will be out of bounds.

Republicans want to eliminate the death tax once and for all. Democrats want to bring it back. Republicans want to explore new sources of energy to bring gas and heating prices down. Democrats want to block domestic exploration. Republicans want small businesses to be able to band together to provide health care to their employees at a reasonable cost. Democrats don't believe entrepreneurs and their employees should have that freedom. Republicans want all parents to be able to choose where they send their kids to school. Democrats would limit that choice to the rich and powerful. The list goes on and on.

There is one more choice voters face Tuesday: The Senate has approved two superb new Supreme Court justices, John Roberts and Sam Alito. Republicans supported Justices Roberts and Alito because they understand that judges need to interpret the law, not invent it. Many Democrats, on the other hand, vocally fought — and then voted against — Justices Roberts and Alito. Why? Because they depend on activist judges to hand them the victories they can't win at the ballot box.

Tuesday, Americans will have the opportunity to choose between a party that wants to use every tool to keep us safe, or one that would take those tools away; between a party that wants to let you keep more of your own hard-earned money, or one that believes that money belongs to Washington; between a party that understands judicial restraint, or one that wants activist judges to fight its battles.

Two very different visions for America, and one very strong reason for the American people to help Republicans make history and maintain our majorities in Congress.

For Democrats (USAT)

By Howard Dean

USA Today, November 6, 2006

Tuesday, Americans have a choice between staying the course and a new direction for our country. After six years of Republican leadership, some Americans may be considering doing something they haven't done in a long time. Vote for a Democrat.

If you vote for a Democrat on Tuesday, we will honor the trust you put in us with a new direction for America.

Isn't it time for a new direction in Iraq?

The American people deserve political leaders who will ask the tough questions and make smart decisions about our foreign policy and homeland security, not just tough talk around election time. Sixteen intelligence agencies agree that the Bush administration's failed Iraq policy is increasing terrorism around the world. Our brave troops have become occupiers caught in a civil war. Democrats are united behind a strategy of phased redeployment and benchmarks that make it clear to the Iraqis that they must take responsibility for the future of their country.

Isn't it time for a new direction in fighting the war on terror?

Osama bin Laden is still on the loose, and al-Qaeda has moved to a new location in northwest Pakistan. Afghanistan has seen a resurgence of the Taliban. Democrats want to increase the size of our Special Forces to destroy bin Laden and terrorist networks such as al-Qaeda. We want to ensure that our troops and agencies have the tools to stop future attacks. And we won't take our eyes off of the growing threats in Iran and North Korea.

We also need to keep our streets and communities at home safe. We will enact the bipartisan 9/11 Commission recommendations because it's time to inspect all cargo and lock down loose nuclear material and ensure our nation is prepared for disasters such as Hurricane Katrina — and the aftermath. We will ensure we properly equip our National Guard and first responders.

Isn't it time for a new direction for our economy and the middle class?

The harmful policies of the GOP have failed hard-working Americans. Republicans have waged a war on the family. The Bush economy has failed 80% of Americans, benefiting only the top 1%. For most Americans, wages and incomes have slowed; health care costs and personal debt have increased. Home mortgage foreclosures are up; college tuition has skyrocketed.

We will end Republicans' deficit spending and restore pay-as-you-go discipline. We will restore the Republican cuts to Pell grants and other programs that make it easier for our kids to afford to go to college. We will protect, not privatize, Social Security.

Democrats respect hard-working families and the work it takes to make ends meet. We believe that strengthening the middle class is essential for a thriving economy that rewards work, opens the door of opportunity to all, and makes it easier for parents to devote time to their families. We will ease the burdens on middle-class Americans with middle-class tax fairness, increase the minimum wage and reverse Republican health care cuts. We want to make a down payment in ensuring affordable health care for every American, and fix the Medicare prescription drug program. We will protect Social Security so that every senior is ensured a retirement in dignity.

We will enact real ethics reform in Congress.

Isn't it time for responsible, competent leadership and an end to the politics of deficits, divisiveness and deceit?

Our nation has become more divided and polarized with rhetoric and campaign tactics designed to drive wedges rather than find common ground. From Iraq to the economy to the aftermath of Katrina, we've seen incompetence and mismanagement. The Republicans' culture of corruption time and again has put the interests of their party and their cronies ahead of doing what's right for our children, our communities and our families.

Isn't it time for a new direction? Democrats have a unified agenda to restore hope and opportunity, competence and responsibility. So on Tuesday, if you want to change what's going on in Washington, vote for Democrats.

Limiting The Damage (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

President Bush isn't on the ballot tomorrow. But this election is, nonetheless, all about him. The question is whether voters will pry his fingers loose from at least some of the levers of power, thereby limiting the damage he can inflict in his two remaining years in office.

There are still some people urging Mr. Bush to change course. For example, a scathing editorial published today by The Military Times, which calls on Mr. Bush to fire Donald Rumsfeld, declares that "this is not about the midterm elections." But the editorial's authors surely know better than that. Mr. Bush won't fire Mr. Rumsfeld; he won't change strategy in Iraq; he won't change course at all, unless Congress forces him to.

At this point, nobody should have any illusions about Mr. Bush's character. To put it bluntly, he's an insecure bully who believes that owning up to a mistake, any mistake, would undermine his manhood — and who therefore lives in a dream world in which all of his policies are succeeding and all of his officials are doing a heckuva job. Just last week he declared himself "pleased with the progress we're making" in Iraq.

In other words, he's the sort of man who should never have been put in a position of authority, let alone been given the kind of unquestioned power, free from normal checks and balances, that he was granted after 9/11. But he was, alas, given that power, as well as a prolonged free ride from much of the news media.

The results have been predictably disastrous. The nightmare in Iraq is only part of the story. In time, the degradation of the federal government by rampant cronyism — almost every part of the executive branch I know anything about, from the Environmental Protection Agency to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, has been FEMAfied — may come to be seen as an equally serious blow to America's future.

And it should be a matter of intense national shame that Mr. Bush has quietly abandoned his fine promises to New Orleans and the rest of the Gulf Coast.

The public, which rallied around Mr. Bush after 9/11 and was still prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt two years ago, seems to have figured most of this out. It's too late to vote Mr. Bush out of office, but most Americans seem prepared to punish Mr. Bush's party for his personal failings. This is in spite of a vicious campaign in which Mr. Bush has gone further than any previous president — even Richard Nixon — in attacking the patriotism of anyone who criticizes him or his policies.

That said, it's still possible that the Republicans will hold on to both houses of Congress. The feeding frenzy over John Kerry's botched joke showed that many people in the news media are still willing to be played like a fiddle. And if you think the timing of the Saddam verdict was coincidental, I've got a terrorist plot against the Brooklyn Bridge to sell you.

Moreover, the potential for vote suppression and/or outright electoral fraud remains substantial. And it will be very hard for the Democrats to take the Senate for the very simple reason that only one-third of Senate seats are on this ballot.

What if the Democrats do win? That doesn't guarantee a change in policy.

The Constitution says that Congress and the White House are co-equal branches of government, but Mr. Bush and his people aren't big on constitutional niceties. Even with a docile Republican majority controlling Congress, Mr. Bush has been in the habit of declaring that he has the right to disobey the law he has just signed, whether it's a law prohibiting torture or a law requiring that he hire qualified people to run FEMA.

Just imagine, then, what he'll do if faced with demands for information from, say, Congressional Democrats investigating war profiteering, which seems to have been rampant. Actually, we don't have to imagine: a White House strategist has already told Time magazine that the administration plans a "cataclysmic fight to the death" if Democrats in Congress try to exercise their right to issue subpoenas — which is one heck of a metaphor, given Mr. Bush's history of getting American service members trapped in cataclysmic fights where the deaths are anything but metaphors.

But here's the thing: no matter how hard the Bush administration may try to ignore the constitutional division of power, Mr. Bush's ability to make deadly mistakes has rested in part on G.O.P. control of Congress. That's why many Americans, myself included, will breathe a lot easier if one-party rule ends tomorrow.

'It Didn't Have To Be That Way' (WSJ)

By Fred Barnes

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

Republicans face the prospect of losing a substantial number of Senate and House seats in the midterm election tomorrow, but it didn't have to be that way. For sure, the war in Iraq was always going to be a drag on Republicans. And an election in the sixth year of a presidency is often perilous for the president's party, a pattern that's held true in year six of the Bush era.

But Republicans have made matters worse by abandoning the reform agenda that animated their capture of Congress in 1994 and helped George Bush win the White House in 2000 and keep it in 2004. With scarcely a fight, Republicans gave up on Social Security reform in 2005, immigration reform in 2006, and never really got started on tax reform. Mr. Bush also cast aside the overarching theme for his domestic policy -- the Ownership Society -- without an explanation.

The consequences have been dire. Republicans have little to boast about in Mr. Bush's second term except the strong economy -- and it's largely the result of tax cuts enacted three years ago. When Democrats bring up Iraq or corruption, Republicans have no countervailing issues. The president has made a strong case against Democrats on national security and taxes. But voters have been unresponsive and it's easy to understand why. It's Mr. Bush himself who causes them to feel safe from lax security and tax hikes. Whatever happens in tomorrow's election, he'll be in the White House for two more years to protect them from Democratic excesses. But what if Republicans had followed the president's lead last year and tried to overhaul Social Security and enact personal investment accounts? If they'd succeeded, voters would now be perusing the stock tables to decide how to invest their payroll taxes. Had Democrats blocked reform, Republicans would be pointing out the gains voters were missing in the bull market. Either way, Republicans would be ahead. So would the country.

Instead, they balked at Mr. Bush's modest reform proposal. House Speaker Dennis Hastert thought it too risky, though the president had trumpeted his idea, with impunity, in two national campaigns. Another Republican leader told Mr. Bush that House Republicans would line up behind him -- but only after he'd drummed up a strong national majority in favor of entitlement reform. In truth, it already existed. Private accounts financed out of payroll taxes, while controversial, have long been popular. Left alone in the drive to fix Social Security, the president, disappointed and exhausted, finally gave up the fight.

For Republicans, 2006 was going to be the year they bravely took on America's immigration problem. Despite a division among Republicans on a solution, an ultimate agreement seemed quite possible. House Republicans would get beefed up security along the border with Mexico well beyond what Mr. Bush wished. In return, Mr. Bush and Senate Republicans would get what they wanted: additional security plus a program to bring foreign workers here temporarily and a plan for illegal immigrants in the U.S. to "earn" citizenship.

There were (and still are) many ways to reconcile the two positions. The simplest was to stagger the implementation of the three parts of immigration reform by requiring a secure border first, followed a few years later by the guest workers' program and citizenship scheme. Hispanic Americans and their influential lobbying organizations were willing to go along. And Democrats, faced with mass defections, would have been forced to accept the GOP compromise.

For lack of leadership, the compromise never materialized. Mr. Bush balked at taking charge of the issue. Mr. Hastert, cautious to a fault, declined to take a firm position. Roy Blunt, the House Republican whip, opposed the compromise. Another Republican leader assured me that House Republicans were in an ideal position. They could boast of having "blocked a bad Senate bill" -- a bill backed by the White House -- and that would serve them well in the election.

It hasn't. Nor has the last-minute border security measure authorizing 700 miles of fence that Mr. Bush signed in October. And opposition to "amnesty" in any form has failed to immunize Republicans. A good example is popular congressman J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, one of the loudest foes of letting illegals become citizens. He faces an unexpectedly strong Democratic challenger -- in the state with the biggest influx of illegal aliens in the country.

In the end, Republicans raised the immigration issue, touted it as a national crisis, stirred the nation's interest, then failed to come to grips with it. But imagine if Republicans had agreed on a compromise and enacted a "comprehensive" -- Mr. Bush's word -- immigration bill, dealing with both legal and illegal immigrants. They'd be justifiably basking in their accomplishment. The American public, except for nativist diehards, would be thrilled.

Tax reform could have had a similar effect. It may be hard to achieve, but it's both important and favored by the vast majority of Americans. Here again, however, Republicans were anything but bold. A tax panel commissioned by Mr. Bush concentrated on easing the burden imposed by the Alternative Minimum Tax at the expense of fundamental tax reform. Not surprisingly, the panel's timid recommendations produced little enthusiasm. And the tax issue quickly faded away.

The White House didn't have to acquiesce. It could have pressured the tax commission to come up with a sweeping reform plan. Or it could have proposed its own blueprint for reform. There's no secret about what's needed: lower rates, fewer deductions, a broader tax base, simplification of the tax code, elimination of double taxation of dividends, and a lot more. Instead, the White House let the moment pass.

When I interviewed Mr. Bush a year ago, I asked him about his concept of an "ownership society." He had been using the phrase as the theme for his domestic program (with the exception of immigration) and it was beginning to catch on. It included health-care reform and "lifetime" IRAs, a reform of retirement instruments, as well as tax and Social Security reform. The president was so enthusiastic about this that he cited it in his second inaugural address.

He saw ownership as a boon to personal responsibility, accountability and independence, especially from government. "Government sometimes, because you're dependent on it, undermines the sense of personal responsibility," he said. It was a spur to the poor "not to remain poor and to have that dream of owning something," he told me. And it gave an owner "a vital stake in our country."

Mr. Bush inexplicably dropped the phrase from his speeches this year. Perhaps it didn't poll well. Perhaps it was too radical. An "ownership society" represents a sharp new direction in domestic policy designed to encourage citizens to be more self-reliant and less dependent on government. It's a kind of demand-side conservatism with citizens gradually asking for less and less federal assistance.

Now, an "ownership society" is all but forgotten, Republicans as reformers a thing of the past. The party unity that would have come from settling differences on immigration is absent. As a result, Republicans have bickered throughout the 2006 campaign. If they have an agenda for the next two years, they haven't told voters. Democrats don't have an agenda either, they're the "out" party. They can get away with it. Republicans can't.

Reform is appealing to voters because they sense, quite correctly, there's much in need of reform. Besides Social Security and immigration and taxes, there's Congress itself. By skimping on congressional reform, too, Republicans made themselves all the more vulnerable to exaggerated charges of corruption. Reform, of course, is the opposite of corruption.

It's unknowable how many Senate and House seats might have been saved had Republicans championed reform. But surely Republicans would have been better off with a program of reform to flaunt. The campaign would have been elevated. And win or lose, Republicans would have something vital to talk about for the final years of the Bush presidency.

Hastert May Face Post-Election Unrest (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's future is in doubt even if the Republicans retain control of the House because of unease among GOP lawmakers about his handling of the Foley page scandal and what a House ethics committee investigation might conclude about him, according to several Republican aides.

House Chief Deputy Whip Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.) said last week that the House Republican leadership elections scheduled for Nov. 15 should be postponed until the ethics committee delivers its final report. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) confirmed yesterday on "Fox News Sunday" that he and Hastert have discussed that possibility. "We'll see how Tuesday goes and then we'll make some decisions."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared before the House ethics committee last month to answer questions on the congressional page scandal, but concerns about his leadership run deeper. He is likely to be challenged for the speaker's job regardless of election results. (By Manuel Balce Ceneta -- Associated Press)

But if Democrats seize control of the House in tomorrow's election, as many political analysts and pollsters are predicting, then Hastert is widely expected to exit the leadership stage and allow a new generation of Republican leaders to try to recapture the majority. Hastert, 64, the longest-serving Republican speaker, remains personally popular with House Republicans, but the discontent with his often lackadaisical, hands-off style is palpable.

"I believe that members have the highest regard for the speaker, his honesty, his integrity and his high ethical standards," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.). "But the last two years have been very tough for us as a majority. There's no doubt about that. Certainly we need to have a better direction, vision and drive than we've had during the 109th Congress."

The speaker and his top aides' response to warnings that former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had for years been pursuing teenage male pages is part of an emerging pattern that is troubling Republican lawmakers.

In early 2004, as House Appropriations Committee investigators prepared to launch a sensitive audit of highly classified Capitol Hill security upgrades, Hastert's chief counsel made a surprise visit to the first meeting of the auditors.

His message was clear, according to participants: The speaker's office was not happy about the probe and would keep investigators on a tight leash. In September 2005, despite growing evidence of sweetheart deals, kickbacks, wasteful contracts and shoddy work, the probe was suddenly shut down.

Critics of Hastert say the incident -- reported by Congressional Quarterly last month -- is emblematic of a speaker's office dominated by powerful senior aides that has repeatedly thwarted aggressive policing of the inner workings of Congress. Two of Hastert's top aides -- chief of staff Scott Palmer and chief counsel Ted Van Der Meid -- had been warned about Foley's unimpeded pursuit of male pages long before ABC News broke the story Sept. 28. Hastert and his aides orchestrated a purge of the ethics committee in February 2005, after the committee admonished then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for misconduct. And there have been massive cost overruns at a Capitol visitors center known derisively as "Hastert's Hole." A project once slated to cost $265 million now is expected to cost as much as $596 million.

All of these actions point to serious failures on the part of the speaker's office, critics say.

"All of the mechanisms that should be in place and used to protect the speaker and the House itself have been abridged because they just don't want to look," said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee.

Lisa C. Miller, a spokeswoman for the speaker, strenuously objected to the premise that Hastert has been a reluctant self-policeman or that there is growing dissatisfaction with Hastert's leadership within the Republican ranks. "Since Republicans have come into office, this House operates in a highly professional manner," she said. "We have vigorous oversight with annual auditing by an independent inspector general."

The turmoil has been mounting with Hastert largely off the stage. The speaker had expected to maintain a vigorous campaign schedule, but since the Foley scandal erupted, the former high school wrestling coach has kept largely out of sight. Boehner said that while Hastert has not granted many interviews, he made campaign appearances last week in Texas, Arizona and Florida. His Democratic opponent, a little-known challenger named John Laesch, has tried to capitalize on the swirling controversies. On Friday, Laesch posted a Web site, http://www.therealdenny.com , to raise questions about Hastert's leadership.

Meanwhile, some Republican lawmakers, such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) have been quietly putting out calls suggesting they might throw their hats in the ring for leadership posts. On Saturday, House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Tex.) announced that he, too, would be seeking a leadership post if a slot is available.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared before the House ethics committee last month to answer questions on the congressional page scandal, but concerns about his leadership run deeper. He is likely to be challenged for the speaker's job regardless of election results. (By Manuel Balce Ceneta -- Associated Press)

"It sounds like this is coming from folks who want the speaker's job," she said, "and when we win back the House on Tuesday, the speaker will run again."

The Foley scandal is foremost in members' minds, but what critics see as a lax attitude toward self-policing goes well beyond the Foley incident. The security investigation may be equally serious, Lilly suggested.

Since the Cold War days of the Kennedy administration, a highly secret organization has watched over the security of what is known as the Capitol campus, which includes the Capitol, the House and Senate office buildings and the Supreme Court. That organization got a renewed mission after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when hundreds of millions of dollars were channeled to it, mostly through the classified "black" budget of the House and Senate defense appropriations subcommittees.

In 2004, the chairmen and ranking Democrats on the House Appropriations Committee and House defense appropriations subcommittees tasked contract investigators to look at contracting on highly classified security upgrades, especially air filtration systems being installed to protect the campus from chemical and biological attack. The scale of the upgrades is unprecedented, and so is the cost, likely to run more than $100 million, according to three different sources close to the project.

Concern had been raised that contracts were being steered to unqualified bidders, who were wooing the secret organization's management with Redskins tickets, expensive lunches, even golf clubs, said Ronald Garant, one of the investigators. But the more pressing issue was sheer waste and incompetence, he said. Another former appropriations committee investigator familiar with the probe said the team was told by a Lockheed Martin contractor that the filtration system being installed in the Ford House Office Building was so shoddy that the children in the building's day-care center would not stand a chance in the event of a chemical or biological attack.

In early 2004, Garant and other investigators went to Arlington to meet with the organization. To their surprise, Van Der Meid, the speaker's chief counsel, made the trip, too. Van Der Meid made it clear from the start that he did not want the probe going forward, according to Garant, a retired, former high-ranking auditor for the Defense Department's comptroller with more than 30 years of experience in government oversight.

Investigators were prevented from talking to key personnel, had access blocked to key facilities and could not inspect the equipment they were supposed to be assessing. After hitting roadblock after roadblock, Robert H. Pearre, the appropriations committee's chief of investigations, delivered the news last September that the investigation had been shut down and its offices in CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., were to be closed.

"We were told, 'Lock the door, change the combination, take your papers, bring them over here. It's all over,' " Garant said.

House Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said some investigators were taken off the probe, but he said the study is ongoing. Republican aides familiar with the issue say Van Der Meid was not concerned about the investigation's findings but the investigators' cavalier attitudes toward a super-secret security effort. Former FBI agents did look at some of the charges of contractor abuse and determined they were inconsequential.

The Republican aides say the problem was with the investigators' attitudes. They said the fact that former investigators are discussing the probe of so secret a matter with reporters is proof that Van Der Meid's concerns about the investigators were warranted.

And those audits have produced eight consecutive clean bills of health, she said.

Senate Control In Play, Polls Find (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats, poised to score gains in the U.S. Senate, are struggling to pull ahead in the final seat they need to win control, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states find.

Democratic challengers are leading Republican incumbents — in some cases narrowly — in Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, according to the USA TODAY surveys. Other polls show Democratic challengers ahead in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Even if Democrats sweep those five races, however, they would fall one seat short of the six needed for majority status. Two GOP targets, in Tennessee and Virginia, now lead by 3 percentage points among likely voters.

“It says to me the Senate is still very much in play and could go either way,” says Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report.

In a separate nationwide USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44% among likely voters. That edge of 7 percentage points had narrowed from a 13-point margin two weeks ago.

“Republicans are back in the game; they're engaged,” says Andy Kohut of the Pew Research Center, which had similar results in a survey released Sunday.

In the House, Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to regain control for the first time since 1994. Rothenberg and other non-partisan analysts predict they will.

In the Senate, the USA TODAY state polls show the Democratic incumbent considered most at risk, Democrat Robert Menendez of New Jersey, is now 10 points ahead of Tom Kean. Among GOP incumbents, however, Conrad Burns trails Jon Tester by 9 points in Montana, Jim Talent trails Claire McCaskill by 4 points in Missouri, and Lincoln Chafee trails Sheldon Whitehouse by 3 points in Rhode Island.

Republican Sen. George Allen leads Jim Webb in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker leads Harold Ford in Tennessee by identical 49%-46% margins.

Several races remain fluid. In Rhode Island, where Whitehouse's lead has tightened from an 11-point margin a month ago, 16% of likely voters say they made up their minds within the last week and 13% are still undecided. In Missouri, 7% remain undecided.

By big margins, voters across the board say most of the TV ads they've seen have been negative. In Tennessee, an overwhelming 74% disapproved of a GOP ad that showed a sexy blonde saying, “Harold, call me.”

DOJ_NMG_0091268

But in Missouri, voters approved by 49%-38% of an ad that showed actor Michael J. Fox, visibly affected by Parkinson's disease, speaking in support of embryonic stem cell research and McCaskill.

How The Senate Could Turn Blue (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, November 6, 2006

BY ROBERT NOVAK Sun-Times Columnist WASHINGTON -- To achieve the net gain of six seats needed for Democrats to win control of the Senate on Tuesday once seemed an impossible mission. Now it is clearly in sight.

In the weekend before the mid-term elections, two Republican seats seem definitely lost and two more are in serious trouble. If the Democrats win those four, they have to win only two of three more precarious Republican seats while keeping the only two Democratic incumbencies in any kind of danger.

That adds up to nine seats that will determine control of the Senate for the next two years:

OHIOSen. Mike DeWine (R) vs. Rep. Sherrod Brown (D)

This once seemed an unlikely place for a Democratic pickup, with Brown seemingly much too liberal for Ohio. But torn by scandals and a sub-par economy, Ohio in 2006 is a nightmare for Republicans, where big wins are expected by the Democratic ticket from top to bottom.

DeWine is an experienced candidate who works hard and has skillfully separated himself from an unpopular president. Nevertheless, Republicans have privately put this race on the hopeless list.

RHODE ISLANDSen. Lincoln Chafee (R) vs. state Atty. Gen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D)

Chafee is the most liberal Republican in the Senate. He did not even vote for George W. Bush for president in 2004. He survived a conservative challenge in this year's Republican primary, but he cannot count on vigorous GOP support, and he is an in- effective speaker.

Whitehouse, a former federal prosecutor, is not much of a candidate, either, but he should glide home in one of the country's most Democratic states. Still, strange things happen in Rhode Island, and Chafee has an outside chance to win a second term.

MONTANASen. Conrad Burns (R) vs. state Sen. Jon Tester (D)

When the year began, four-term, 71-year-old Burns looked a sure loser. The only Montana Republican elected to the Senate over the past half-century was down by double digits after he returned $150,000 in contributions related to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Tester's support has declined under a barrage of TV ads branding him a high-tax liberal, and the Democrat now holds only a small lead with a huge undecided vote.

MISSOURISen. Jim Talent (R) vs. state Auditor Claire McCaskill (D)

This is a classic conservative-vs.-liberal standoff between two professional office-seekers in a traditional weathervane state.

Complicating matters, the candidates are on opposite sides of a constitutional amendment on cloning for embryonic stem cell research (Talent against, McCaskill for). The large turnout of social conservatives against the bill is a plus for Talent, but Republican division on the issue is a minus.

Missouri may well be the single contest that determines control of the Senate.

VIRGINIASen. George Allen (R) vs. James Webb (D)

Allen, considered a major presidential prospect for '08, was 16 points ahead of Webb a month ago when he started committing one blunder after another.

Webb, a taciturn Reagan administration secretary of the Navy, is relatively conservative for a Democrat but campaigns hard against the Iraq war. While he is an unappealing candidate, he appears to have a small lead against Allen in what would be a bonus win never expected by party leaders.

TENNESSEEChattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) vs. Rep. Harold Ford (D)

Ford has run a brilliant campaign and out-dazzled Corker, but one question remains: Can an African American -- even one as handsome and ideologically moderate as the 36-year-old Ford -- really be elected to the Senate from a Southern state?

Recent polling data suggests "no" is the answer. Corker is not a dazzler, but he has jumped out to a lead against Ford after trailing earlier. The Republicans have been accused of racist tactics, and Ford finally lost his cool.

NEW JERSEYState Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R) vs. Sen. Robert Menendez (D)

This is the best Senate race for a Republican pickup. The 38-year-old Kean, son of the popular former governor, actually led against Menendez, an appointed senator, through the summer. Since then, Menendez has been hit by one scandal after another.

DOJ_NMG_0091269

But Menendez leads and may be increasing his lead. He has a money advantage that is rare for a Democrat, but a loss by a candidate as attractive as Kean would suggest no Republican can win in New Jersey anymore under any conditions.

MARYLANDLt. Gov. Michael Steele (R) vs. Rep. Ben Cardin (D)

Steele, the first African American elected statewide in Maryland, is a long shot in an overwhelmingly Democratic state in a Democratic year. However, the latest poll shows only a six-point lead by Cardin, a respected but dull professional politician.

The same poll gives Steele just 12 percent of the state's large African-American vote. Steele's own polls give him much more black support -- perhaps enough to eke out a startling Republican victory in an otherwise dismal election, which incidentally might save GOP control of the Senate.

PENNSYLVANIASen. Rick Santorum (R) vs. State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. (D)

Santorum, a national favorite of conservatives, is third-ranking in the Senate leadership and will move up to the second-ranking whip's position if re-elected. But he is unpopular in Pennsylvania, stuck at 42 percent in the polls for two years. Casey, son of the late governor, is a pro-life Democrat who is not popular in Philadelphia and a weak candidate. Nevertheless, Casey looks like a cinch.

Sen. Dole Says Dems Content To Lose War (USAT)

USA Today, November 6, 2006

The head of the Republican Senate campaign committee, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, said Sunday that her party will retain its majority partly because “Democrats appear to be content with losing” the war in Iraq. Her Democratic counterpart, Charles Schumer of New York, said his party wants to win the war, “which is why we want to change the strategy.”

Dole also said voters will be more focused on local issues. On Iraq, she said: “To pull out and withdraw is losing. The Democrats appear to be content with losing.” Schumer cited polls showing voter dissatisfaction with President Bush's war policy. Democrats need to add six Senate seats to have a majority.

Cheney plans first hunt since accident

Vice President Cheney will spend Election Day on his first hunting trip since he accidentally shot a companion last February on a private Texas ranch.

Lea Anne McBride, his press secretary, said it was an annual hunting outing and said Cheney spent Election Day in 2002 at the same lodge. On a Feb. 11 quail hunting trip, Cheney shot attorney Harry Whittington in the torso, neck and face with his shotgun. Whittington was hospitalized for six days.

Governor tailors campaign to football

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle worked his campaign schedule around the Green Bay Packers. Doyle, challenged by Republican Mark Green, met with Democratic Party workers in Marathon County two hours before kickoff of the Packers game against the Buffalo Bills in Buffalo. His second stop in Eau Claire started during halftime. His final stop at a sports bar in La Crosse was set for after the game. “The only thing the governor schedules during Packer games are Packer games,” spokeswoman Melanie Fonder said.

Candidates Making Final Push To Break Out (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And John Wagner

The Washington Post, November 6, 2006

Two of the Washington region's top Republicans -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- spent yesterday fighting off fierce electoral challenges that could stall their political careers and reverse GOP successes in their states.

Allen returned to the folksy approach that has endeared him to Virginians for almost two decades, tossing a football at FedEx Field before the Redskins game as he schmoozed with potential voters at a tailgate party. Later, he ditched a pair of brown Wranglers for a suit at an Ashburn event with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Ehrlich mingled with volunteers at a Republican call center in Prince George's County yesterday afternoon, appearing relaxed and upbeat about his prospects. Afterward, he, too, campaigned with Giuliani, whom he called "wildly popular within the [Republican] party and with many independents and Democrats."

The Democratic challengers in those races also used the last weekend of the campaign to stir their supporters. In Virginia, James Webb campaigned in the southwest region. In Maryland, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley appeared with former president Bill Clinton -- something Webb is scheduled to do today.

Public polls showed both men locked in dead heats. Surveys by Mason-Dixon published yesterday had Allen trailing Webb by one percentage point and Ehrlich tied with O'Malley. Previous polls, including a Washington Post poll last weekend, showed O'Malley ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0091270

The reelection bids by Allen and Ehrlich, along with the Senate race in Maryland between Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.) and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R), are crucial to national and local political efforts. The Senate races could decide which party controls that chamber of Congress. But the election tomorrow also will offer fresh evidence of political trends in the Washington region, where Allen, Ehrlich and Steele have created a resurgence in their states' parties. Losses by any of them -- particularly incumbents Allen or Ehrlich -- would raise questions about the future of the GOP in their respective states.

Webb, for his part, finished a two-day swing through the rural communities of southwest Virginia with former Nebraska senator Bob Kerrey (D) and the president of the United Mine Workers union. The last-minute blitz in the "Fightin' Ninth" congressional district has become a Democratic tradition in Virginia.

Webb will wrap up his campaign with a rally in Alexandria with Clinton.

O'Malley also was betting on Clinton's popularity in the largely Democratic Free State. He held a boisterous, late-night rally with the former president that drew more than 1,000 people to Prince George's.

Earlier, O'Malley was joined on the campaign trail by Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, the latest big-city mayor to testify to O'Malley's national reputation as an effective reformer. Today he is scheduled to appear with former vice president Al Gore in Montgomery County.

Steele campaigned in churches and gave an interview on Fox News Channel, hoping to catch up to Cardin in what polls suggest is a tightening race. Cardin joined O'Malley at the Clinton rally and also campaigned at churches yesterday.

The former president and former New York mayor were the top draws this weekend, helping to swell crowds and whip passions for an election that voting officials say already promises larger-than-usual turnout.

"This isn't a time for experimentation and for turning back the clock, which is what George's opponents want to do," Giuliani told the crowd of about 200 in Ashburn. "President Bush and the Republican Party have decided we're going to be on offense, and George Allen understands that."

Giuliani had a similar message for Ehrlich supporters: "He is a darn good governor, and he's doing a very good job," Giuliani, a possible 2008 presidential contender, told a crowd of about 200 at a firehouse in Prince George's. "You don't turn the clock back."

Hours later, on the other side of the partisan divide, Clinton arrived at an ornate reception hall of a church in the same county, a majority-black jurisdiction that is home to more Democrats than any other county in Maryland.

"I wanted to be here because I know Ben Cardin, I know Martin O'Malley, and I know what's going on in this country," Clinton said. "There are people all over America who would give anything to have people like this to vote for."

In two days, the candidates will know their fate: Win or lose. In or out. Staying or leaving.

With all three races very close, political parties in both states wonder what message voters will send tomorrow. Wins by Cardin and O'Malley in Maryland would confirm basic assumptions about the state's Democrat-leaning electorate. Victories by Ehrlich and Steele would go a long way toward ushering in a true two-party system in a state where registered Democrats have long outnumbered Republicans 2 to 1.

Conversely, a victory by Webb in Virginia would cement his party's resurgence in a state that has been considered a conservative stronghold since the early 1990s -- when Allen won the gubernatorial election. A win by Allen, despite a bruising campaign, would offer a reminder of the state's core leanings.

"You have this changing dynamic in Virginia that the Democrats have been pretty good in adjusting to," said Robert D. Holsworth, director of the Center for Public Policy at Virginia Commonwealth University. "Even if Allen wins, the very close nature of this race will have to lead them to think about how they adjust the message."

In Virginia yesterday morning, Allen taped a two-minute paid television spot that will air tonight in major markets across Virginia. In it, Allen will appear with Sen. John W. Warner (R), one of the state's most respected politicians, and talk about the war in Iraq.

Then, it was onto FedEx Field for tailgate festivities before the game between the Dallas Cowboys and the Washington Redskins. Allen's father and namesake was a Super Bowl-winning Redskins coach.

"I think he's gotten a bum deal on all of these ads criticizing him," said Ryan Travers, 32, a sales manager from Richmond. "They've been crazy negative."

"Good luck! Go get 'em!" another man yelled. Thomas Robinson, 33, a businessman from Haymarket, said he's voting for Allen, too. "I like to deer hunt, and I like his views," Robinson said.

Allen used football analogies to describe his fight against Webb. "We're focused," Allen said. "In football you learn that if you get knocked down, you get back up."

Hundreds of miles away, Webb sounded increasingly confident as he hammered his campaign themes of creating a diplomatic solution to the Iraq war, bridging the gap between the rich and poor, raising the minimum wage, closing corporate tax loopholes and fighting for fair trade.

DOJ_NMG_0091271

"You have given your loyalty, and you will have my loyalty, and I will work to bring fairness back to the economic system," Webb told about 150 supporters in Grundy, including dozens of current and retired coal miners.

Kerrey, who like Webb is a Vietnam War combat veteran, told the crowd that Webb "will put the law on the side of wages, health benefits and pensions."

"Jim has never forgotten it's important to live by those three words: family, honor, country," Kerrey said. "It's not phony for him."

In Big Stone Gap, Webb also sharpened his critique of Bush's policies and predicted the White House will face aggressive questions from a Democratic Congress.

"If you all help us, if we get out the word, on Wednesday morning the White House is going to wake up, and they are going to look out over the Capitol building and say, 'We've got a problem,' " Webb said.

In Maryland, O'Malley said he hoped the Clinton rally and an ad featuring the former president would help counter months of attacks on his record.

"With the Republican Governors Association coming in and spending all that money, going negative and trashing a record of accomplishment in Baltimore, it's nice to have someone who's known and respected come in and tell it like it is," O'Malley said.

Both races in Maryland could hinge on turnout in Prince George's -- a point several speakers tried to drive home at last night's rally.

"It's not about strategy anymore," Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D) told a racially diverse crowd waving O'Malley and Cardin placards. "It's about your heart. Do you want this victory more than they want it?"

In Maryland's Senate race, Steele made time Sunday for an interview on Fox News, in which he continued to present himself as a populist, in touch with "real life" and independent of both parties.

When asked by host Chris Wallace why blacks in Maryland should vote Republican when the balance of power in the Senate is at stake, Steele said, "I'm not asking them to vote Republican."

"I've not come to them as a Republican or a Democrat, as an African American or anything other than who I am," Steele said from the parking lot of the First Baptist Church of Glenarden. "Someone who believes in public service, who wants to go to Washington to try his best to make a difference in a town that has forgotten where people live and how they live."

Cardin and his wife, Myrna, traversed Prince George's yesterday morning, attending services at three African American churches.

Later in the day, he spoke at a Potomac synagogue before heading back to Prince George's to pump up volunteers at a VFW hall and to meet up with Clinton and O'Malley.

In the District, candidates for the competitive race for the Ward 6 seat on the D.C. Council concentrated most of their efforts in and around Capitol Hill, where turnout is usually high on Election Day.

Democratic nominee Tommy Wells hit the church circuit, knocked on doors and held a rally with volunteers. Will Cobb, who is running as an independent, met voters outside Eastern Market in the morning. Republican nominee Tony Williams could not be reached for comment.

Protectionist Stance Is Gaining Clout (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

DUBUQUE, Iowa -- Bidding for a congressional seat held by a free-trade Republican for nearly two decades, Democrat Bruce Braley has gained an edge by taking the opposite view: bashing globalization.

In one of the most closely watched congressional races, Mr. Braley has made opposition to the Bush administration's free-trade agenda a centerpiece of his campaign. He has run ads blaming the state's job losses on President Bush's "unfair trade deals." He has urged more focus on labor rights in national trade policy and talked of using economic sanctions to keep America competitive. "Our workers aren't on a level playing field," he says.

Mr. Braley's stance has helped propel the 49-year-old lawyer, who is running against an unabashedly free-trade Republican, into position to reverse recent trends and secure a Democratic win in Iowa's First District. His strong showing not only underscores how trade concerns have emerged as a central issue in many of this year's races but also suggests a more-protectionist U.S. trade policy if Democrats take Congress.

Even if Democrats don't win control, the campaign rhetoric may have a lasting effect, because some Republicans are finding it more painful politically to defend free trade.

The trend is worrying the business community. Top financial-services executives identified "protectionism" as the biggest threat to continued economic growth, after terrorism, according to a recent Financial Services Forum survey. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is spending about $10 million nationwide in the final days of the campaign to rally supporters for candidates sympathetic to business priorities, including free trade.

Democrats must pick up 15 seats to regain control of the House, and in more than a dozen districts up for grabs, trade issues are giving them an edge over Republicans damaged by Iraq and the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley and messages he sent congressional pages. Similar forces are roiling the fight for the Senate, where six additional seats would put Democrats in charge.

In western New York, Tom Reynolds, head of the Republican House campaign committee, is fighting a protectionist businessman and may lose. Richard Pombo, a California Republican who cruised to victory two years ago, is facing an eleventh-hour challenge from a Democrat pledging to "change our trade policy" so American farmers can better compete against foreign producers. In the Senate, which approves many trade treaties, Democrat Sherrod Brown is poised to unseat Ohio Republican Mike DeWine by capitalizing on worker resentment over globalization.

Pew Research data show the sense of vulnerability among workers. A recent poll shows low-skilled U.S. workers are over 40% more likely to believe their jobs could be sent offshore.

Trade is a perennial political dividing line. But the issue is taking on importance this year, amid increased public anxiety over globalization and activism by trade opponents. The political committee formed by the Citizens Trade Campaign, a labor, farm and environmental coalition, dispatched organizers after Labor Day to a dozen battleground districts to rally free-trade opponents. Protectionist sentiments and economic nationalism appear to be emerging as symbols of a broader but less well-defined sense of economic unease, which is particularly apparent in the Midwest this year.

The Republican-controlled Congress has already showed its sensitivity to the issue, helping derail a deal by Arab-owned Dubai Ports World to purchase the commercial operations at five U.S. ports and approving millions of dollars to build a wall to stem the tide of illegal immigrants from Mexico. Republican leaders have put aside initiatives on the Bush free-trade agenda, delaying action on a trade pact with Peru and pushing the White House to commit to a plan to possibly curtail imports from Vietnam.

The trend may become more pronounced if Democrats take one or both houses of Congress. In the 1990s, a bloc of House Democrats regularly supported free-trade initiatives like the North American Free Trade Agreement. These numbers have fallen as doubts increase about globalization, with only 15 Democrats backing the Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005. The emergence of candidates like Mr. Braley could accelerate the Democrats' transformation.

ELECTION 2006

Take a look at some of the most noteworthy campaign commercials, including a bitter back-and-forth in the Massachusetts governor race and the Corker-Ford rivalry in Tennessee. (See related story1.)

Massachusetts

Tennessee

Trade policy may be the biggest issue in which a Democratic majority in the House could make headway against the president in the next Congress. That is because President Bush's ability to send trade deals to Congress for a vote without amendments will expire in July. Congress will decide whether to renew his authority, with action beginning in the House.

That would give Democrats leverage to seek Bush commitments to help U.S. workers, such as putting labor rights and environmental protection alongside corporate concerns like patent protections in negotiations with other countries. Democrats might seek an overhaul of programs to help workers who lose jobs to foreign competition.

In Iowa, Mr. Braley's antiglobalization theme is striking a chord among voters in this rural district, which wraps from Davenport up the Mississippi River to Dubuque and west to Waterloo, Mr. Braley's hometown. Since 1990, the district has been represented by Republican Rep. Jim Nussle, a supporter of free trade who is now waging an uphill battle for governor.

Mr. Braley's own story has helped frame the populist themes of his campaign against his Republican opponent, businessman Mike Whalen. Mr. Braley grew up in a small farming community, where his parents struggled to make ends meet after his father shattered his leg on the job. The younger Mr. Braley washed dishes and drove a dump truck to help pay for college.

Iowa's uneven economic performance has warmed voters to Mr. Braley's message, which also emphasizes protecting Social Security and raising the minimum wage. While pockets of the state are prospering, the number of manufacturing jobs remains far below its 2001 peak, as companies have pared work forces in the face of foreign competition. A May announcement by Iowa icon Maytag, a unit of Whirlpool Corp., that it plans to lay off 2,000 workers in the state added to residents' unease.

Even Mr. Whalen, who scoffs that Mr. Braley is living in a "protectionist fantasyland," concurs that "deep down, there is that kind of angst" over trade and the economy.

This is the first bid for public office by Messrs. Braley and Whalen. The race is tight, but Mr. Braley's stance on trade appears to be winning over swing voters like Ken Brimeyer, who could make the difference tomorrow.

Mr. Brimeyer runs the loading dock at Flexsteel Industries Inc., a furniture maker in Dubuque. He twice voted for Rep. Nussle, but now plans to vote Democratic. One reason: President Bush's free-trade agenda. In the past four years, the number of jobs at Flexsteel has fallen 60%, to 250, as much of the upholstering work once done at the plant has been shifted to China, where labor is cheaper. "It makes you angry," Mr. Brimeyer says.

Messrs. Braley and Whalen have aired dueling ads that sharpened their differences on trade. In mid-October, a Braley television ad focused on the state's job losses and accused Mr. Whalen of supporting Bush-backed "trade deals that ship Iowa jobs overseas" and being "out of touch with working families."

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, campaigning in the district for Mr. Whalen, issued a rebuke several days later. "These trade agreements work," Mr. Gutierrez said. "We're talking about real jobs here, and we should not be playing with protectionist polices that put these jobs at risk."

Mr. Whalen's radio ad alleged Mr. Braley's approach would harm Iowa farmers and manufacturers who depend on exports. He pointed to the Alcoa Inc. plant in Davenport, where 2,000 workers make aviation parts for Boeing Co. and Airbus. "Without international trade, those Iowa jobs would be gone," Mr. Whalen, who toured the plant in mid-September, said in his ad.

Last week, a U.S. Chamber of Commerce team canvassed the district and blanketed it with mailings touting Mr. Whalen's free-trade credentials. But chamber strategist Doug Loon acknowledges the race is tight and frets about the effect on trade policy if Mr. Braley wins. The seat "is clearly in jeopardy," he says.

Politics Gone Mild For Investors The Prospect Of Shift In Congress Doesn't Carry Much Of A Threat; Popular Theory: 'Gridlock Is Good' By CHRISTOPHER CONKEY (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The prospect of big losses for business-friendly Republicans in tomorrow's midterm elections is eliciting more shrugs than fears on Wall Street.

At first blush, this seems strange. A Democratic triumph that included winning one or both houses of Congress could undermine Republican economic policies such as tax cuts and deregulation that Wall Street tends to favor.

Amid the drumbeat of scandals and discouraging news from Iraq, futures traders in the Iowa Electronic Markets have raised the likelihood that Republicans will lose control of the House of Representatives to nearly 80% from 40% six months ago. The Iowa markets indicate that the Republicans ought to hold the Senate. That, plus a Republican president, may be one reason investors have taken a sanguine approach to the election.

As the Iowa markets have spent the past half year increasing their bet on a Democratic house, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has surged to a nearly 9% gain, even after last week's losses. "The equity markets are sort of shrugging it off," said Smith Granade, an associate economist who tracks election markets for Moody's economy.com. "We think they'll continue to do so, although there will probably be a little dip if Democrats actually win the House."

The first and most frequently cited rationale for Wall Street's nonchalance at the specter of a Democratic triumph is the old "gridlock is good" maxim. In other words, Democratic control of at least one chamber of Congress would mean divided government, making it less likely adverse legislation or excessive spending would pass.

This theory has holes, but it still carries great weight among many economists and investors. In the most recent WSJ.com survey of economists, 37% said the economy would perform best if Democrats win control of the House, versus 34% who said it would if Republicans maintain their grip. The most frequently cited reason was the potential for fiscal restraint at a time when the U.S. government is running large deficits.

William Niskanen, a former member of President Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers who now serves as chairman of the libertarian-leaning Cato Institute, said federal spending in the U.S. since 1949, after adjusting for inflation and population growth, has been roughly three times as low during periods of divided government as when one party runs the show.

That suggests gridlock could lift bond prices, as less government debt would tend to curtail the supply of bonds, but it might not help stocks. A recent study published in the Financial Analysts Journal that examined the monthly inflation-adjusted performance of 10 indexes found that stocks rose 6% per year during months of gridlock but soared 22% per year during months of one-party rule.

"The evidence doesn't back up the gridlock-is-good argument," said Tom Gallagher, senior managing director at ISI Group, a brokerage firm. It is more likely, Mr. Gallagher said, that investors seize on divided government as an easy outlet for their frustration with Washington. That enables them to return their focus to traditional drivers of stock prices like profits, economic growth and inflation. "People in the markets are inherently frustrated with politics. It's a way of dismissing politics and moving onto other things."

Another reason investors may be ignoring the potential reordering: history. Since 1946, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has almost always rallied in the fourth quarter following a midterm election. "I think it's just the markets wanting to get past the negative news flow of the campaigns and the uncertainty," said Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Financial Services Group.

The two exceptions to this rule were in the fourth quarter of 1978, when inflation was jumping, and 1994, right after Republicans swept into control of Congress.

In the year after midterm elections, the S&P 500 has posted a whopping 23.1% average annual gain since 1946, according to Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America Corp. By comparison, the S&P 500 has increased by an average of 7.8% in the year following a presidential election over the same period. Many economists said they expect the markets to be much more interested in 2008 when, as Mr. Kleintop said, "everything will be up for grabs."

The strong performance of stocks in the 12 months after midterm elections coincides with the third year of the presidential cycle. Many analysts said they expect a similar pattern this year, although gains may be muted given the tepid pace of economic growth. "We expect the markets to grind higher in the coming months, although robust gains are not likely given the effects of the U.S. housing recession on the U.S. economy and the fact that many indices are already priced for perfection," Mr. Quinlan wrote in a recent research note.

Futures markets aside, it is hard to predict the outcome of the midterm elections because it depends on the aggregate result of so many close races. Some observers just may not be convinced Democrats will gain the 15 seats they need to retake the House.

If Republicans pull off an upset and hold onto both houses, it could occasion a short-term bounce in stock markets. "Let's face it. The people that hold [equity] assets are Republicans, by and large," said Kurt Karl, chief U.S. economist at Swiss Re. "There might be some euphoria in the short term."

While stocks may be unscathed by Republican losses, many analysts caution that some could come under pressure. Drug stocks could suffer because Democratic leaders might push to have Medicare negotiate lower prices with pharmaceutical companies. Oil companies could face renewed calls for a "windfall profits" tax. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. could face pressure from efforts to boost unionization.

As Drug Prices Climb, Democrats Find Fault With Medicare Plan (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

For big drug companies, the new Medicare prescription benefit is proving to be a financial windfall larger than even the most optimistic Wall Street analysts had predicted.

But those gains may come back to haunt drug makers if Democrats take control of Congress this week.

Democrats, who have long charged that the drug industry is profiteering at taxpayers' expense, say they want to introduce legislation to revoke the law that bars Medicare from negotiating prices directly with drug makers like Pfizer for the medicines it buys.

Medicare now pays for drugs indirectly, through the private insurers that administer the prescription program — and those insurers typically pay higher prices than government agencies, like the Veterans Administration, that buy medicines directly from drug makers.

The government is expected to spend at least $31 billion this year on the drug benefit, which provides partial drug coverage for people over age 65, according to the federal agency that runs Medicare. Next year, the program is expected to cost almost $50 billion — almost 20 percent of overall American drug spending.

Democrats say that directly negotiating with drug makers could save taxpayers tens of billions of dollars annually, though some independent analysts say those projections are probably exaggerated.

Republicans, and the pharmaceutical industry, say that the benefit program is working and has cost less than initially projected. More than 38 million Medicare beneficiaries are enrolled in the program, and most say they are satisfied with their coverage, said Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services.

"It's very clearly working," Mr. Leavitt said. "We now have 90 percent of seniors in this country who have prescription drug coverage."

But Wall Street analysts say they have little doubt that the benefit program, called Part D, has helped several big drug makers report record profits and exceed earnings forecasts made earlier in the year.

DOJ_NMG_0091275

Companies have raised prices on many top-selling medicines by 6 percent or more this year, double the overall inflation rate. In some cases, drug makers have received price increases of as much as 20 percent for medicines that the government was already buying for people covered under the Medicaid program for the indigent. Medicare also pays more than the Veterans Administration, which runs its own benefit program.

"Part D was a good thing for almost everybody," said Les Funtleyder, an industry analyst at Miller Tabak, a research firm in New York.

Drug makers have tried to play down their gains from the program because they do not want to be seen as profiteering in an election year, Mr. Funtleyder said. "You don't want to draw too much attention to how good it's been."

Democrats claim the government could save as much as $190 billion over the next 10 years if it negotiated directly. Those savings could help shrink the "doughnut hole," the gap in Part D coverage that forces many beneficiaries to pay about $3,000 a year for drugs, said Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader in the House.

"What we're planning to do is give Medicare a chance to negotiate prices, and we'd use some of the savings to close the doughnut hole," Mr. Daly said.

Republicans say the savings estimates offered by the Democrats are vastly inflated. They note that Medicare has already cut its 10-year projection of the program's cost by $117 billion, though the program is still expected to cost taxpayers $516 billion over the next decade. Republicans also note that, in independent surveys, most seniors say they are happy with the benefit.

"The competitive marketplace has saved much more money than anyone has ever anticipated," said Leslie Norwalk, the deputy commissioner of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Ken Johnson, senior vice president at Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the main lobbying group for drug makers, said that allowing Medicare to negotiate directly would be unfair because the government had too much market power.

"The government doesn't negotiate prices — it dictates prices," Mr. Johnson said.

Also, the Veterans Administration and Medicare plans are not directly comparable, he said, because the average Medicare drug plan covers 4,300 medicines, while the V.A. covers only 1,300.

The structure of Part D is complex. Medicare does not directly provide coverage. Instead it subsidizes plans offered by private insurers. Insurers negotiate prices with drug makers and create menus of different plans, some with high premiums and broad drug coverage and others that offer basic coverage at low premiums. All plans have to follow certain basic rules, like offering at least two medicines in every drug category.

Medicare then calculates the cost of the average plan and pays every insurer a subsidy of about 75 percent of that cost. Beneficiaries cover the rest, with the amount they pay depending on what plan they choose.

For example, if the average plan costs $100 a month, Medicare will pay all plans a $75 subsidy for everyone who enrolls, and a person who enrolls in the average plan will pay $25. In most states, beneficiaries can choose from among 40 to 60 plans, Ms. Norwalk said.

Part D has raised profits for drug makers both by increasing the prices they receive and by encouraging beneficiaries to fill prescriptions they might otherwise have been unable to afford, analysts say.

The biggest gains have gone to companies that make drugs widely used by the Medicaid program, which covers the indigent. Poor people over 65, known as "dual eligibles," previously received drugs through Medicaid.

Drug makers were legally required to give Medicaid a discount of at least 15 percent, and sometimes significantly more, from their list prices. Now Medicaid recipients over 65 are covered through the Part D program, which does not require the same discounts. As a result, drug makers are being paid as much as 20 percent more for the same drugs that they had already been providing to recipients under the Medicaid program.

The biggest gainer, analysts say, is Eli Lilly, which makes Zyprexa. Zyprexa, used to treat schizophrenia and other severe mental illnesses, is widely prescribed to Medicaid patients.

Lilly, the sixth-largest American drug maker, reported two weeks ago that its third-quarter sales had risen 7 percent, to $3.9 billion, and its profits were up 10 percent, to $874 million, compared with 2005. According to Lilly's published review of the quarter, the sales gains resulted almost entirely from Lilly's prices rising 11 percent in the United States, while actually falling in Europe and Japan.

"We are experiencing a one-time sales benefit resulting from a shift of certain low-income patients from Medicaid to Medicare," a company spokeswoman, Terra Fox, wrote in an e-mail response to questions about Part D. Ms. Fox declined to quantify how much Lilly had gained from the shift.

But Lilly is hardly alone in benefiting. Pfizer, the world's largest drug maker, said its sales soared 14 percent in the United States in the third quarter, while rising only 3 percent internationally. Over all, Pfizer said its profits more than doubled, to $3.4 billion from $1.6 billion, though part of the difference came from high one-time charges last year.

Pfizer did not disclose how much of the sales growth came from price increases and how much from new prescriptions, but earlier this year Pfizer raised the list prices of some of its biggest drugs by 5.5 percent or more, well above the inflation rate.

Tony Butler, an analyst at Lehman Brothers, said both volume growth and price increases had driven the industry's rising profits. But he said he did not expect major changes in the Part D plan even if the Democrats took over Congress, since President Bush would probably not sign any legislation that would allow Medicare to negotiate prices directly.

"It's our belief that the White House will veto it," he said.

US Joblessness Ebbs To Rare Historical Low (CSM)

By Ron Scherer And Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 6, 2006

NEW YORK AND BOSTON

It is not often that the nation's unemployment rate sinks to 4.4 percent.

It did in 2001, when dotcom entrepreneurs were still writing checks that didn't bounce. Jobs were also plentiful in the early 1970s, when the nation was at war in Vietnam. Ditto for 1957, when the economy had fewer women, teenagers, and minorities in the workplace.

Now, add October 2006 to the list.

In the last major economic report before Tuesday's showdown at the ballot box, the Labor Department says the unemployment rate is now at that level, down from 4.6 percent in September. It is a piece of good news for an embattled president and suggests the economy is stronger than many recent estimates. The downside is that the Federal Reserve, which has not raised interest rates in its past three meetings, may have to think about a rate increase early next year - which would keep inflation in check but could cause unemployment to rise.

"By its first meeting in 2007, the Fed will have to give active consideration to raising interest rates," says Lyle Gramley, a former Fed governor who is now a consulting economist at Schwab Washington Research Group. "The odds are that rates are going up, not down."

In the past, the Federal Reserve has stomped on the monetary brakes - pushing the economy into a recession - when the unemployment rate has dropped this low. But this time, Mr. Gramley says, the financial backdrop is different: Long-term interest rates are at the same level as June 2004, the stock market is up 15 percent, and the dollar is down 5 percent.

"Normally, when the Fed is raising short-term rates, you expect the stock market to weaken and the dollar to rise. [But current] financial conditions are still quite accommodative, and as a result [raising interest rates] is not likely to drive the economy into a recession." Dip in productivity

The latest economic numbers, while positive for workers, may indicate a shift is taking place in the economy, says Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks in Atlanta. "More people are working, but we produced less. This suggests productivity is no longer a dominant force," he says. "Strong productivity is good for sustainability."

The buoyant job market is not a surprise to employment specialists. At Spherion, a staffing company based in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., demand remains strong in accounting, information technology, the legal field, sales, and marketing. "One of the exceptions is interest-sensitive areas like mortgage banking," says Brendan Courtney, senior vice president.

Layoffs normally increase at this time of year, says John Challenger of the Chicago outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas. But layoffs last month were down 15 percent compared with a year ago and 30 percent lower than September's rate. "It indicates the labor market is strong now."

DOJ_NMG_0091277

One reason the unemployment rate has fallen so low is an increase in the number of self-employed people, according to Mr. Challenger. "The economy has really changed. People want to work for themselves."

One such person is Moira Madell of Madell Consulting in Chicago. Ms. Madell, who worked for a benefits consulting firm for nine years, used to consider her human-relations consulting job temporary. But now, she says, it allows her the flexibility to raise a family. "It's very satisfying, a nice fit for me."

Many low-skilled workers are finding many job openings, but very few that pay well or offer decent benefits, says Barney Oursler, co-director of the Mon Valley Unemployed Committee in Homestead, Pa.

While the boom in the healthcare industry has given new hope to some low-skilled workers, Mr. Oursler warns them that without training they'll wind up changing bedpans for about the same pay as working at the local Target. Two years of training are typically needed for higher-paid healthcare work.

In fact, when Betty Mesler of Fairchance, Pa., was laid off last year from a nearby Sony television factory, she knew right away that she needed to retrain. Retail jobs wouldn't pay enough, and as for factory work, it wasn't realistic.

"I knew that, especially in our area that's so depressed, factory work was just not ever going to be an option, and I knew that the healthcare field is a lot more stable," she says.

She enrolled in a 14-month course to train as a surgical technician. She expects starting pay to be $11 to $14 an hour - not as much as Sony paid, but over time, a decent wage. "Working in a factory was fine, but you don't really have a skill," says Ms. Mesler. 15,000 applications for 300 jobs

Even in hotter economic regions like the South, there's still a scrum for jobs. When Toyota announced it would hire 300 new assembly-line jobs at its Huntsville, Ala., plant in 2002, the company received 30,000 requests for applications. Some 15,000 people ended up applying. In the past 12 months, the company has hired an additional 350 workers from a pool of 10,000 applicants in an area with an unemployment rate of about 3.5 percent.

"We found a lot of people wanting to improve their standard of living, or wanting to find a job that they know is stable and going to be here for the long haul," says Stephanie Deemer, spokeswoman at the Alabama facility.

Some parts of the country are actually experiencing labor shortages. In Fargo, N.D., which has the lowest unemployment rate in the nation at less than 2 percent, some local businesses are having trouble keeping workers on the production floor because they're job-hopping for signing bonuses, says Adrienne Olson at the local Chamber of Commerce.

Among workers with college degrees, the unemployment rate in October is at 1.9 percent. Arizona State University in Tempe has moved away from recruiting fairs in favor of letting employers come on campus at short notice to try to hire from the 51,000-student pool. The boom both in Tempe and statewide has made it one of the best times for graduates in the past 10 years, says Ray Castillo, director of Career Services at ASU.

"It certainly is a much more positive experience than what it might have been a few years in the past," he says. "A lot of it has to do with where we are physically located. We're in a [location] where there is a lot of expanding."

The Fed's Confession (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said "never complain, never explain." So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004.

Speaking to bankers in New York, Mr. Fisher issued a mea maxima culpa that deserves wide attention: "In retrospect, the real fed funds rate turned out to be lower than what was deemed appropriate at the time and was held lower longer than it should have been." As the nearby chart shows, a Fed worried about possible "deflation" moved the overnight interest rate it charges banks in June 2003 to an extraordinarily low 1% and kept it there for another year.

Mr. Fisher blamed this mistake on "poor data" that underestimated inflation, leading "to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today, as anybody not from the former planet of Pluto knows, the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country." In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations.

Mr. Fisher was careful to say he was speaking only for himself. But we'd sure like to know what his Fed colleagues think of his argument -- not least current Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who was a Fed governor for much of that time and had been one of those fretting loudest about the risks of "deflation." We can only assume that former Chairman Alan Greenspan is also preparing a chapter on this era for his memoirs.

Readers of these columns will not be surprised to learn that we think Mr. Fisher is correct and deserves credit for his candor. But the real import of his remarks isn't 20-20 hindsight so much as a chance for the Fed, and much of the economic establishment, to rethink its inflation models. Mr. Fisher bluntly concedes that "most economic data are inherently backward looking, often to a disconcerting degree." Thus the data the Fed was watching in 2003 suggested that prices were falling even as they were beginning to rise.

But this lets the Fed off the hook a little too easily. Throughout this period, and especially into 2004, there was plenty of other "data" flashing yellow and then red about rising inflation. The dollar was weak, both against other major currencies and especially against gold, which began a price surge not seen since the 1970s. Commodity prices across the board -- notably oil -- also began a rise that to our mind couldn't be explained merely by an increase in relative global demand. And there were also rising price pressures in dollar-bloc countries overseas, notably in China.

The question for Fed governors is why they discounted this evidence of real-time rising prices. Instead, Mr. Fisher says they were watching their own alphabet-soup of price indexes, such as the CPI and PCE, all of which look through the rearview mirror. That's assuming they were even watching prices at all, rather than the job market or the "output gap," or other measures that are dubious guides for monetary policy. The best guide for maintaining stable prices is to watch actual prices, or what economists call a price rule.

To be fair to the Fed, its policy decisions in the wake of the stock-market collapse were stellar through 2002. And in the years since it has had plenty of company in chasing "poor data." Most Wall Street economists and Beltway politicians were only too happy to cheer on the Fed as it kept its foot on the money accelerator. Some of our supply-side friends also claimed to see no evidence of rising prices, even as home prices rose by double-digits year after year and second homes became investment plays. Inflations are always popular at the beginning, and this was no exception. * * *

Which brings us back to the present. The Fed did finally recognize that inflation was a problem, and the consequences of its own policy correction are now being felt in the economy, especially in housing. As Mr. Fisher conceded last week, the housing slump "is complicating the task of achieving our monetary objective of creating the conditions for sustainable non-inflationary growth." Translation: We may have to tighten money further to restore stable prices, but we're afraid we'll tank the economy if we do. This is the dilemma the Fed's easy-money mistake has made for itself, and for the rest of us.

The good news is that the economy entered this rough patch with considerable momentum that may yet avoid a Fed-induced recession. The incentives from the 2003 tax cuts remain in place and have helped to boost investment and corporate profits. As last Friday's blowout October jobs report showed, the labor market remains strong and wages are increasing. If we're lucky, rising incomes will keep consumers spending even if their home values decline. Also if we're lucky, Tuesday's election results will not produce a reversal on tax policy; if anything, we may need another tax cut in the next year or two if the Fed tightens further.

As for the Fed, our reading of history is that the sooner it acts to restore price stability, the better the prospects for long-run growth and prosperity.

Once Safe, Public Pensions Are Now Facing Cuts (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

After losing a leg in the line of duty, Dan Toneck, a San Diego police officer, spent nearly a year in rehabilitation before returning to work, doing his job for another five years with an artificial limb.

Mr. Toneck, 37, was granted a disability retirement last year after 16 years on the job. Some of his fellow officers wept as he left headquarters for the last time.

Then, 10 months later, the impossible happened. San Diego cut his pension by about 10 percent, along with those of about 180 other disabled city retirees. “They’re trying to pay the bills on the backs of the employees,” Mr. Toneck said.

Across the country, government workers’ pensions are protected by guarantees even stouter than those on pensions in the private sector. The legal promises, often backed up by union contracts, cover more than 15 million people.

Years of supporting court interpretations have enshrined the view that once a public employee has earned a pension, no one can take it away. Even during New York City’s fiscal crisis 30 years ago, no existing pension promises were reduced.

But now a number of state and local governments are quietly challenging those guarantees. Financially troubled San Diego is the highest-profile example, but a handful of states, cities and smaller government bodies have also found ways to scale back existing promises and even shrink some current payments.

While still only scattered cases, these examples may be an early warning sign of what could be coming elsewhere. As local officials take stock of unexpectedly large obligations to retired public workers, some are starting to question whether service cuts, sales of government property and politically acceptable tax increases can ever go far enough to bring things into balance.

“This is a real-life problem,” said Paul S. Maco, a partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins who advises municipalities on the disclosure of these obligations.

DOJ_NMG_0091279

Mr. Toneck said that years ago, while he was still on the police force, he saw signs that San Diego was cutting corners. He recalled having to go to Kmart to buy jumper cables for his squad car. He was not surprised to learn the city had shortchanged the municipal pension fund. But he never dreamed his pension could be reduced.

"It was guaranteed, written in stone — when I retire, I make this much and they're not going to be able to touch that," he said.

His pension was set at about $35,000 a year. But last May, he received a letter saying he would start getting about $31,000 instead.

He and the others on disability pensions fell victim to an ambiguously written pension statute that lawyers noticed while combing through San Diego's financial records in the wake of a pension scandal. But there do not have to be accusations of wrongdoing for a government to start looking into whether its obligations to retirees can be reduced.

Some places, including Oregon, Rhode Island, Milwaukee County and several cities and towns in Texas, have already cut public workers' pensions on the basic argument that their pension funds had gone disastrously out of balance. Whether because of investment losses, faulty calculations or other factors, these places have declared that they can no longer sustain a level of benefits that had looked affordable just a few years ago.

Beyond the sheer political difficulty of removing an existing benefit, an array of legal guarantees — some in statutes, some in state constitutions, some in city charters — were supposed to prevent such reversals. But lawyers have been finding chinks in the armor.

In Texas, the pension guarantee in the state constitution has an unusual clause, giving towns and cities the chance to hold referendums on whether to opt out.

Voters in Houston made that choice after learning that pension sweeteners issued there in 2001 were allowing some people to retire in their 40s. Others, who participated in a special program that let them simultaneously work and collect pension money in high-interest accounts, got an even better deal, sometimes walking away with one-time payments of a million dollars or more on top of their regular pensions. The city raised the eligibility requirements for retirement and cut some of the biggest sweeteners.

Oregon rolled back $6 billion worth of public pensions in 2003, but the cuts have been snarled in legal challenges. In October, a federal appellate panel affirmed that Oregon could stop paying a guaranteed rate of 8 percent a year to participants with individual accounts. But another measure, freezing some retirees' cost-of-living adjustments, is still unresolved.

"Retirees have been in a state of turmoil," said Gregory A. Hartman, a Portland lawyer representing some of them. "They don't know what their rights are. They don't know what they're entitled to."

In Rhode Island, state workers' pensions take an unusually long time to vest, so the legislature was able to cut the planned pensions of everyone with fewer than 10 years of service, about 11,300 people.

In Wisconsin, Milwaukee County has tried to avoid legal battles by working with its eight public employees' unions after a pension scandal broke in 2001. A recall election was held and angry voters ousted seven county supervisors from office after learning they had jacked up pensions, including their own.

"This was a totally corrupt, venal deal by a bunch of politicians and their friends who figured out how to loot the treasury," said Roger H. Quindel, a county supervisor.

Even so, Milwaukee County has been able to make only marginal trims so far. Money is draining out of the pension fund so fast that the county has been contemplating the sale of some parks and an airport, along with cuts in government services. And it plans to ask for pension cuts when its labor contracts come up for renegotiation in January.

"We won't survive if we don't," Mr. Quindel said.

Wisconsin's state constitution does not specifically protect public pensions, but the county's lawyers have warned that a constitutional protection of property rights may cover pensions. The supervisors asked whether the county could shed some of its pension obligations by declaring bankruptcy, as airlines, steel companies and others have sometimes done. The lawyers said no.

In the private sector, a uniform federal pension law bars companies from reducing pensions that employees have already earned. Since pensions are built up over time, this means that if a company freezes or reduces the growth of benefits at some point, workers will earn smaller benefits going forward, but they cannot be stripped of anything they earned before the change. The only way around that rule today requires a bankruptcy judge to approve a default.

In the public sector, the protections often go further. About half of the 50 states have constitutional or statutory guarantees, said Robert D. Klausner, a lawyer in Plantation, Fla., who represents state and municipal pension plans in more than 20 states. "The day you're hired, your benefits are locked in at a minimum level," he said. If a government wants to cut pensions, it cannot apply the cuts to people already in the work force, as a corporation can. It can only apply them to new hires, he said.

Governments are also studying the guarantees on retiree health benefits because of a new accounting rule that is now requiring them to calculate, for the first time, the total value of the health benefits they have promised to retirees.

The numbers now being disclosed are daunting. Mercer Human Resource Consulting estimates that when all the calculations are done, the nation's states and cities will find they have promised a total of about $1.4 trillion, said Derek Guyton, a senior consultant.

Little, if any, money has been set aside to fulfill these obligations.

Mr. Maco, the Vinson & Elkins lawyer, said he feared that many towns and cities, particularly in places like upstate New York and along the Great Lakes, were about to discover that years of factory closings and job losses had eroded their tax bases so much that they had no realistic way to pay their full bills.

"The steel industry can shut down and close its plants, but that's hard for local governments," Mr. Maco said. After industries move away, the retired teachers and firefighters will still be there.

Pension funds can normally operate for many years with a shortfall, because they have investments to call upon and pensions are paid out slowly. But health claims, with little or no money set aside to pay them, can come due right away.

Some government agencies, like Chicago's municipal bus and rail authority, have set up a potentially explosive situation by arranging their retiree health claims to be paid directly out of their pension funds. "The taxpayers need to understand the seriousness of our situation," said Laurence Msall, president of the Civic Federation, a nonpartisan research group in Chicago. "It's not a far-off crisis."

San Diego's municipal pension fund was also responsible for retiree health care. But when the city's pension scandal broke, officials separated the health obligations.

"Now we're looking at a $3.1 billion debt, and $1.4 billion is health and $1.7 billion is pension," said Michael Aguirre, the city's independent attorney.

He is now in court, leading an unusually aggressive initiative to cut the city's pension obligations, arguing that benefits granted in 1996 and 2002 were issued illegally and must be annulled.

California law protects public pensions, but Mr. Aguirre is arguing that those protections conflict with other laws that govern the actions of public officials, which he says San Diego pension trustees violated. If the court agrees with him, the benefits owed to San Diego's roughly 15,000 city workers and retirees could go back to the level before the 1996 increase — a total reduction of some $500 million to $700 million.

Mr. Toneck, the disabled San Diego police officer, is not directly affected by Mr. Aguirre's case. He has petitioned the San Diego city council to reverse the cut in his pension, arguing that workers disabled on the job are the last people who should pay for a mistake that was caused by an ambiguity in the law.

The council has referred his petition to Mr. Aguirre, who is busy with the broader case.

Meanwhile, Mr. Aguirre said San Diego still had not developed a plan for paying all of its obligations, whatever the courts ultimately rule. He said he might ultimately have to try bankruptcy court.

"There's no good option," he said. "It's only painful."

Houston Missed The Real-Estate Boom Of East And West Coasts, But Now It's Payback Time (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

HOUSTON -- This sprawling city missed the real-estate boom that sent home prices soaring on the East and West coasts. Now, with much of the nation's housing market in retreat, it has yet to feel even a tremor.

In September, local sales of single-family homes and condominiums were up 17.7% from a year earlier, logging their 32nd straight month of increase, according to the Houston Association of Realtors. The median price of an existing single-family home: $143,400, up 3%.

By contrast, nationwide sales of residential real estate fell 14.2% in September, according to the National Association of Realtors. Home prices nationally were down 2.2%, retreating in such former hot spots such as Washington, Boston and San Francisco. The national median sales price for September for existing single-family homes was $219,800, according to the Houston Association of Realtors.

Houston's gains are nothing like those seen in the past decade in the Northeast and California, but that may be the secret to Houston's success and the reason a bubble is unlikely to develop here. Land here is abundant, and the city has some of the least-restrictive land-use and construction rules in the nation. Those factors help supply to keep pace with demand and keep prices within reach of a broad range of potential buyers.

"We haven't had a bad year in the past decade," says Lorraine Abercrombie, chairwoman of the local Realtors group and marketing director for Greenwood King Properties.

Houston's model is in stark contrast to cities such as Boston and San Francisco, which have strict zoning, exacting building codes and laws governing historical preservation. Some economists, including Edward Glaeser of Harvard University, say excessive regulation in such cities has slowed construction to the point where demand has outstripped supply, fueling a run-up in home prices.

In the once-sizzling markets where home prices are falling, housing costs are double, triple or even quadruple those of Houston. The danger, says Dr. Glaeser, is such places have priced out today's highly skilled "knowledge workers," forcing them to live in a more affordable locale where their contribution to the economy might not be as great. "These are places where only the elite can live," Dr. Glaeser says.

Not so Houston. Confined by neither oceans nor mountains, the Houston metropolitan area has plenty of room to spread out. What is more, the city has no zoning, weak historical-preservation rules and few tools to preserve open space.

The result is unfettered growth. For that, too, there is a price to be paid.

Houston lacks the historical charm of a city such as Boston and the natural beauty of a place such as San Francisco. In recent years an increasing number of Houston residents have warned that the city's affinity for strip malls, freeways and endless subdivisions may be putting it at a disadvantage in attracting talented workers.

Even so, Houston's economy is humming, thanks in part to a sustained boom in oil and gas and the city's burgeoning medical industry, which attracts patients from all over the world. In addition, the Hurricane Katrina evacuation in 2005 brought tens of thousands of refugees here, pushing up retail sales and lowering apartment-vacancy rates. Most of the Katrina refugees weren't wealthy enough to buy homes, however.

The Houston metropolitan area has added 420,000 jobs since 1995, according to the Greater Houston Partnership while the 10-county metropolitan statistical area topped 5.2 million people in July 2005, up about 11% from the 2000 Census count, according to the Texas State Data Center.

Affordable housing has played a significant role. James Gaines, an economist at the Texas A&M University's Real Estate Center, says a Houston developer can be "cutting roads and building houses" within a year of buying 500 acres. The same project would take a developer in Florida three years and as many as eight years in California, substantially pushing up the price, says Dr. Gaines.

The Houston Association of Realtors reported total property sales -- everything from single-family homes to country homes to lots listed on the Multiple Listing Service -- numbered 7,163 in September, up 17.8% from a year earlier. Sales of new and existing single family homes were up 19.3% to 5,954. The pace of home sales is also picking up. The trade group says the area has a 5.5-month supply of unsold homes, down slightly from August.

The national outlook isn't so bright, with some economists forecasting that sales of new homes are unlikely to start rising again before early 2008. A joint survey by consulting firm Global Insight and Cleveland bank holding company National City Corp. showed that 67 metropolitan areas experienced price declines in the second quarter this year, and not just those that enjoyed the boom. The Midwest, for example, showed the highest concentration of falling prices.

The survey also showed slower home-price increases nationally in the past year, with the most rapid slowdown coming in high-price markets such as California, Florida and the Northeast corridor. Nearly 70% of the 317 metropolitan areas surveyed showed a decline in appreciation during the period.

Texas had six markets where home prices rose at a rate of between 6% and 12% and another nine markets where prices increased 12% or more, the survey showed. Richard J. Dekaser, chief economist for National City, says, "It's like revenge of the nerds."

A Program That Works (WT)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

While there are differences in the priorities people assign to the different aspects of immigration reform, nearly everyone agrees that there are three parts to really solving our immigration problems: security, economic participation and civic integration.

By authorizing a more secure fence along some of the most frequently trespassed parts of our border, Congress made a first step on the security issue. But, without some way of monitoring immigrants within the country, this is only a partial answer to the security issue. Moreover, economic participation and civic integration remain untouched.

On their return, members of Congress have the opportunity to expand and improve a relatively small but highly successful part of our immigration policy that meets all three challenges. The H1-B visa program allows companies to bring in workers from overseas who possess skills that are not available domestically. The main users of the program are technology and health-care companies, although a number of highly skilled people in finance also work here under this program.

The H1-B program meets all three parts of the immigration policy challenge. First, it provides security within the country. The companies hiring these workers have already gone through a vetting process sufficient to justify their employment. Moreover, the employer naturally has a detailed and working knowledge of the whereabouts and day-to-day activities of the people involved.

Second, the program obviously involves economic participation by the immigrant. In many cases, particularly in technology, America has the choice between allowing these immigrants to work in America for American companies, or forcing our country and its businesses to compete with these workers in their homeland. We can either import these workers and export at least a part of their production or import the goods that they will produce if they remain at home.

Moreover, these workers are overwhelmingly net contributors to the economy and to the government's fiscal position. While a low skilled worker earning about $8.50 an hour will receive Social Security benefits $65,000 greater than the taxes paid, the great majority of H1-B workers will contribute at least as much in taxes as they ultimately receive in benefits. So, the economic participation of H1-B workers is an unambiguous gain for America.

Finally, there is the issue of civic participation. In the broad scheme of things, this must start with an immigrant having appropriate documentation. It should include the full panoply of rights and responsibilities that come with residing in America, and in some instances, it might end with citizenship. Congress wrestled with this issue earlier this year. But, the H1-B visa program is a working model of an approach to immigration that provides an opportunity for civic integration for those who participate.

Ideally, the H1-B visa program could be a model for broader immigration reform. But, in the meantime, Congress should extend and enlarge the program enough to meet the current and pressing needs of our economy for these workers. The current H1-B quota is full through the end of the current fiscal year, or until October 2007. Few government programs work this well, particularly regardingimmigration. When they come along, Congress should take full advantage of them.

Don't Abort Precedence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 6, 2006

ON WEDNESDAY, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. If law and not politics guide the justices, they will declare this blanket ban unconstitutional.

Opponents call this procedure, performed in the second or third trimester, "partial-birth abortion." Neutral commentators use the term "dilation and extraction." Whatever you call it, the procedure is extraordinarily rare and distasteful even to many supporters of abortion rights. It involves a physician partially extracting a fetus from the uterus into the birth canal, where he then collapses the skull by suctioning its contents.

By large majorities in both houses, Congress banned this procedure in 2003. That might have been an acceptable exercise of congressional power if the legislation had also contained an exception to protect the mother's health, a concern that the Supreme Court emphasized as early as 1973 in its landmark Roe vs. Wade decision.

Yet Congress rejected any exceptions even though the Supreme Court in 2000 had struck down a Nebraska partial-birth law precisely because it lacked one.

Given the high court's insistence on a health exception, why would the bill's supporters think that the justices might sustain a similar federal statute? One answer is that Congress "did the math." The decision in the Nebraska case was 5 to 4, so supporters gambled that one or more justices in that majority would have left the court by the time the new law came before it.

Indeed, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in the majority in the Nebraska case, retired and has been replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. If Alito were to vote to uphold the federal partial-birth ban, the deciding vote might be cast by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. His predecessor, the late William H. Rehnquist, dissented in the Nebraska case, as he had done in a string of abortion rulings going back to Roe vs. Wade.

Like Alito, the chief justice is a conservative who is widely assumed to believe that Roe vs. Wade was wrongly decided. But, as Roberts noted during his Senate confirmation hearings, Roe not only remains on the books but has been reaffirmed in the court's 1992 Casey vs. Planned Parenthood ruling. "It is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent," Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Reversing its 2000 decision on partial-birth laws wouldn't cause the same jolt as repudiating Roe or Casey. But it would still upend a precedent and interfere with the settled expectations of women and doctors alike about the availability of this procedure as a medical last resort.

College Sports Get A Warning (NYT)

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus.

The letter showed that Congress has noticed the recruiting violations and the athletes who sometimes remain eligible to play without progressing or by attending bogus classes. It also implied that the N.C.A.A. might eventually lose its tax exemptions unless it forces athletic departments to conform more closely to an educational mission.

The N.C.A.A. president, Myles Brand, defended the group's reform effort and reaffirmed his commitment to holding athletic programs to higher standards. But an N.C.A.A. report released last week touches on some of the same issues cited in the blistering letter from Congress. The problem is that athletic departments have more influence on university affairs than they should. They often use that influence to undermine the institutional mission.

Run by celebrity coaches who can earn more than $1 million a year — and supported by adoring fans, boosters and trustees — the campus sports machines easily overshadow the college faculties and presidents, some of whom seem frankly fearful of speaking up about abuses. The athletic departments derive much of their power from the widespread but mistaken belief that they pay their own way, and even earn money for their universities, through television revenues and other sources.

The truth, laid out in recent reports, is quite to the contrary. Only a handful of high-end college sports programs earn more than they spend. Among the rest, many struggle to balance their budgets and can do so only through subsidies from their universities. Sports budgets are growing two to three times faster than higher education as a whole.

The N.C.A.A. report calls on college presidents and administrators to rein in the campus sports machines and dial back spending. But the facts suggest that many college administrations have been outflanked by athletic departments that are deeply invested in the bad old ways. If that doesn't change, the N.C.A.A. can expect more scrutiny from Congress.

Iran Says It's Open To Talks With U.S. (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 6, 2006

Iran said Sunday it was open to negotiations with the United States on Iraq and other regional issues but hinted it would not drop its refusal to talk about its contentious nuclear program.

As the U.N. Security Council geared up for a protracted debate on sanctioning Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran praised Russia for its "softer" stance on the issue.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Iran would consider talks with the U.S. over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested. He would not elaborate, and there was no immediate response from the United States on the offer.

"If there is any official request about regional issues, we are ready to review it," Hosseini told reporters.

However, he said Iran would not change its position regarding bilateral relations with the U.S., suggesting Tehran would refuse to talk about the nuclear issue. The U.S. has demanded Iran stop enriching uranium — a key step in the manufacture of nuclear weapons — as a precondition to talks about its disputed program.

The United States said in May it wanted to hold direct talks with Iran about its neighbor Iraq — which would have been the most public exchanges by the countries in years.

Iran agreed, and U.S. and Iranian officials said at the time that the talks would focus on the situation in Iraq, not on broader subjects such as Iran's nuclear program.

However, Iran then changed its mind, with Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki rejecting the negotiation on grounds that Americans had raised "other issues" and had tried to use the decision to hold the talks as propaganda.

Iran's statement on Sunday seemed to indicate the government was once again willing to consider the idea of direct talks with the U.S. over Iraq, which is veering ever closer to civil war. U.S. officials have long accused Iran of interfering in neighboring Iraq since the overthrow of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has also said the White House believes Tehran has a role to play in stabilizing Iraq, whose government is dominated by Shiite Muslims like Iran's.

Some Western experts believe Iran is genuinely worried about civil conflict in Iraq and its potential to spill over, although others say Iranian hardliners may have an interest in causing at least some turmoil.

Iranian leaders are believed to have close links to some Iraqi leaders and clerics.

DOJ_NMG_0091284

Sunday's announcement came a few hours after an Iraqi court sentenced Saddam Hussein to death by hanging for crimes against humanity in a mass killing of Iraqi Shiites in 1982.

It also came one day after thousands of Iranians celebrated the 27th anniversary of the U.S. embassy takeover by militant students in Tehran, when 52 Americans were held hostage for over a year.

The U.S., which broke off diplomatic relations with Iran over the embassy takeover, suspects Iran's uranium enrichment program is a front for developing weapons. Tehran denies the accusations and says its program is for peaceful purposes.

Tehran state-run radio said Sunday the International Atomic Energy Agency officials inspected Iran's nuclear facilities in Isfahan and Natanz including a new enrichment cascade.

The inspection was the first since Tehran announced it had successfully stepped up its uranium enrichment activities in October.

Iran has repeatedly rejected a package of incentives offered by six world powers because it required it to freeze uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for atomic power or material for a nuclear warhead.

Hosseini said the U.N. Security Council's push to impose sanctions on Tehran to punish it for continuing enrichment would delay any possible compromise.

"Back to negotiation is the best amendment. Nothing else will be effective and will bear desirable result," he said. "Russia clearly has announced that they did not support the current draft."

The five veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council have so far failed to agree on a resolution imposing sanctions, and negotiations could be long and difficult.

Russia's foreign minister said Saturday that Moscow would only support sanctions against Iran if they are limited in time and spell out a clear mechanism for lifting them.

"Russia's stance is better than other ... countries. They have a softer policy. Since the beginning, their stance was different," Hosseini said.

The European draft resolution would order all countries to cease supplying material or technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs. It would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

Russia and China, which both have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse last month of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks. The United States, meanwhile, has said the European draft is too lenient.

Iran Would Consider New US Request For Iraq Talks (AFP)

By Hiedeh Farmani

AFP, November 6, 2006

Iran has said it was ready to consider requests from its arch-enemy the United States to hold unprecedented talks over Iraq, even though a similar move came to nothing earlier this year.

"If we receive an official request, we are ready to examine it," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters Sunday.

Any such contact would mark a break in a near three-decade pause in open bilateral contacts between US and Iranian officials following the country's 1979 Islamic revolution.

In March this year Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador in Baghdad, made an offer to Tehran to hold talks on quelling the deadly unrest that has been plaguing Iraq since the US-led invasion in 2003.

Emphasising that any such contacts would have no consequence for bilateral relations frozen since 1980, Khalilzad said at the time he was looking to encourage Iran to play a positive role in Iraq and steer clear of interference.

The United States, which accuses Iran of sponsoring terrorism and seeking to manufacture a nuclear bomb, insisted that any such talks would be limited solely to the situation in Iraq.

Despite initial expressions of willingness from Iranian officials, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad rejected that overture, saying that US "behaviour" was not good.

But Hosseini said on Sunday the door remained open for talks.

"At the current time, some American and Iraqi officials have raised the question of a dialogue. If we receive such a request we are ready to examine it again."

Hosseini said that "as far as bilateral relations is concerned, the position of Iran has not changed", maintaining Tehran's refusal to consider diplomatic relations if the US stance towards the Islamic republic does not change.

"We have clearly said that we were ready to examine a request for dialogue on regional issues," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0091285

It remains to be seen whether the United States is itself willing to renew the offer, with the verbal war of words between Washington and Tehran as vehement as ever and tension rising over the Iranian nuclear programme.

But Hosseini's comments also come at a time when the US is mired in mounting sectarian bloodshed and deadly attacks on its troops in Iraq, prompting calls for a rapid about-turn in its strategy.

According to newspaper reports, a special panel on Iraq created by the US Congress and led by former secretary of state James Baker is expected to recommend that President George W. Bush bring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting.

Iran has emerged as a major ally of the Shiite-dominated government in Iraq following the fall of Saddam Hussein, and Washington remains deeply suspicious of the Islamic republic's influence in the country.

It accuses Iran of providing assistance to militant groups and interfering in Iraq, charges Tehran denies.

The United States cut diplomatic ties with Iran as a result of the seizure by Islamic radicals of the US embassy in Tehran on November 4, 1979, shortly after the Islamic revolution that toppled the US-backed Shah.

Russia Asks Europe To Revise Its Plan For Iran Sanctions (AFP-Y)

By Herve Couturier

AFP, November 6, 2006

Western countries that want to punish Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment are again facing reluctance on the part of Russia and China to grant support, with Moscow demanding a softening of a draft UN resolution.

More than two months after the UN-imposed deadline of August 31 expired, it is still not possible to say when the UN Security Council will act.

The United States is pushing for quick sanctions. But according to many diplomats, the negotiations promise to be long and difficult.

China and Russia are reluctant to impose strict penalties on Iran, with which they maintain important economic and commercial ties.

On Friday, Moscow proposed changes to a European draft resolution that the US Ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, called substantial during an informal meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council (China, the United States, France, Britain, Russia) and Germany.

Consequently, according to Bolton, the United States would also like to propose changes, and ambassadors will have to consult their respective capitals during the weekend to be able to resume discussions probably next week.

The draft, drawn by Europeans in cooperation with the United States, calls for economic and commercial sanctions against Iran.

But it has been rejected by Russia in his initial form.

Russian Foreign Minister Serguei Lavrov, said in Brussels Friday that Moscow was ready to take reasonable measures against Iran, but made clear that Russia believed the European proposal had gone too far.

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya, meanwhile, pointed out that penalties proposed by the Europeans were a little too hard.

They would risk putting the Iranians' backs against the wall, he warned, adding that Beijing supported the Russians.

His Russian counterpart, Vitaly Churkin, also said that the purpose of any future Security Council action was to encourage Iran to come back to the negotiating table, not to turn it away from negotiations.

He reminded that the UN resolution must leave the open door to future discussions with the Iranians.

Churkin also expressed his opposition to any mention in the resolution of Russia's help to Iran to build a civilian nuclear power plan in Bushehr.

Bushehr has nothing to do with concerns about nuclear proliferation because it is a peaceful nuclear power plant, he said.

The initial version of the resolution mentioned the plant, but only to point out that it will remain outsided the scope of proposed sanctions.

According to a diplomatic source, Moscow is equally opposed to penalties against Iranian individuals such as a ban on travel and a freeze of financial assets abroad.

Russia would be ready to accept an embargo only on "sensitive" equipment while the current draft calls for an ban on all equipment that could be used for nuclear and ballistic missile programs in Iran, as well as on all technical or financial assistance linked to these programs.

Meanwhile, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed optimism Friday about chanced to reach a compromise.

I think that in the last analysis they will not block us, she told a radio station. We will have a resolution that will punish Iran, even though it may not be as strong as we would have wanted it to be.

Behind China's Stance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough And Neil King JR.

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

BEIJING -- Shortly after North Korea conducted its first nuclear-weapons test last month, regulators here quietly told China's banks to suspend their dealings with the nation -- a move that has largely severed Pyongyang's most important link to the world financial system.

Beijing made no public announcement. Still, the message to North Korea was clear: China, long averse to imposing any kind of economic sanctions, was willing to go beyond penalties imposed by the United Nations to force North Korea to back down.

The banking measure and other pressure applied by Beijing -- including a cut in oil exports to North Korea and two votes at the U.N. in favor of economic sanctions against the Pyongyang regime -- are widely credited with getting North Korea to agree to return to Chinese-led talks aimed at dismantling its nuclear-arms programs.

China's unusual, if quiet, activism may signal a significant change in its view of the world and its approach to foreign policy since it formally wired itself into the global economy five years ago by joining the World Trade Organization.

Beijing's long-held policy of not interfering in the "internal affairs" of other nations appears to be giving way to a broader definition of its national interests -- one that goes beyond satisfying its fast-growing appetite for oil and other raw materials. China also is showing a greater willingness to embrace global institutions and norms.

"It is an extraordinary thing for China to be now where it is," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a trip to Asia last month. After China supported an Oct. 14 U.N. resolution condemning North Korea's nuclear test, Ms. Rice was so pleased she touted China's more-active stance as almost more significant than the nuclear test itself.

China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council since 1971, also is planning to send 1,000 troops to reinforce the U.N. contingent in southern Lebanon after the war there this summer, its largest deployment of peacekeepers to date. China also has become a key player in the debate over how to respond to Iran's nuclear ambitions and the crisis in Darfur.

The evolution of Chinese foreign policy may be most apparent in the case of North Korea. For decades, China's Communist Party and military managed the country's relations with its socialist neighbor, though the two countries' ties frayed after China's shift toward a market economy started to accelerate in the early 1990s and the country normalized relations with South Korea in 1992. Now, a rising and more-pragmatic class of foreign-affairs officials are gaining influence. They talk about Beijing's need to develop daguo xintai, or a great-power mentality.

"There is a change in Chinese thinking. They are acting more like a stakeholder" in the international system, says Michael Green, who stepped down late last year as head of Asian affairs for the Bush administration's National Security Council. "North Korea is helping to push them down that path."

China's increasing tendency to work alongside the U.S. -- or at least not openly against it -- stands in stark contrast with Russia, which has stymied the U.S. on several fronts, including the push to impose sanctions against Iran for its uranium-enrichment program.

Even so, some U.S. officials harbor doubts about China's motivations and the prospects for a broad alignment of interests between Washington and Beijing. Skeptics say China's decision to pressure North Korea stems more from worries about the regional power balance than about support for international efforts to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

Chinese foreign policy also remains heavily influenced by the voracious demand of its fast-growing economy for oil and other natural resources. Critics say Beijing has turned a blind eye to actions by the governments of oil-rich countries such as Sudan and Iran. Until recently, China had been reluctant to consider U.N. sanctions against Tehran for its nuclear program.

An immediate test of China's resolve on North Korea will be whether Beijing sticks to its tough stance against Pyongyang now that the North has agreed to return to six-nation disarmament talks. In the past, China has put pressure on North Korea to attend the talks but hasn't used the full weight of its economic leverage to force a resolution.

China's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said Thursday that Beijing would continue to enforce U.N. sanctions -- which bar weapons sales and luxury-goods shipments to North Korea -- even after talks resume. "Each country has a duty to strictly and responsibly implement" the U.N. resolution, "and China is no exception," he said.

The Chinese restrictions on bank transactions with North Korea remain in place, and analysts say the curbs could lead to serious economic hardship within months or even weeks. An official of China's largest oil company, state-controlled China National Petroleum Corp., said he expected China's oil exports to North Korea to return to normal when the talks get under way. Diplomats say they expect the talks to resume in Beijing by year end.

Since the six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear program began in 2003, China repeatedly has urged Washington to be more flexible in the hopes of making diplomatic progress. Privately, Chinese officials started to lose patience as Pyongyang and its leader, Kim Jong Il, resorted to a combination of brinkmanship and foot-dragging that has left the talks at a standstill since last year.

In 2005, North Korea declared itself a nuclear power. Then, despite objections from China and its neighbors, the North test-launched a series of ballistic missiles.

North Korea's decision to go ahead with its nuclear test in early October -- despite stern warnings from Beijing to desist -- put the country at odds with China's national interests by threatening to spark an arms race in the region that could lead to Japan, China's main regional rival, increasing its military strength.

After North Korea's missile tests, China voted in favor of a U.N. sanctions resolution against Pyongyang, in what may be the first time Beijing didn't veto or abstain from a sanctions vote. After North Korea detonated its atomic device, China voted in favor of even stricter sanctions at the U.N. -- and it is now going beyond that on its own.

The current steps may be temporary and aimed at forcing Pyongyang back to the negotiating table, but they appear to show Beijing's desire to strike a balance between maintaining regional stability and protecting the broader international system for controlling the spread of nuclear weapons.

Some senior U.S. administration officials remain skeptical of China's new posture, arguing that North Korea is a special case in which one of Beijing's few close allies betrayed it by testing a nuclear bomb. "China was humiliated," says one senior administration official. "They had no choice but to support the resolution that the U.S. and others put forward."

Still, there are other signs China is stepping out of its historical role. Chinese officials resent criticism of their country's economic dealings with Sudan, where civil war has spilled over into mass killings of civilians in the Darfur region. The officials say China is quietly working behind the scenes to bring peace to the area. "We use our good relationship and cooperation with the government" to push for a settlement, says Zhai Jun, assistant foreign minister for African affairs. "But we don't have to announce every time we do this."

The next test of China's commitment to its newfound activism may be Iran, whose nuclear ambitions have left it at odds with the U.N. Security Council. Iran's uranium-enrichment program has raised suspicions that the country is pursuing nuclear arms, though Tehran insists the program is for civilian energy purposes.

In July, China joined Russia and the other three permanent Security Council members -- the U.S., Britain and France -- in backing a resolution threatening Iran with sanctions unless it dropped its uranium-enrichment program and returned to negotiations. Now the five countries are trying to hammer out a set of sanctions they can all endorse. Chinese backing for even a limited sanctions package would be noteworthy. Iran is China's third-largest supplier of imported oil. This year, China's imports from Iran are likely to top $12 billion.

U.S. Discusses N. Korea In Japan (WT/AP)

By Hiroko Tabuchi

The Washington Times, November 6, 2006

TOKYO -- U.S. Undersecretaries of State R. Nicholas Burns and Robert Joseph were in Tokyo today coordinating with Japanese and South Korean officials before the resumption of long-delayed negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program.

South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon, who also is in Tokyo, said the three countries worked closely together in the past and would continue to do so at the six-nation talks expected later this year, according to a Japanese Foreign Ministry official.

Mr. Ban, who takes over as U.N. secretary-general in January, was to meet Prime Minister Shinzo Abe today for further talks. The two Americans were to meet with Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other Japanese officials before traveling to South Korea later today, according to Japan's Foreign Ministry.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, citing unidentified officials, reported that the three countries will hold a meeting of their chief nuclear negotiators in Washington as early as next weekend to discuss strategies to move the nuclear talks ahead.

The North agreed last week to return to the negotiations -- which also include China and Russia -- in the first easing of tensions after its Oct. 9 nuclear test. The talks have been stalled for a year over financial restrictions placed on the North by the United States for suspected counterfeiting and money laundering.

Mr. Aso said, however, that North Korea's return to the talks "is not a goal in itself," according to a ministry official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Aso said North Korea also must comply with the U.N. Security Council resolution passed after its nuclear test and abandon all atomic weapon development.

On Saturday, Pyongyang lashed out at Tokyo, saying Japan did not need to participate in the talks "because it is no more than a state of the U.S. and it is enough for Tokyo just to be informed of the results of the talks by Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0091288

Japan is a common target of criticism from the North, stemming from Tokyo's imperial occupation of the Korean Peninsula in the early 20th century. Pyongyang has called before for Japan to be excluded from the nuclear talks.

North Korea said it would return to the talks to seek an end to a U.S.-led campaign blocking Pyongyang's access to international banks because of purported illegal activities such as counterfeiting and money laundering. Washington had said it will discuss the financial restrictions only in the context of the six-nation talks.

The North often refers to its nuclear program as a self-defensive measure against the threat of a U.S. attack. Washington has insisted repeatedly that it has no intention to attack.

The regime's No. 2 leader, Kim Yong-nam, said last week that any progress at the revived talks on the communist nation's nuclear program will depend on the United States' "attitude," an indication that a breakthrough could be difficult.

Little Lost Ones (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, November 6, 2006

Among a small group of North Korean refugees who have taken sanctuary in the U.S. Consulate in Shenyang, China, are two orphan children, both boys, ages 13 and 16. With luck, if the Chinese authorities allow them to leave and the U.S. government works out the legalities of granting asylum to parentless minors, they will be in the U.S. before Thanksgiving.

Fortune has already shone on these boys by granting them safe passage on the underground railroad that ferries North Korean refugees in China to shelter in embassies or consulates there or in third countries. Korean refugees -- who number in the tens, or even hundreds, of thousands -- are leading desperate lives of hide-and-seek in China. Beijing's policy, in contravention of international law, is to track them down and repatriate them to North Korea, where they face prison camps or worse. It even pays bounties to citizens for turning them in.

The boys were led to safety by Liberty in North Korea (LINK), a Virginia-based nonprofit dedicated to helping the refugees in China. LINK says the boys lost their parents to famine and crossed the border separately, scavenging for food. They met in an underground shelter run by LINK. "What we're trying to do is help these children," says a spokesman. "We house them and protect them and try to get them out to freedom." There are dozens of such secret orphanages in northeast China, operated by local Samaritans and supported by groups based in the U.S. and South Korea.

Unlike the boys at the consulate, most abandoned orphans in northeast China are the progeny of North Korean women who have been captured and deported and their Chinese "husbands," who spurn their children. They are stateless, rejected by both China and North Korea for their "impure blood." Pregnant women deported to North Korea are often forced to abort for the same reason, says Chun Ki Won, a South Korean minister whose organization, Durihana, has helped spirit hundreds of refugees out of China. "I know of many cases myself," he says.

"Diu Diu," or "little lost one," is the nickname given to a three-and-a-half year-old boy that LINK tried, but failed, to help. A year ago he and his mother were captured by Chinese police and taken to the border, where racist North Korean border guards refused to admit the half-Chinese boy, whom they tore from his mother's arms. The police then sold the boy to a circus for $100, where he was severely abused and ended up in a hospital. The photos LINK obtained of the boy are too shocking to print.

"The stories are all so similar," says Tim Peters, an American missionary in Seoul who runs Helping Hands Korea. "A girl comes out [of the North] and either she has been secretly sold into marriage or she volunteers to marry a Chinese man. And then she gets caught and sent back." Mr. Peters estimates there are "thousands" of such abandoned children. Pastor Chun puts the number even higher.

Left-behind infants and toddlers are sometimes sold to childless Chinese couples, Pastor Chun says. Older girls are peddled as brides or to brothels -- "that's a given" -- while the boys are sold as laborers. Others are left to fend for themselves, and humanitarian workers find them wandering the streets or living in train stations. Pastor Chun's organization runs several orphanages, each with four to seven children cared for by volunteer Chinese-Korean "mothers."

Once in shelters, the children are de facto prisoners. They usually lack the official papers needed to attend school, get medical attention or participate in any other way in local society. "That's the problem," says a spokesman for Aegis Foundation, another U.S.-based nonprofit that runs shelters for Korean children in China. "We cannot send them to normal school and if they don't get any education, they can't be good citizens. That's why we need to smuggle them out."

Crossing Borders, a Christian ministry based in Virginia, takes a different approach. It also sponsors secret orphanages but "we don't do the underground railroad," a spokesman says. "The long-term goal is to see these kids grow up and become productive members of society." Regulation is loose in the areas where its shelters are located, and the children it helps can sometimes attend school. Some of the children have been voluntarily handed over by fathers. "Most fathers have no means or desire of helping take care of their children," the spokesman says. "We go into the village and offer to take the kids. It's a handshake deal."

The U.N. High Commission on Refugees stands ready to help the Korean refugees in China -- if only Beijing would let it. Several countries in the region are prepared to set up transit camps for refugees provided the U.S. helps pay for it and South Korea ultimately accepts them for re-settlement, as its Constitution requires. But even if, in the happiest of worlds, all this were to occur, the stateless orphans could still be left out. According to groups that run the underground railroad, even South Korea, which accepts most of the Northerners who manage to escape, refuses to admit the children on the grounds that they are not true "defectors."

Amid this misery, there are a few stories with happy endings -- of mothers who ride the underground railroad to the South with their Korean-born children or mothers who escape and then go back to smuggle out their Chinese-born kids. The humanitarian workers tell these stories with unflagging spirit. But the vast majority of the orphans remain lost in China, in lives that offer little hope. Most of the South Koreans and Americans working to help the children are Christian, as are many of the ethnically Korean Chinese who care for them. Pastor Chun speaks for many, when he says he takes inspiration from Isaiah 1:17, in which God exhorts the prophet to "Defend the fatherless."

Israel Vows To Hit Gaza Until Rockets Subside (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 5 — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Sunday that the military would not halt its offensive in the northern Gaza Strip until Palestinian rocket fire toward Israel was significantly reduced.

On Sunday, the fifth straight day of fighting, Israeli forces killed three Palestinians, two of them militants and the other a security official, Palestinian medical workers said. The fighting, which included an Israeli airstrike, again took place in and around Beit Hanun, the northern Gaza town that has been the focus of the Israeli operation.

Large numbers of Israeli troops have been operating in Beit Hanun since Wednesday, though they have not been able to stop Palestinians from firing the locally manufactured rockets known as Qassams. Palestinian militants fired at least 10 more rockets into southern Israel on Sunday, but they caused no major damage or serious injuries. The Palestinians have launched more than 30 since the Israeli incursion in the area, the Israeli military said.

“We have declared that we will never accept the ongoing Qassam fire and that we will take any steps needed to considerably reduce the fire,” Mr. Olmert said Sunday at his weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem. “The operation is limited in time, but we have no intention of announcing when it will end.”

The Palestinians, meanwhile, have called for international pressure on Israel to halt the offensive.

“I urge members of the international community to take the appropriate response to Israel’s crimes in Gaza,” said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator. “Condemnation is the least one would expect.”

More than 40 Palestinians, including militants and civilians, have been killed over the past five days. One Israeli soldier has died. The Israeli forces have detained 30 people suspected of being militants, the military said.

In another development, a Palestinian lawmaker, Mustafa Barghouti, said that he was brokering the latest attempt at a Palestinian national unity government and that an agreement could be reached in days.

The proposal calls for a government of technocrats not directly linked to any party. Hamas, the militant Islamic group that now leads the government, and Fatah, the secular nationalist movement that lost the elections but whose leader still holds the Palestinian presidency, would approve members of the new government. The Palestinians have been holding talks for months on forming a unity government. Palestinians have expressed hope that a new government can win a restoration of Western aid, which was cut after Hamas came to power. The United States and the European Union, with Israel, have demanded that a Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian pacts.

Also on Sunday, Avigdor Lieberman, a far-right politician in the Israeli cabinet, caused a stir by again supporting a land and population transfer between Jews and Arabs.

Israel Vows To Press Gaza Offensive (AP)

By Mark Lavie

AP, November 6, 2006

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to press ahead with Israel's offensive in northern Gaza, brushing off international calls to halt the fighting and Palestinian complaints of dwindling supplies of water, food and other staples.

The death toll in Israel's five-day sweep through the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun rose to 48 on Sunday, when four Palestinians, including two Hamas militants, were killed, according to Palestinian health officials. Israel launched the drive last week to try to stop to daily rocket barrages aimed at Israeli towns.

DOJ_NMG_0091290

The Vatican and European Union have expressed grave concerns about the offensive, but Olmert told his Cabinet on Sunday it was necessary to "considerably reduce the (rocket) fire and prevent terror." He said Israel has no intention of reoccupying Gaza after last year's pullout.

"When we reach the conclusion that the effectiveness of the operation is bringing us closer to reaching the goals, we will definitely pull our forces out of Gaza," he said.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh called the Israeli offensive a "massacre," and Beit Hanoun residents warned of a burgeoning humanitarian crisis.

"We have electricity, but no drinking water," said one 28-year-old woman, who declined to be identified because of the military presence in town.

She said there were shortages of staples like milk and diapers and residents were being forced to share food. She also said tanks were visible from her home, and her husband was taken away by Israeli troops for questioning. "I don't know what's happened to him," she said.

Col. Nir Press, head of Israel's liaison team dealing with Palestinian authorities and international aid organizations, said Sunday that shops in Beit Hanoun were open for a few hours Sunday and would be open again Monday.

Press said U.N. agencies and the Red Cross were shipping in food, water, baby formula and other supplies and would continue to do so. He added that Palestinian technicians would be allowed to repair water mains on Monday.

On Sunday, AP Television News showed images of ambulances and taxis rushing Palestinian casualties to the small Beit Hanoun hospital, dodging potholes gouged by Israeli shells. A young man, writhing from a chest wound, was pulled out of a yellow taxi and carried into the hospital.

Despite the offensive, Palestinians fired six rockets at Israel on Sunday, the military said. Nobody was hurt.

Israel said its attacks are focused on militants who launch the rockets. While most of the dead have been militants, several civilians — including a 4-year-old girl, a 72-year-old man and two paramedics — have been killed. Two women who attempted to help a group of militants besieged in a mosque also died.

On Sunday, about 100 paramedics marched through the streets of Gaza City to protest the deaths of their two 17-year-old colleagues, both volunteers. They were killed in an Israeli missile strike last week in the town of Beit Lahiya, next to Beit Hanoun.

The International Red Cross harshly criticized Israel, saying the paramedics and their vehicle were clearly marked. "The ICRC is appalled by this failure to protect personnel engaged in emergency medical duties," a statement released Sunday said.

At the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI said he was worried about the "grave deterioration" in the Gaza Strip, and called on all sides to work to stop the bloodshed and immediately resume "direct, serious and concrete negotiations."

In a weekend statement, the EU called on both Israel and the Palestinians to halt the violence because of the casualties, but aimed its sharpest barb at Israel.

"The right of all states to defend themselves does not justify disproportionate use of violence or actions which are contrary to international humanitarian law," the EU said.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said Israel was doing everything possible to avoid civilian casualties. "We have to get directly to the people who do the shooting and that is what we are trying to do," he told reporters.

Israel withdrew all troops and Jewish settlements from Gaza last year. But it sent forces back into the area after Palestinian militants tunneled into Israel and abducted a soldier in June.

A Palestinian militant group claiming to hold Gilad Shalit, the captured soldier, said it has no plans to kill the serviceman, despite the Israeli offensive.

However, Abu Mujahid, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, said the soldier could be harmed by Israel's military activity. "Gilad Shalit's life is in danger through the incursion and bombing of houses," said Abu Mujahid.

Syria Hints At Resistance Vs. Israel (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, November 6, 2006

Syria could resort to armed resistance if peace negotiations do not lead to Israel's return of the Golan Heights, the country's Information Minister said Sunday.

Mohsen Bilal said international negotiations should lead to Israel giving back the Golan Heights, captured from Syria in the 1967 Mideast war and later annexed. If that does not happen, he warned Syria could resort to "other means, which struggling people have used at various points in history, beginning with legitimate resistance."

But Bilal said Syrians were eager to resume talks.

"The road for peace and stability in the region and the world goes through ending occupation" of the Golan Heights, he said, opening a three-day media forum geared at highlighting Syria's right to the Golan.

DOJ_NMG_0091291

Israeli-Syrian peace talks broke down in 2000, with Syria demanding assurances it would get back all of the Golan Heights. Israel wanted slight modifications to the pre-1967 line, conforming to the international frontier, and insisted that issues of security and normalization be spelled out first.

On Sunday, Syrian President Bashar Assad, who was meeting with Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa, called for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Israel has brushed off Assad's previous calls to restart peace talks, saying Syria must first clamp down on the radical Palestinian groups it hosts.

Protecting The Right To Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, November 6, 2006

No one expects Florida elections to go smoothly, but this year the state got off to an alarming start. Voters reported that after selecting Democratic candidates on electronic voting machines, the review screens registered that they had chosen Republicans. A spokeswoman for the Broward County supervisor of elections told The Miami Herald that the machines often fall out of sync under heavy use, but that they can be fixed when voters complain.

That snapshot of Florida's early voting is confirmation — as if any were needed — that a great deal can go wrong tomorrow, much of it eminently preventable. Six years after the 2000 election meltdown, voting machines are still unreliable, and there are an array of other obstacles to voters who want their votes to count.

Voting is a right and a responsibility, but it is also, unfortunately, a challenge. As people go to the polls tomorrow, they should be on the lookout for:

ELECTRONIC VOTING GLITCHES In addition to misrecording votes, A.T.M.-style voting machines can provide misleading or incomplete information. (On some Virginia machines, the last name of the Democratic Senate candidate, Jim Webb, will not appear on the summary page.) Voters should check and double-check their votes, and the voter-verified paper trail if one is available, and report anything that does not look right. If the machines do not work, they should insist on casting a paper ballot.

VOTE SUPPRESSION In California, 14,000 Hispanic voters received letters last month falsely informing them that immigrants could be sent to jail for voting. Every election there are attempts to trick voters, especially members of minorities and the poor. Voters should insist on their right to cast a ballot.

VOTER ID CONFUSION Election officials often demand identification even when it is not legally required, or misstate the requirements. Georgia this year sent out letters saying that a photo ID is required even though the courts ruled otherwise. Voters can check the law on their local Board of Elections Web site. If there is a dispute, they should insist at the very least on casting a provisional ballot.

VOTING ROLL PURGES Election officials sometimes wrongly remove voters' names from the rolls. That happened, notoriously, in Florida in 2000, and this year Kentucky lost a lawsuit over a faulty purge. Even people whose names are missing from the rolls may be eligible voters. Voters who have trouble casting a ballot should appeal to the person running the polling place. If that fails, they should call a voters' hot line — like 1-866-OUR-VOTE, run by the National Campaign for Fair Elections — or a political party or campaign. Federal law says a voter whose eligibility is in doubt has the right to cast a provisional ballot, whose validity will be decided later. But regular ballots are more likely to be counted.

Unfortunately, many of the things that go wrong tomorrow may be invisible to the average voter. Machines that appear to work properly may be throwing out or altering votes. Without a voter-verified paper trail and an effective vote audit, this can go undetected. Provisional ballots may be wrongly rejected after the polls close. Some states, shamefully, have laws saying that if a provisional ballot is cast in the correct polling place but at the wrong table, it will not count.

These flaws point to the need to continue to push a reluctant Congress, as well as state legislatures, for meaningful election reform. Tomorrow, though, voters should just focus on getting their votes counted within our current, deeply flawed system.

TERRORISM NEWS

DOJ Places Shaaban Under Special Administrative Measures. The Indianapolis Star (11/6, Corcoran) reports Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, the "Indiana truck driver found guilty of conspiring to betray the United States has been secluded in a Colorado super-maximum-security prison under a secret order approved by the U.S. attorney general." DOJ officials have isolated Shaaban under a "policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on the few conversations he's allowed to have, heavily restricts his access to news reports and prohibits anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him. Some inmates at the prison, which houses the federal government's worst of the worst, spend at least 23 hours a day in soundproof cells. They cannot speak to or make eye contact with other inmates. These 'special administrative measures,' also called 'SAMs orders,' are meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security."

CBP Officials Delay 16 Travelers At Houston Airport. The Houston Chronicle (11/4, Villafranca) reported, "Federal authorities delayed the departure Friday of 16 international travelers, including 15 Mexican nationals, who were boarding a Mexico City-bound plane at Houston's Bush Intercontinental Airport. A U.S. Customs and Border Protection official said data submitted by the passengers did not match the data on file when they entered the United States." Kelly Klundt, CBP spokeswoman, "declined to say what information was missing or did not match when the 16 passengers tried to board the 9 a.m. Continental flight."

Foreign Policy Article On Atomic Terror Attack Draws Skepticism. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/6, Pierce) reports, "Two leading U.S. nuclear scientists say a team of terrorists with industrial equipment, physics and engineering skills and access to highly enriched uranium could build a crude atomic weapon in the United States for less than $10 million. Writing in Foreign Policy…Peter Zimmerman and Jeffrey Lewis add that there is no evidence that al Qaeda or any other terrorist group currently possesses the technical expertise necessary to complete such an effort." However, the Times notes "some analysts told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that they were deeply skeptical of the Foreign Policy article. Arms-control specialist Milton Leitenberg of the University of Maryland called the scenario 'super-optimistic,' and said the authors had glossed over the difficulty of finding the kinds of highly qualified specialists the project would need."

Hoekstra Criticizes Administration Over Nuclear Website. The AP (11/5) reports, "House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra criticized the Bush administration on Sunday for its handling of a trove of once-secret documents from Saddam Hussein's covert nuclear program disclosed on a federal Web site. Hoekstra, R-Mich., complained the U.S. intelligence community hadn't properly declassified the documents. ... Hoekstra said his committee would review the documents to determine the former Iraqi leader's goals and capabilities before the war in 2003."

Conservative Pressure Blamed For Distribution Of Iraq Nuclear Program Documents. Newsweek's Michael Isikoff (11/13) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "shut down a government Web site after the disclosure that it had posted nuclear-research documents from Iraq's pre-Gulf War I weapons program. Set up in March at the insistence of congressional GOPers, the site was designed to post documents seized by the U.S. military in Iraq. But many were trivial memos and oddball letters. … Late last year House intel-committee chair Pete Hoekstra and Senate intel chair Pat Roberts pressed Negroponte's office to make the Iraqi docs available. They and others, including The Weekly Standard magazine, said the material might show Saddam did have WMD or ties to Al Qaeda. So the Defense Intelligence Agency began to review 48,000 boxes of material, located in a U.S. military warehouse in Doha, Qatar, and started posting it on an Operation Iraqi Freedom Web site. DIA spokesman Don Black said several hundred analysts, linguists, translators and contractors took part, weeding out diplomatically sensitive docs or those mentioning the names of U.S. persons (a potential violation of the U.S. Privacy Act)."

Los Alamos Incident Potentially "Greatest Breach Of National Security" In Decades." Newsweek (11/13, Barry, Hosenball) reports, "It began as a routine police call. At 4:16 p.m. on Oct. 17, two Los Alamos County police officers were dispatched to the Royal Crest Trailer Park. The cluster of mobile homes is located next to Los Alamos National Laboratory, the sprawling New Mexico compound that houses one of America's two main facilities for designing nuclear weapons. A resident had complained that two neighbors were shouting at each other and throwing rocks through the windows of their trailer. The cops expected to find the usual: a domestic dispute that had gotten out of hand. Instead, they discovered what one Los Alamos official—who, like all lab and government sources in this story, would not be named talking about sensitive matters—calls 'potentially the greatest breach of national security' in decades. … Panicked officials are now trying to determine how a low-level clerk was able to walk out of a high-security facility with hundreds of pages of nuclear secrets. The brief answer: laxness and budget cuts.

LANL Says Pilfered Documents Contained Mostly Low-Level Secrets. The Los Angeles Times (11/4) reported, "Los Alamos National Laboratory said that the classified documents discovered at a trailer park during a drug investigation last month did not include the most highly sensitive nuclear weapons information. The lab…said a 'careful and comprehensive analysis' of three electronic memory devices and paper copies of classified documents found in a residential trailer showed that they were mostly low-level secrets that are 20 to 30 years old." The Times noted, "The FBI is continuing a criminal investigation into a lab employee who owned the trailer."

HOMELAND RESPONSE

Philadelphia Bank Withdrawals Raise Terror Questions. Under the headline "Did Bank Stop A Fraud Or Terrorist?," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/4, Schaefer) reported, "On Wednesday morning, two men withdrew $8,700 from an account under the name of Shahid Batti at the Commerce Bank" in Upper Darby, Penn. "When they returned later in the day to withdraw an additional $9,700, bank officials became suspicious, denied the transaction and contacted police. … One man produced a passport from Pakistan, a New Jersey license and a Social Security card, all under the name of Batti -- and all fraudulent, according to police." The Inquirer added that the man later "identified himself as Raza Hussain from Brooklyn, N.Y.," and Upper Darby Police Superintendent Michael J. Chitwood "said police discovered a 'possible' connection between Hussain and a terrorist with the same birthday when they ran the names through the FBI Terrorism Screening Center. He said the FBI and the New York Police Department have been contacted."

The Philadelphia Daily News (11/4, Weichselbaum) reported Hussein, meanwhile, "is sitting in a Delaware County jail cell and has not posted the $100,000 bail, Chitwood said. …. 'There are a lot of red flags here,' Chitwood said. 'We don't know if we have an identity-theft issue; we don't know if we have a money-laundering issue, or a terrorist connection.' … But FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Hussain 'is not on the FBI terrorist-watch list, and has no known ties to terrorists. The Philadelphia FBI will continute their investigation to determine his true identity.'"

Student Break-In At Pittsburgh Stadium Prompts JTTF Investigation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/6, Nephin) reports two Carnegie-Mellon University students "are facing criminal charges after police said they tried to break into Heinz Field early Sunday." Paul Sudeep and Anand Durvasula "were cooperative when apprehended, telling police they had tickets to Sunday afternoon's Pittsburgh Steelers game and 'decided to check things out so they knew where to go,' Harper said." The AP notes, "The Joint Terrorism Task Force -- made up of the FBI, city and Allegheny County police and the county sheriff's office -- conducted a sweep of the stadium with bomb-detecting dogs and found no explosives, Harper said. The men were being questioned by the terrorism task force, and Harper said the investigation was continuing." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/6, Rotstein, Guidry) also reports the story, under the headline "Heinz Field Arrests Spur Terror Response."

Reviewer Urges Reading Of Yoo's Book, But Criticizes His Conclusions. In the Washington Post (11/5, BW6), Geoffrey R. Stone reviews John Yoo's "War By Other Means: An Insider's Account Of The War On Terror," writing, "You should read this book, though not for the reasons the author intends. John Yoo is a law professor who served in the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice from 2001 to 2003. In that capacity, he participated -- often quite centrally -- in the key post-9/11 legal decisions that framed the Bush administration's war on terror, including the Patriot Act, the National Security Agency surveillance program and administration positions on torture, military tribunals and the treatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantanamo Bay. In War by Other Means, Yoo delivers on his subtitle. This is indeed 'an insider's account of the war on terror.' … At its core, War by Other Means offers spirited, detailed and often enlightening accounts of the decision-making process behind the key 2001-03 legal decisions. Yoo feels compelled to justify them because the Bush administration itself has 'often failed to explain clearly to the public the difficult decisions al Qaeda has forced upon us.'" But the "fundamental precept that drives Yoo's conclusions is his unyielding belief that in wartime, the president -- as commander-in-chief -- is exclusively in charge. Detention, surveillance and torture must all be within the president's unilateral control. Congress and the Supreme Court must defer to the president's judgment. This is an extreme, reckless and dangerous view. That it has shaped the policies of our government is nothing short of irresponsible."

WAR NEWS

Troops In Iraq Warn Of "Devastating" Results Of US Pullout. The Washington Post (11/6, White, 748K) reports from Iraq, "It is dusty and muddy, calm and chaotic, deafeningly loud and eerily quiet. The one thing the war is not, however, is finished, dozens of soldiers across the country said in interviews. And leaving Iraq now would have devastating consequences, they said. ... Many soldiers said the United States should not abandon its effort here. Such a move, enlisted soldiers and officers said, would set Iraq on a path to civil war, give new life to the insurgency and create the possibility of a failed state after nearly four years of fighting to implant democracy." The troops stress the need for more time to cement their accomplishments but also "expressed frustration with the nature of the fight, which many said amounted to driving around and waiting for the enemy to engage them, often with roadside bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs." The Post adds, "Soldiers and officers had difficulty conveying what victory in Iraq would look like or exactly how to achieve it. In some ways, victory is a moving target, they said, one that relies heavily on the Iraqi people gaining trust in the Iraqi security forces and the ability of the Iraqi government to support essential services."

Mallaby Mulls Costs Of Staying In Or Leaving Iraq. In his Washington Post (11/6, 748K) column, Sebastian Mallaby writes, "The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq. The nation will face an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out." Mallaby quotes three civil-war scholars -- "Oxford's Paul Collier, Stanford's James Fearon and Barbara Walter of the University of California at San Diego," who have "dispiriting" points: "[Iraqis' insistence on fighting each other] leads Fearon to the view that U.S. withdrawal is a precondition for the military test that in turn is a precondition for peace. If Fearon is right, remaining in Iraq actually prolongs the carnage. But even if he is wrong, it's not clear that remaining in Iraq is justified. In the past three months, 241 U.S. troops have died; another five years implies the death of 4,820 Americans, more than were killed in the terrorist attacks of 2001. The price of staying in Iraq is high, while the gains are uncertain. But it is also true that leaving Iraq could prove extremely costly. Fearon expects that withdrawal is likely to accelerate the conflict, unleashing an even more intense campaign of ethnic cleansing of civilians. ... But the strongest argument against withdrawal is that it might not be permanent. ... when Iraq's combatants fight themselves to stalemate, some coalition of external powers may have to enforce a peace, and the United States would probably be part of such an effort."

Galbraith Describes De Facto Partition Of Iraq. In an op-ed for Time (11/13) Peter Galbraith, former U.S. ambassador to Croatia, writes that President Bush "says the U.S.'s goal is a unified and democratic Iraq, but we have no way to get there. As Americans search for answers, there is one obvious alternative: split Iraq into separate Kurdish, Sunni and Shi'ite states. The case for the partition of Iraq is straightforward: It has already happened. The Kurds…enjoy the independence they long dreamed about. The Iraqi flag does not fly in Kurdistan, which has a democratically elected government and its own army. In southern Iraq, Shi'ite religious parties have carved out theocratic fiefdoms, using militias that now number in the tens of thousands to enforce an Iranian-style Islamic rule. To the west, Iraq's Sunni provinces have become chaotic no-go zones, with Islamic insurgents controlling Anbar province while Baathists and Islamic radicals operate barely below the surface in Salahaddin and Nineveh. And Baghdad, the heart of Iraq, is now partitioned between the Shi'ite east and the Sunni west."

Army Advisors Prepare To Help Iraqi Forces. The AP (11/6, Burns) reports from Fort Riley, Kansas, "... soldiers are preparing not to defeat the insurgents in Iraq but to coach the Iraqis to do that for themselves. It is an approach born of the realization that giving the Iraqis uniforms, rifles and bullets and training them in the basics of combat is not enough. To get the Iraqis ready to handle their own security, U.S. officials have concluded they need more American soldiers inside Iraqi army and police units to advise them. ...

The advisers act as role models, steering Iraqis away from corruption, human rights abuses and other problems, while also going on raids and other missions to coach them and assess weaknesses." Anthony Cordesman of CSIS expresses skepticism, warning of "severe [numerical] limits" on the program. The AP describes simulation exercises in the advisors' training.

Iraq's Parliament To Consider Amnesty Proposals In December. U.S. News and World Report (11/13, Robinson) reports Samir Sumaidaie, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, "is under no illusions about the difficulty of achieving peace in his country. … But he has not lost hope. Obscured by the reports of spiraling violence and the latest contretemps between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. officials is the surprising fact that the Iraqi government itself has laid out a timeline for dealing with the most contentious issues tearing the country apart. Achieving a timeline is not the same thing as reaching substantive agreement on solutions, but it may provide the kickstart for a last-ditch attempt to avoid fullblown civil war-and if deadlines matter, it is a measuring stick of the Iraqis' own making." US News adds, "By all accounts, the toughest items on the agenda are those slated for December, when a law offering amnesty to Sunni and Baathist insurgents and demobilizing militias is supposed to be passed."

Redeployment Of Convicted Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Sparks Outrage. Time (11/13, Zagaorin) reports, "In a war effort marred by poor planning and misjudgments of the local scene, this move just about took the cake. Someone in the U.S. military thought it was a good idea to send Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler convicted of abusing detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, back to serve again in Iraq. What's more, his unit's job was to help train Iraqi police. … Still, it was not until TIME.com reported last week that Cardona was on his way to Iraq that the military reconsidered his posting." Time notes, "By reversing course, the Army stanched the p.r. damage, but some harm had already been done. On hearing the news that Cardona was in Kuwait awaiting transfer to Iraq, Maryam al-Rais, a member of the Iraqi parliament, lamented, 'This is just the latest in a long list of insults to Iraqi dignity by the Americans.'"

US Translator Thought To Have Been Kidnapped By "Shiite Zarqawi." Newsweek's Periscope column (11/13, Johnson) reports, "Ever since the radical Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr joined the Iraqi government, his power on the streets has been slipping. Now U.S. and Iraqi officials worry that even more violent men might be taking up his mantle. One name has come up again and again: Abu Deraa, sometimes called 'the Shiite Zarqawi.' Abu Deraa and the death squad he runs have been waging a campaign of Shia terror across the city. He is suspected of torturing and killing scores of Sunnis in a bloody wave of ethnic cleansing in neighborhoods across Baghdad. U.S. officials believe Abu Deraa is responsible for the capture of a U.S. Army translator who disappeared two weeks ago while leaving the fortified Green Zone and remains missing." According to Newsweek, "Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki hasn't made the job of hunting him any easier. Last week U.S. forces launched a massive raid in Sadr City, targeting Abu Deraa. The attack reportedly killed two of his sons, but he escaped. Concerned about the political implications, Maliki ordered U.S. troops to end the assault and then dismantle the checkpoints they had set up to net Abu Deraa if he tried to slip away."

US Public Said To See Parallels Between Iraq And Vietnam. U.S. News and World Report (11/13, Walsh) reports, "At the White House, they call it the 'V' word. Vietnam. It is the historical parallel that the Bush administration dreads most, because of fears that comparisons with the bitter, bloody Southeast Asian conflict will cast even more doubt on the conduct of the war in Iraq today. … But the idea that Iraq increasingly resembles Vietnam in some important ways appears to be gaining credibility among historians, pundits, and, most important, the public."

Kerry Remarks Seen As Evidence That Democrats Have Vietnam-Era Mind-Set. U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (11/13) writes, "'You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq.' Those two sentences, spoken by John Kerry last week, tell a lot about the mind-set of many -- not all, but many -- Democrats who supported him for president in 2004. … One thing they tell us is that Kerry's mind-set is still back in the Vietnam era. Today the statement is literally untrue: No one is 'stuck in Iraq' unless he or she volunteers, and the educational and economic levels of our military personnel are higher than those of civilians in the same age cohort. Kerry was evidently thinking back to the late 1960s, when there was a military draft and a college dropout could find himself drafted and 'stuck' in Vietnam."

White House Aide Volunteers To Serve With Marines In Afghanistan. The Washington Post's "In the Loop" column (11/6, Kamen) reports Kenneth Rapuano, former deputy undersecretary at the Energy Department for counterterrorism and "since July 2004 a deputy assistant to the president for homeland security, has volunteered for active duty as a lieutenant colonel in the Marines to serve with the Joint Special Operations Command in Afghanistan."

Koppel Decries Lack Of "Commitment To Sacrifice" In Conduct Of War On Terror. In the New York Times (11/6, 1.21M), Ted Koppel writes, "We are advised to adjust to the notion of warrantless wiretaps at home, unaccountable CIA prisons overseas and the rendition of suspects to nations that feature prominently on the State Department's list of human rights abusers, because the threats we face are 'existential.' But apparently they are not existential enough to warrant any kind of widely shared commitment or sacrifice, like increased taxes or a military draft to meet the Pentagon's growing need for manpower. ... We are left with the impression that the grown-ups in Washington would prefer to make the difficult decisions for us without involving the courts, Congress or the press. That is precisely the wrong way to go about winning this war." Koppel adds, "Back when the United States was widely admired, it was for all that was most cumbersome about our democratic process."

LATimes Questions Pakistan's Allegiance. The Los Angeles Times (11/6) says in an editorial, "Preventing Afghanistan from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state." Islamabad is "clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests."

DOJ Enron Task Force's Berkowitz To Join Latham & Watkins. Law.com (11/6, Slater) reports Sean Berkowitz, "the director of the Department of Justice's Enron Task Force in the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and the late Kenneth Lay, will join the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins, the law firm announced Thursday, Nov. 2. The announcement came on the heels of Enron Corp. co-prosecutor John Hueston joining Irell & Manella." Berkowitz said, "I did a careful look around Chicago firms and felt that Latham provided the best opportunities to capitalize on my experience in the Justice Department, and to transfer that into a national and international practice." Berkowitz, "pursued by Kirkland & Ellis and DLA Piper, among others, has several ties to Latham lawyers. He worked with John Lynch, a founding partner of Latham's Chicago office, when they represented different parties in General Instrument Corp.'s securities litigation, and with Latham associate Deborah Steiner in the U.S. Attorney's office. Between his Enron experience and his associate years at Katten Muchin Rosenman before joining the U.S. Attorney's office in Chicago, Berkowitz expects to make a pretty seamless public-to-private transition. 'Enron was one of the most complex matters out there, so I don't imagine I'll find anything in private practice that'll be insurmountable from a technical standpoint,' said Berkowitz, whose provocative cross-examination of Skilling ignited an unflattering outburst from the fallen executive."

CRIMINAL LAW

Rudolph's Letters Provide Glimpse Of Federal Prison's "Bomber Row." Time (11/13, Vollers) reports the Federal Correctional Complex in Florence, CO "is a virtual theme park of penal experiences, ranging from a minimum-security camp…to the concrete fortress that was built to be the most secure prison in the country: the Administrative Maximum U.S. Penitentiary, or ADX for short. The inmates in ADX Florence include drug kingpins, gang leaders, hit men, snipers and, lately, more and more, international terrorists, including al-Qaeda shoe bomber Richard Reid; mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing Ramzi Yousef and at least seven of his accomplices; and four men convicted of involvement in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa. … Until now, almost nothing has been written about the inner workings of the ADX. Since 9/11, journalists have been routinely denied access to the facility, its staff and inmates. But Eric Robert Rudolph, who is serving life without parole at the prison for the fatal bombings at the Atlanta Olympics and an abortion clinic in Alabama, has written letters to me, the author of a book about his case, and to his mother Patricia Rudolph, who has shared them with me. These missives offer a unique first-hand account of life on Bombers Row."

Boston Mayor Optimistic About Expanding Gang Truces. The Boston Globe (11/6, Smalley) reports Boston Mayor Thomas Menino "said yesterday that he is optimistic about the possibility of brokering more gang truces across Boston similar to the one that police, clergy, and youth outreach workers established between two of the city's most violent gangs. Menino, who credited police and the Rev. Jeffrey Brown with cementing the pact between the Heath Street gang in Jamaica Plain and the H-Block gang in Roxbury, also praised the young gang members who came to the bargaining table." Menino said, "You have to give the…gang members a lot of credit for wanting to work together." Boston police consultant Jack McDevitt "said the truce could become a national model, in part because Heath Street and H-Block's long, bloody feud gives the treaty more street credibility. He said he plans to recommend the idea to six cities he is working with to fight gang violence under a US Department of Justice initiative. 'It gives some cover to other groups that might feel, 'OK, these are pretty serious folks and they did it so we can do it, too,' McDevitt said." Organizers trying to preserve the truce "have offered incentives to gang members, including tutoring, improvements to a teen center, and corporate box seats for a New England Patriots game."

Violent Crime In Manchester, New Hampshire, Comparably Low. The New Hampshire Union Leader (11/6, Brooks) reports, "Manchester has consistently ranked among the least violent cities of its size in New England, an analysis of federal crime data reveals. FBI records show the Queen City saw fewer robberies and aggravated assaults than almost any other similarly sized city in the region between 2001 and 2005, the last year for which data was available. Homicides also were rare. Altogether, Manchester reported fewer violent crimes in recent years than all but one other New England city of more than 100,000 residents. Only Stamford, Conn., could claim fewer." Police Chief John Jaskolka said, "The perception is that violent crime is way up. Actually, our numbers are fairly low." Officials and residents "have lately called the security of several Manchester neighborhoods into question, particularly since city police patrolman Michael Briggs was killed by gunfire in the center city last month. Police have since ordered high-intensity patrols in a smattering of hot spots. Many residents, meanwhile, have banded together via neighborhood watch groups."

Courts Embrace Electronic Monitoring. USA Today (11/6, Heath) reports, "Electronic monitors that can pinpoint criminals on a map can now also tell whether they've been driving too fast, drinking or violating other laws. Courts nationwide increasingly are embracing such tracking of people's behavior as a way to stop them from repeating the actions that got them in trouble with the law, though it remains less common than satellite surveillance of sex offenders." Among the tools are automobile black boxes and alcohol-sniffing bracelets.

Group Says Arkansas Rehabilitation Center Not Up To DOJ Standards. The Arkansas Democrat Gazette (11/5, Upshaw) reports, "An advocacy group that has been monitoring Alexander Youth Services Center for months said Saturday that Arkansas isn't meeting the mental health, education and special education needs of the children at the troubled facility as required by the U. S. Department of Justice and state law." Dana McClain of the Disability Rights Center says "problems at the center are systemic. … 'We don't think this is rehabilitation, and state law says it is supposed to be [for youthful offenders]. I think it's punishment,' she said. 'I feel like these children are being set up to go to adult prison.'"

Jury Kept Secret In Drug-Trafficking, Racketeering Case. The Washington Times (11/6, Mcelhatton) reports closing arguments "are expected today in a gang-related racketeering and drug-trafficking case in the District in which the judge took the unusual step of appointing an anonymous jury. Prosecutors say they want the names of the jurors to remain secret because the gang has tried to tamper with the judicial system, including impersonating a law-enforcement officer to kill a cooperating witness. Gerald Eiland and Frederick Miller are among several men accused of running a drug organization and car-theft ring based in the District. They have pleaded not guilty."

Legal Experts Say Laptop Search Case Could End Up In Supreme Court. In a story credited to Copley News Service, the San Diego Union-Tribune (11/5, Krasnowski) reported on the case of Michael Arnold, who was charged with possession of child pornography after a customs agent found images on his laptop when he returned from the Philippines. His "arrest was heralded as a success for the federal government's Operation Predator campaign against criminals who prey on children," but last month, "a judge threw out the computer evidence against him, setting up a court battle in which a man accused of vile behavior could help determine how far border agents can go in searching people's computers and the future of some privacy rights. It's an issue – spurred by advances in technology, and increased concerns about terrorism and border security – that some legal experts expect will end up before the U.S. Supreme Court." In the case, US District Judge Dean Pregerson "ruled the border officer needed reasonable suspicion to search Arnold's computer because the machines can contain vast amounts of private information. … Prosecutors contend border officers can search such items routinely, saying the computer search wasn't invasive or destructive but rather a standard inspection of a person at the border that courts have long supported."

Business Travelers Concerned About Searches. In his "Business Itinerary" column in the Los Angeles Times (11/4), James Gilden wrote, "It is cases like Arnold's that have corporate travel managers up in arms — but not because of the pornography connection. Their concern is with what happens to the proprietary data that business travelers often carry on their laptops." Gilden added, "The association of travel executives is not concerned as much with the constitutional questions as it is with the practical implications for business travelers. It has tried to get answers from Customs and Border Protection about its policies regarding the search and seizure of laptops and measures taken to protect sensitive business information on them but has not received an answer to its queries, Executive Director Gurley said."

Monterey County, California, Crime Lab Experiencing Major Delays. The Monterey (CA) Herald (11/5, Reynolds) reports, "Crimes in Monterey County are going unsolved and prosecutions delayed as piles of unprocessed evidence grow higher in the county's primary crime lab, law enforcement officials say. In some cases, The Herald has found, more than a year passed before fingerprints were processed, leaving detectives frustrated and criminals walking free." The lab "is so badly understaffed -- down from five employees to two -- that arrests have had to wait as crimes go unsolved for more than a year. In one example, a fingerprint was lifted in an April 2005 larceny case, but the print was not processed until June 2006. In the interim, investigators say, the same man had moved on from nonviolent fraud to carjacking." Detectives "complain that backlogs in the forensic services crime lab mean arrests aren't being made when they should. Law enforcement personnel described cases such as a 12-month delay in running fingerprints for an attempted murder case."

CIVIL LAW

Columnist Says Solicitor General May Be "Ultimate Authority" On Patent Law. In his Washington Post (11/6, A19) column, Charles Lane asks, "When it comes to patent law, who is the ultimate authority? Is it the Supreme Court? Or the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialty court for patent and trademark law established by Congress in 1982? Actually, it's none of the above. But before I reveal the correct answer, let me congratulate you for having read this far beyond the words 'patent law.' This eye-glazing technical topic has been known to send even people who like tax law screaming from the room. That you may still be interested shows a commendable understanding of patent law's significance, notwithstanding its arcane nature. … Arguably, the real power in patent law these days is not a court at all, but the Office of the Solicitor General." In the "10 Supreme Court patent cases in which the solicitor general has participated since 1995, the SG is undefeated, according to a recent study by Jonathan Franklin, a Supreme Court specialist at the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski. What's behind the court's deference to the executive branch? In part, say patent law specialists, it appears that the justices are increasingly second-guessing the rulings of the Federal Circuit, which was designed to help clean up patent law by concentrating all federal appeals in a single expert body. From the Federal Circuit's inception until the mid-'90s, the justices seemed content to let it call the shots. But as the information technology revolution has spread, the high court has shown a willingness to review decisions of the Federal Circuit, whose critics say it is too favorable to patent holders. None of the justices are experts on patent law. Thus, they lean heavily on the expertise of the solicitor general, who receives plenty of input from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Federal Trade Commission and others within the executive branch."

Hughes Will Case Returning To Court. USA Today (11/6, Kasindorf) reports, "Nearly 30 years after jurors declared that a will left by Howard Hughes that gave a fortune to a Utah gas station owner was fake, Melvin Dummar is back in court claiming he was cheated out of a share in the billionaire's estate. … Several weeks after Hughes died at age 70 in 1976, a will purportedly in his handwriting was discovered on a desk in the Salt Lake City headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. News media went wild over the surprising bequest of $156 million to the obscure Dummar." In 1978, Nevada and Texas juries decided the will "was a forgery. Now, Dummar, 62, says a new witness came forward in 2004 who can confirm his story. He revived the half-forgotten case in June by filing a complaint of fraud and racketeering in federal court against Hughes heir William Lummis, 85, and Frank Gay, 77, former chief operating officer of Hughes' companies."

Tennessee GOP Chair Says Fraud Possible In Memphis. The AP (11/5) reports Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis Jr. "complained to Shelby County election officials that electronic voting machine cards were missing in Memphis, the hometown of Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Harold Ford Jr." In a letter dated Thursday, Davis wrote, "It has come to our attention that several smart cards used in early voting are missing from at least one early voting site in Memphis, Tenn. The lack of oversight and control over these smart cards has created a situation which could allow for voter fraud." The letter "called on the commission to 'locate these missing smart cards as soon as possible.' Tennessee Election Coordinator Brook Thompson said Friday that even if the cards aren't recovered, there is no danger of fraud. 'The cards are programmed such that once you use them, they cannot be reused until they are reactivated by the Election Commission,' he said."

DOJ Election Monitoring Effort Includes Kansas. The Lawrence Journal-World (11/6) reports, "A federal prosecutor will be available during Tuesday's election to respond to reports of possible election fraud and voting rights violations in Kansas. Assistant U.S. Atty. Leon Patton will be available as part of the Justice Department's nationwide Election Day program, which is an effort to increase the department's ability to deter election fraud and discrimination at the polls."

"New Breed Of Activist" To Monitor Poll Stations. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Kronholz) reports that on Tuesday "a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus. Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it." "This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," said Marybeth Kuznik, "who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania." The Journal adds, "Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count."

Kentucky School District Faces DOJ Civil Rights Probe. The AP (11/5) reports, "An eastern Kentucky school district faces a federal civil rights inquiry, attorneys for the school system said. The Greenup County School District and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Civil Rights have exchanged preliminary materials, but the agency has not scheduled a visit to the area." School officials "wouldn't say what the nature of the inquiry is. Greenup Superintendent John Younce would neither confirm nor deny that an inquiry is under way or that federal officials are planning a visit to the district."

Morgan Stanley, Visa Europe To Settle Antitrust Dispute. The Financial Times (11/6, Buck) reports Morgan Stanley and Visa Europe "have agreed to settle a long-running antitrust dispute, in a move that could bring to an end a six-year competition probe by the European Commission into the credit card group. The dispute broke out after Visa refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network. The US investment bank had wanted to offer card services to shops and merchants in the European Union. However, Visa denied it access to its network, pointing to the fact that Morgan Stanley runs the Discover card in the US in competition with Visa."

CVS-Caremark Deal Would Create $75 Billion "Behemoth." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Levitz, Armstrong) reports CVS Corp.'s "$21 billion pact to buy Caremark Rx Inc. marks the biggest gamble yet for Thomas Ryan, the CVS chief who will lead the new company." Ryan "has helped build CVS from a regional drugstore chain into a national giant by buying rivals such as Revco DS Inc., Eckerd and Albertsons Inc.'s Save-On and Osco stores. Since ascending to the CEO and president posts at CVS in 1998, he has more than doubled the number of CVS stores to about 6,200. Sales are now $37 billion, up from $15 billion when he took over." The "savvy manager" has a "talent for overhauling and integrating sagging drugstore chains. But the Caremark deal, which would create a behemoth with $75 billion in annual revenue, represents a bigger deal than any he has tried before and CVS's first major acquisition of a company that isn't another drugstore chain."

Google-YouTube Antitrust Approval Noted. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B8) reports, "U.S. antitrust regulators cleared Google Inc.'s $1.65 billion purchase of online video-sharing company YouTube Inc., based on a document published Friday. No other details were available. A transaction involving Google and YouTube was listed on the Federal Trade Commission's daily publication of transactions whose reviews have been terminated."

Report Claims DOJ Declining To Prosecute FBI Terror Cases. The AP (11/5, Jordan) reports DOJ "increasingly has refused to prosecute FBI cases targeting suspected terrorists over the past five years, according to private researchers who reviewed department records. The government says the findings are inaccurate and 'intellectually dishonest.' The report being released Monday by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University raises questions about the quality of the FBI's investigations. Prosecutors declined to bring charges in 131 of 150, or 87 percent, of international terrorist case referrals from the FBI between October 2005 and June 2006, according to the report. The study was based on the most recent data available from the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys. That number marks the peak of generally steady increases from the 2001 budget year, when prosecutors rejected 33 percent of such cases from the FBI, according to the report. The data 'raise troubling questions about the bureau's investigation of criminal matters involving individuals the government has identified as international terrorists,' the report said."

USA Today (11/6, Johnson) reports DOJ "challenged the findings and said the analysis represented an 'astonishing misunderstanding' of the inner workings of the federal criminal justice system. 'This report contains inaccurate figures, relies on a faulty assumption that every referral from an investigative agency should result in a criminal prosecution and ignores the reality of how the war on terrorism is being conducted,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse." In the weeks after 9/11, DOJ "announced a dramatic transformation of its mission, from a prosecution-driven institution to an agency that emphasizes prevention and the development of a domestic intelligence system. Because of the new mission, Roehrkasse said, cases rejected for prosecution don't necessarily close investigations."

Burrus Says FBI Willing To Run Sting On Congress If Needed. McClatchy (11/5, Gordon) reports Assistant FBI Director James Burrus says the bureau "is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress." Burrus "called the bureau's public corruption program 'a sleeping giant that we've awoken,' and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area 'for many, many, many years to come.' So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office." FBI agents are investigating "about a dozen" members of Congress, "including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature. If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs."

Jefferson Fundraising Faltered In Wake Of FBI Probe Revelations. Under the headline "Probe Hits Jefferson In Wallet," the New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/4, Walsh) reported, "The federal bribery probe targeting U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is issue No. 1 in the race to unseat him, but it has also played a powerful role behind the scenes" in his reelection campaign. "Though he has not been charged, revelations that the FBI found $90,000 stashed in Jefferson's freezer in August 2005 have earned him the cold shoulder from many once-loyal donors, the majority of whom have migrated to the campaign of state Rep. Karen Carter, also a Democrat, who has become the favorite of the political establishment. … Jefferson's $151,375 haul between July 23 and Sept. 30 was eclipsed by Carter's $327,162 and Shepherd's $199,900." The Times-Picayune noted, "A review of Jefferson's campaign finance reports show that those who have stuck with him financially are members of his family, long-time friends and business associates, a few fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus and a smattering of sympathetic businesses and unions."

FBI Evidence Leads Nigeria To Charge Government Officials. ABC News (11/3, Ross, Rhee, 12:56 p.m.) reported in its "The Blotter" blog, "Nigerian officials say the bribery investigation of Congressman William Jefferson…has uncovered a massive corruption scheme involving several members at the highest levels of the Nigerian government. Acting on information provided by the FBI, Nigerian fraud investigators have now indicted Vice President Atiku Abubakar on 14 counts of corruption, involving tens of millions of dollars allegedly diverted from government accounts. According to Nuhu Ribadu, head of a new anti-corruption squad created by Nigeria's president, $23 million of the diverted money is still missing. Ribadu said $6.7 million of the missing funds has been traced to a U.S. company tied to Congressman Jefferson's family." ABC noted, "Several other top Nigerian officials, including a state governor, have also been implicated in the scheme to divert government funds."

Mississippi Mayor Indicted On Fraud Conspiracy Charges. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger/AP(11/4) reported Winstonville, Miss., Mayor Milton Tutwiler "and a business partner have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to defraud the federal government." Tutwiler and Kenneth L. Blockett "are accused in connection with a more than $1.3 million grant by Mid-Delta Empowerment Zone Alliance to Winstonville to construct a building for the Mound Bayou Chemical Co. in 2001. The indictment also charged misapplication of funds by Tutwiler." The AP noted, "The case was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service, the FBI and the state auditor's office. The grant for the project, predicted to bring 150 jobs to the Delta, was awarded in August, 2001. … However, the plant never finished and never opened."

Prominent Florida Lobbyist Indicted In Palm Beach Corruption Probe. The Palm Beach Post (11/4, Dubocq, Musgrave) reported, "Political fallout again shook Palm Beach County government Friday when William Boose, a powerful lobbyist and former planning director, was charged as a co-conspirator in the federal corruption case against former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti." Boose "is accused of helping to conceal Masilotti's $1.3 million profit from a government land deal." The Post noted, "A grand jury accused Boose of helping Masilotti cover up a scheme to secretly profit from a 2003 land deal in Martin County. When FBI agents started asking questions, Boose allegedly lied and falsified legal bills to disguise the fact he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services. … His business relationship with the commissioner never was disclosed, the grand jury reported."

Former Florida FCI Guards Convicted In Sex-For-Contraband Scheme. The Tallahassee Democrat (11/4, Subramanyam) reported, "Two former Federal Correctional Institution officers are headed to prison following their convictions Friday evening in federal court." Gregory Dixon "was found guilty on three counts of bribery after three former and current FCI inmates testified he gave them contraband in exchange for sex. … He was found not guilty on two conspiracy charges and witness tampering. He was found guilty on the charge of conspiracy to accept illegal gratuity, which carries a lesser sentence." Codefendant Alan Moore "was convicted of witness tampering and on the lesser charges of conspiracy and accepting illegal gratuity. He was found not guilty of bribery involving an exchange of contraband for sex." The AP (11/4, Kaczor) added, "'Any prosecution is trying to send a message,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls said after the verdict. Defense lawyer Robert Harper said he didn't think it would be the right kind of message, though. 'This case to me sends a dangerous message to every male correctional officer at every female correctional institution,' Harper said."

Executive Pleads Guilty In Indiana Concrete Price-Fixing Probe. The Indianapolis Star (11/4, Corcoran) reported, "Only two area ready-mix concrete executives are still awaiting trial in connection with a broad price-fixing conspiracy after Friday's sudden guilty plea by a third executive in federal court. Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., are scheduled to go on trial Nov. 13." The Star noted that Builder's Concrete & Supply Vice President John J. Blatzheim "pleaded guilty Friday, acknowledging he joined the local conspiracy in April 2003. In exchange, federal prosecutors dismissed a charge of lying to the FBI and antitrust investigators that carried a five-year prison term."

Judge Grants US Request To Maintain Custody Of Jeffs Evidence. The Deseret Morning News (11/4, Winslow) reported, "Federal authorities are trying to keep their hands on evidence seized by the FBI when Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs was captured. In an unusual move, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah asked a Nevada federal judge to let three of its lawyers handle the evidence battle," and "on Friday, a federal judge in Las Vegas granted their request." Defense lawyers say the "seized documents, letters and other papers…are protected by the FLDS leader's right to freedom of religion and clergy-communicant privilege," but "federal prosecutors in Utah have filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to seek a grand-jury indictment should he ever be granted bail." The Morning News noted, "Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in August during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas."

FBI Considering Billboard Campaign Boston Art Theft Investigation. The Boston Globe (11/4, Murphy) reported, "The FBI is considering a billboard campaign as part of its international hunt for $300 million worth of artwork that was stolen from the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston in 1990 by thieves who masqueraded as police officers to get inside, according to the agency 'We are evaluating investigative techniques designed to solicit information from the public regarding the investigation, including the use of billboards,' said Thomas Larned, an assistant special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office. … Larned said that using billboards as part of a publicity campaign was under consideration, 'however we have no imminent plans.'" The Globe notes, "Julian Radcliffe -- chairman of the Art Loss Register in London, which is the world's largest database of stolen art and antiques dedicated to their recovery -- said he had never heard of billboards being used to help locate stolen pieces. Radcliffe added, "I think the chances of it attracting somebody who knows where the pictures are is probably not very high."

Boston SAC Appointed FBI Inspection Division Chief. In a story taking very positive tone toward FBI Boston SAC Kenneth W. Kaiser, the Boston Globe (11/4, Murphy) reported the he was appointed Friday "to serve as assistant director of the Inspection Division, which evaluates and audits the work of the FBI's field offices, conducts internal investigations of alleged misconduct by bureau employees, and investigates shootings by FBI agents. It will be a bittersweet departure for Kaiser, who said yesterday that he regrets being unable to capture fugitive gangster James

'Whitey' Bulger," but Kaiser "said he believes that he has left the once-beleaguered office in better shape than he found it by repairing the FBI's relationship with other law enforcement agencies after it had been badly frayed by corrupt agents who protected Bulger from prosecution and helped him slip away just before his 1995 indictment." Kaiser said in a telephone interview, "I think the perception now is that the FBI is a team player…that we really are looking for Whitey Bulger, and that the Boston office isn't a corrupt office." The AP (11/4) noted, "During Kaiser's tenure, the bureau launched an investigation into the Big Dig and secured an indictment an alleged Al Qaeda operative. He also commanded an emergency team in Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina.

Murdered Virginia Woman Was Undercover Informant For Police, FBI. The Washington Times (11/6, McElhatton) reports, "An Alexandria woman fatally shot last month in what police are calling a targeted hit worked undercover and cooperated with the FBI in violent-crime and drug cases up and down the East Coast, previously sealed records show." Bethlehem Ayele "assisted in a homicide investigation in Connecticut, arranged an FBI sting in Florida and testified against drug dealers in the District." She was killed "while waiting at a stoplight," and "the shooting prompted immediate speculation about whether Miss Ayele's death was tied to her testimony against members of the so-called Murder Inc. drug gang in the District. … 'Detectives still believe she was targeted, but they have not determined exactly why,' Amy Bertsch, a spokeswoman for the Alexandria Police Department, said yesterday."

California Marijuana Law Said To Create Risk For Doctors. The AP (11/5, Leff) reports that since California "passed the nation's first medical marijuana law a decade ago, a provision requiring written doctor approval to grow and buy pot has created conflict between the state mandate and federal drug laws, and strained the doctor-patient relationship. Until the stalemate is resolved, doctors recommending marijuana do it with trepidation and a good deal of risk. … Although a federal appeals court ruled four years ago that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration cannot go after doctors merely because they recommend marijuana to patients, the state medical board's guidelines make it clear the ruling did not amount to immunity either from prosecution or disciplinary proceedings."

Future Of Law Unclear. In a separate story, the AP (11/5) writes, "A decade ago, California voters were the first in the United States to approve medical marijuana, and 10 other states have since followed suit. But the future of the landmark California statute is no clearer now than when voters headed to the polls on Nov. 5, 1996. The federal government still refuses to recognize Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act approved by 56 percent of voters. … The DEA says it is targeting dispensaries and other large–scale growing and selling operations, whether the marijuana is for medical or illicit use." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include CBS News, FOX News, Forbes, the Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Boston Herald, and Arizona Republic.

Medical Marijuana Claims Seen As Misleading. In Los Angeles, KCAL-TV (11/3) reports on its Web site that the assertion that all medical marijuana "is headed for seriously ill patients is misleading," based on statistics from the California Branch of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML)." The DEA and its local and state counterparts "routinely report that large-scale drug traffickers hide behind and invoke Proposition 215, even when there is no evidence of any medical claim."

In Alabama, British Aristocrat Admits Role In Transporting 15,000 Pounds Of Marijuana. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (11/4, Kirby) reports a British aristocrat who "fought extradition to the United States for the better part of a decade stood in handcuffs and leg shackles Friday before a federal judge in Mobile to admit his guilt in a massive drug conspiracy. Giles Richard Carlyle-Clarke…pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. He admitted responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana that came into the country by way of Baldwin County and St. Petersburg, Fla." Prosecutors "hailed the plea as the latest victory in an investigation that dates to the 1980s and has resulted in more than 70 indictments and 65 convictions."

The AP (11/3) also reports on Carlyle-Clarke's guilty plea.

Texas Authorities Grapple With High Cost Of Destroying Drugs. In McAllen, Texas, the AP (11/5, Brezosky) reports in a region that "is a gateway for drugs coming from Latin America and bound for cities throughout the United States, destroying drugs means sending a caravan of vehicles and officers on a two-day trip costing $8,000 to $10,000. For McAllen, in particular, it means unloading tons of contraband from the 8-foot by 40-foot evidence bunker and into a rented moving van, which is then driven to a privately run incinerator near Dallas. … 'For obvious reasons of security and safety, we can't reveal where we burn or destroy our evidence, but it is a concern for us in terms of the costliness of it,' Houston-based DEA spokesman Ray D'Alessio said. 'We're exploring different options right now.'"

Houston DEA Agent Targeted By Ex-Wife In Murder-For-Hire Case. The Houston Chronicle (11/5, Rogers) reports a Houston DEA agent's ex-wife "pleaded guilty Friday to trying to hire someone to kill him. Pamela Bishop, 38, got deferred adjudication for solicitation of capital murder of Donald Noell Bishop. The conviction will be dropped from her criminal record if she stays out of trouble the next six years. … Except for saying the incident stemmed from an acrimonious divorce, her attorney…declined to comment on the circumstances surrounding the charge because the couple are still in a custody fight for their children."

Colorado Newspaper Endorses Marijuana Amendment. The Rocky Mountain News (11/3) reports the Colorado Springs Gazette has endorsed Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of small amounts of marijuana. 'We encourage freedom lovers to vote yes on Amendment 44,' the newspaper said on its editorial page. 'The long journey toward a more rational and workable national drug control policy begins with a single step,'" the newspaper said.

IMMIGRATION

Texas Launches Online Border Monitoring. The AP (11/4) reported, "Texas launched its ambitious effort to use Internet users to watch the border for illegal immigrants. But the network of surveillance cameras was plagued by technical problems, the images were grainy and the cameras were placed so high that it was hard to distinguish a person from, say, a bush. Republican Gov. Rick Perry, who announced plans over the summer to spend $5 million on the virtual posse, asked for 'forgiveness on the front end of this,' but dismissed the problems as routine computer glitches."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (11/4, Mcgee) reported, "Gov. Rick Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said Friday that cameras may have been down for temporary adjustments and that the Web site is still a 'test site.' … The Border Patrol has cameras in every sector of Texas' border with Mexico, said Mike Friel, spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection. He said the cameras work in daylight or at night and can be rotated 180 degrees by the Border Patrol agents or National Guardsmen who use them." The cameras "were installed free by companies that hope to win contracts when the governor installs more, Walt said. Perry wants to have 70 to 100 cameras on the border eventually, she said."

Judge Rules City Officials Cannot Fine Landlords For Housing Illegal Immigrants. US News and World Report (11/5) reports, "The country's immigration battle took another turn last week when a federal judge blocked two landmark immigration ordinances in Hazleton, Pa., from being enforced just hours before they were to go into effect. The measures, now on hold until November 14, would have allowed city officials to fine landlords housing illegal immigrants and deny business permits to companies that hire them. Judge James Munley said enforcement would cause 'irreparable harm' to businesses catering to Hispanics. His decision was in response to a suit filed by Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union."

Border Agents Plan To Appeal Shooting Sentence. The Washington Times (11/6, Seper) reports, that Jose Alonso Compean, 28, and Ignacio Ramos, 37, "sentenced to lengthy prison terms for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect as he fled across the Rio Grande want a new trial, saying three jurors claim they were pressured into returning guilty verdicts." Compean was sntenced to 12 years in prison, and Ramos to 11, for "causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation." Ramos' attorney, Mary Stillinger, "plans to appeal the case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans based, in part, on sworn affidavits of three jurors -- Robert Gourley, Claudia Torres and Edine Woods -- who said they were incorrectly instructed that their verdict had to be unanimous and that the judge would not accept a hung jury."

CNN Live Sunday (11/5, 6:37 p.m.) contrasts Compean and Ignacio's sentences with six-year sentences handed down against two agents convicted of taking bribes. CNN notes that Compean and Ignacio were charged under a law intended to prosecute drug smugglers and other violent criminals. Former prosecutor Laurie Levenson added, "Prosecutor have lots of discretion in deciding what charges to bring. … Once prosecutors decide an agent has crossed the line into criminal behavior, they are inclined to throw the book at them."

CBP Debuts Unmanned Aerial Vehicles At Mexican Border. The Washington Times (11/6, Seper) reports, "U.S. Customs and Border Protection has launched its newest weapon in securing the nation's borders with the debut of an unmanned aerial vehicle capable of providing an 'eye in the sky' for Border Patrol agents on the ground. … The agency's new unmanned aircraft, known as the MQ-9 Predator B, began limited operations last week from Libby Army Airfield in Fort Huachuca, Ariz., to support enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexico border. The aircraft was introduced during ceremonies Tuesday in Arizona hosted by Air and Marine Assistant Commissioner Michael Kostelnik." The unmanned aircraft "give the agency improved and expanded mission capabilities to meet what" CBP Commissioner W. Ralph. Basham "has described as 'the continuing terrorist threat to our nation.'"

Impact Of 1986 Immigrant Reform Bill Assessed. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Henao) reports, "Twenty years ago Monday, Congress passed the largest effort to date to curb undocumented immigration to this country. Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), employers were sanctioned for the first time for hiring undocumented workers." The bill "also called for tighter controls along the Mexican border. But the bill was a compromise: Enforcement was balanced by an amnesty provision." Nearly "3 million undocumented immigrants were granted legal residence under the amnesty. Most of them were Mexican (more than 80 percent) and lived in the Los Angeles area. Salvadorans, Filipinos, Haitians, Poles, and Vietnamese also benefited from the program." Critics "say the bill set a damaging precedent for future amnesties. IRCA supporters say the word 'amnesty' mischaracterizes the bill's intent." Former Rep. Romano Mazzoli, a sponsor of IRCA, "defends the bill as the best way to combat illegal immigration at the time. The six administrations that followed, he says, are to blame for not enforcing tighter restrictions." The Monitor also examines the stories of seven immigrants who took advantage of the amnesty program.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION

Bush Welcomes Saddam Death Sentence As Some Question Pre-Election Timing. The death sentence given Sunday to former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and two former senior members of his regime dominates Monday's headlines. On the only network news broadcast Sunday evening, ABC World News (10/30, lead story, 2:50, Harris) lead its program with a report on the sentencing. As party of its report, ABC noted briefly that President Bush, while campaigning in Texas yesterday, "called the outcome of that trial a milestone for the Iraqi people. He said the verdict and death sentence provide a verdict and measure of justice many thought would never come." Bush was shown saying, "Iraq has a lot of work ahead as it builds its society, as it delivers equal justice and protects all its citizens. Yet, history will regard today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

The AP (11/6, Loven) reports Bush "painted Saddam's conviction and sentence as vindication of the sacrifices made by American soldiers in Iraq. More than 2,800 members of the US military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003." Said Bush, "They've sacrificed for the security of the United States. … Without their courage and skill, today's verdict would not have happened." AFP (11/6, Knox), meanwhile, says that "two days before Tuesday's vote, dozens of congressional races were too close to call and two national public opinion surveys favored Democrats overall but suggested a late burst of energy among Bush's Republicans." Bush "was in Nebraska and Kansas as part of an 11th-hour political rescue mission for struggling Republican candidates facing unexpectedly strong Democratic challenges in part because of anger at the war in Iraq. 'Saddam Hussein was a threat,' he said, amid signs the conflict could cost his party control of the US Congress. 'My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off for it.'"

Some Democrats and media analysts suggested the timing of the sentence was designed to influence the US elections. In its report on the sentencing, the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A3, Shishkin) notes, "With US congressional elections taking place this week, many Iraqis suspect the Bush administration somehow influenced the timing of the sentence to benefit the Republican party," but White House spokesman Tony Snow Sunday dismissed the idea as "preposterous."

The Washington Post (11/6, A16, Baker) reports, "Bush called the verdict a "landmark event" in Iraq's transition to democracy, and aides hoped it would be seen as vindication of his decision to go to war. Democrats were quick to agree that justice had been done for a vicious tyrant but argued it would not fix what they see as the debacle in Iraq." The Post also notes that the timing of the verdict "stirred anxiety among Democrats who worried it could be a 'November surprise' that would persuade Republicans to turn out," and "some voiced suspicions that the Bush administration had orchestrated the court schedule to influence the vote, a contention the White House rejected."

The New York Times (11/6, Nagourney, Rutenberg) says Bush "seized on the conviction of Saddam Hussein as a milestone in Iraq, seeking to rally Republican voters with the issue of national security as some polls suggested that his party might be making gains in the final hours of the campaign." The Times also notes that the White House "said the timing of the announcement, two days before Election Day, had nothing to do with American politics and had been dictated by the Iraqi court. But Mr. Bush moved quickly to put it to use in what has been his central strategic imperative over the past week, trying to rouse Republican voters to turn out."

The issue also came up on the Sunday political talk shows. On CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer) White House spokesman Tony Snow said the claim that the verdict was timed to coincide with US elections is "preposterous," Adding, "This is one of these tinfoil hat sort of things, where people suddenly decide, if there is news that may call into questions the things that they've been saying, that somehow we've been scheming and plotting with the Iraqis. … The important thing about this is we've got an independent Iraqi judiciary. The Iraqis are the ones who conducted the trial. The Iraqi judges are the ones who spent all the time poring over the evidence from July 27 to the present."

House majority leader John Boehner was asked on Fox News Sunday (11/5, Wallace) if he thinks the Saddam Hussein verdict will "energize" Republicans, Boehner replied, "I think so. … Democrats just want to give up in Iraq. They just want to pull out the troops. We're in a very serious war with people who want to kill us. And if we don't win in Iraq, we're going to embolden terrorists all over the world. And today's victory is a victory for the Iraqi people."

Sen. Elizabeth Dole, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert), said, "I think what this shows is that the Iraqis are putting their past behind them; the establishment of the rule of law. I feel that this will mean they are moving forward.

On NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert) Rep. Rahm Emanuel commented that though "it's good that he is behind bars and getting the justice that he deserves…I would also like to remind that, about three years ago when he was caught…there were about 800 Americans who were dead at that point. Today there are a little over 2,800 Americans that have died. It won't change the facts on the ground there. And it won't impact the election here."

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, on CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer) said, "This is another step forward in making sure that we defeat radical Islam and keep the homeland safe. … This is now one more step in building a safe and a more secure Iraq. And we've had other victories that people don't focus on."

GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, discussing the sentencing, called for deployment of additional US troops to Iraq. During an appearance on CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer), Graham said that while the verdict is "a step forward" the overall violence "is worse. And I don't think we've ever had enough troops on the ground. … You'll never convince me that the security apparatus that we have in place now is working. We need more Iraqi troops. We need more American troops, coalition troops, in the short-term. To have a democracy, you can't have this level of violence."

Reactions To Saddam Death Sentence Said To Highlight Rift Among Iraqis. The Washington Times/AP (11/6, Hurst) reports, "An Iraqi court yesterday sentenced Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, convicting the former dictator and six subordinates in the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail in 1982." Saddam "trembled and shouted 'God is great' when Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman declared the former leader guilty and sentenced him to hang." The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Peterson) notes Saddam also "accused the judge of the US-created tribunal of being a 'mouthpiece of occupation and colonialism,' and cursed 'your law and your articles and clauses.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/6, Daragahi) says the trial, "once viewed as a means of reconciliation and justice, instead seemed to fuel the sectarian division that grips the country. Some Shiites and Kurds celebrated. Some Sunnis mourned angrily."

USA Today (11/6, Brook) reports "celebratory gunfire that erupted Sunday after the announcement of Saddam Hussein's death sentence dissipated quickly as Iraqis went about their lives in a city fractured by sectarian violence." In other areas, "the verdict was denounced. Demonstrators in Tikrit, the former Iraqi leader's hometown, defied a curfew and carried his picture through the streets. Residents of some Sunni neighborhoods in the capital traded gunfire with police, while mortar shells burst in other Sunni areas."

In a front page report, the Washington Post (11/6, A1, Knickmeyer) says that following the sentencing, "A divided and violence-ridden Iraq broke into starkly disparate displays of emotion." The Post notes that the US "largely funded Hussein's trial, and US officials close to the trial said Sunday's outcome vindicated the policy of having courts in individual nations try cases involving war crimes and crimes against humanity. The Bush administration has been a leading opponent of international tribunals, fearing that US soldiers could be tried before them for political reasons."

The Chicago Tribune (11/6, Madhani) notes "the court also convicted former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan of premeditated murder and sentenced him to life in prison. Three other co-defendants of Hussein -- Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, Ali Dayih Ali and Abdullah Kazim -- were convicted of murder and torture and sentenced to up to 15 years in prison." An eighth defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, "a low-ranking Baath party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence."

Also on its front page, the New York Times (11/6, A1, Burns, Semple) reports that although "an automatic appeal of the death sentence will delay it…some Iraqi judicial officials privately held out the possibility that Mr. Hussein could go to the gallows in a matter of months, perhaps before next spring. That may depend on behind-the-scenes maneuvering by Mr. Hussein's embattled successors in Iraq's new government, who have already shown that they are not hesitant to pressure judges in the case." Meanwhile, the Times says the "contrasting reaction to the verdicts, in the heavily fortified courthouse in Baghdad and across Iraq, was a testament to the bitter divisions sown by the toppling of Mr. Hussein in April 2003, and to the country's spiraling descent since then into a near-anarchy of insurgency and sectarian killing." Outside of Iraq, the reaction "was negative from some in other Arab countries and from Western legal-monitoring and rights groups, which had been critical of procedures at the trial, saying they were loaded in favor of 'victor's justice' and that the Bush administration should have insisted that an international court hear the cases." The New York Times (11/6, Tavernise) runs another story on the verdict titled "In A Divided Iraq, Reaction To Saddam Death Sentence Conforms To Sectarian Lines."

In a report on Iraqis' reactions to the sentence, the Washington Post (11/6, A15, Raghavan, Dehema) says that "for the Sunnis of Kadhimiyah, the verdict drove another nail into the coffin of the man many still see as the leader of their community, which once ruled Iraq but now feels more besieged than ever. The sentence, some said, was the work of a victor's court that was more interested in vengeance than judicial fairness." Meanwhile, "For the more numerous Shiites…after decades of repression under Hussein's government, the verdict delivered the justice they have long sought. … Shiites also rejoiced in the hope that their political future in Iraq and in the region would become more secure."

The Financial Times (11/6, A1, Negus) says the court is expected "to produce a long written explanation of its judgment in the coming weeks, which legal experts say will be crucial in determining whether Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants were given a fair hearing."

Under the headline "Hussein Sentence Could Heighten Rifts In Iraq," the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A3, Shishkin) warns that sentence "could deepen Iraq's sectarian rifts and inflame the anti-American insurgency. … With violence on the streets of Baghdad at its highest level in years, the verdict is unlikely to alter the pattern of the sectarian conflict or attacks against US troops, but it will provide another divisive issue for a country struggling to hold itself together." For example, the Journal notes that "in a sign of how embittered the Sunnis are at Iraq's current leadership, Saleh al-Mutlaq, [a] Sunni politician, warned that the verdict could lead to more sectarian attacks for which the Shiite government will bear responsibility."

In a separate report on reaction around the Middle East, the New York Times (11/6, Fattah) reports that "many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair. … Many analysts and others in the region who followed the trial said that what mattered was how the court had reached its judgment and that the process had seemed highly flawed. But critics and supporters of Mr. Hussein…said they were left with more frustration than closure. Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair. They said it had seemed politicized, that the judges had not seemed to be in control of the process and that rulings about procedures had seemed contradictory. Almost everyone agreed that the verdict was unlikely to stop the violence gripping Iraq."

The AP (11/6, Kole) reports, "Worldwide, the range of reactions -- including a European outcry over capital punishment and doubts about the fairness of the tribunal that ordered Saddam to hang -- reflected new geopolitical fault lines drawn after America's decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and depose its dictator." The European Union "welcomed the verdict but said Saddam should not be put to death. At the Vatican, Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues, called the sentence a throwback to 'eye for an eye' vengeance." Islamic leaders "warned that executing Saddam could inflame those who revile the U.S., undermining President Bush's policy in the Middle East and inspiring terrorists."

In an analysis, the AP (11/6, Reid) says, "The future of Iraq may depend little on whether Saddam Hussein hangs. The Sunni insurgency is so deeply entrenched and sectarian bloodlust so strong that Iraq seems set to continue spiraling into violence—regardless of its former president's fate. Some fear that the Saddam verdict, by angering the Sunni minority, could intensify the violence once a curfew in Baghdad is lifted. Others say they hope the verdict gives Iraqis a chance 'to unite and build a better future,' in the words of the US Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. But in the end, Saddam's fate is not what's driving the violence in Iraq now. Instead, religious, nationalistic and sectarian passions have taken over and are tearing the country apart."

The New York Times (11/6, Preston) reports, "Lawyers and human rights advocates broadly agreed that the Iraqi tribunal's proceedings frequently fell short of international standards for war crimes cases." But "even critics of the trial said the five Iraqi judges who heard the case had made a reasonable effort to conduct a fair trial in the face of sustained pressure from Iraqi political leaders for a swift death sentence. American lawyers pointed to substantial evidence offered by the prosecution implicating Mr. Hussein in the crimes against humanity with which he had been charged." McClatchy (11/6, Youssef) and USA Today (11/6, Jervis), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

The Washington Post (11/6, Kennicott) analyzes Saddam's demeanor during the sentencing, saying "Hussein managed to remain consistent to his prewar public image throughout it all. The military fatigues came off, but with his Koran in hand and the formulaic and economical arm gestures of an impatient despot he never seemed anything less than entirely convinced that he was still Saddam Hussein, a latter-day incarnation of Nebuchadnezzar. Throughout it all, he had a loyal audience. … A broken man doesn't take such care with his cuffs, nor stuff a handkerchief in his breast pocket, as Hussein did for his court appearance. Only the fatigue in his eyes and the gaunt appearance of his face suggested any sign of soul searching -- and even that reading of his visage is probably wishful thinking."

NYTimes Criticizes Trial, Urges Appeals Court To Defer Death Sentence. The New York Times (11/6) editorializes, "Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial 'a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.'" The Times adds, "The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds."

More Commentary. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/6), former CPA head Paul Bremer writes, "Without resolving Saddam Hussein's fate -- and the human-rights record of the regime he led -- the Shiites and Kurds can never make true peace with their Sunni fellow citizens. So the verdict should be seen as a necessary, though not sufficient, step in helping Iraq's persecuted majority put behind them the awful years of Saddam's brutal rule."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/6) says "the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded."

The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14) editorializes, "Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq." But "to make it permanent, the US must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the US commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job."

Cheney Says Election Won't Affect Bush's Policies In Iraq. Vice President Cheney, asked on ABC's This Week (11/5) if he foresees Tuesday's vote having any influence over "the President's Iraq policy," replied, "I think it'll have some effect, perhaps, in the Congress, but the President's made clear what his objective is: It's victory in Iraq, and it's full speed ahead on that basis. And that's exactly what we're going to do." When host George Stephanopoulos noted that "it seems like the public has turned against it right now," Cheney said, "It may not be popular with the public. It doesn't matter in the sense that we have to continue the mission and do what we think it right. And that's exactly what we're doing. We're not running for office; we're doing what we think it right."

The Financial Times (11/6, Luce) notes Cheney also "said that a US withdrawal from Iraq would undermine the 'war on terror' by sending the wrong signals to allies such as Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, and Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan. 'You cannot make national security policy on the basis of that [election outcomes],' he said."

The AP (11/6), meanwhile, reports Cheney "will spend Election Day on his first hunting trip since he accidentally shot a companion last February while aiming at a covey of quail on a private Texas ranch."

Cheney Claims Lamont's Primary Win Boosted Iraqi Insurgents. Stephanopoulos also asked Cheney, on ABC's This Week (11/5), if a Democratic victory would also represent a victory for Iraqi insurgents. Cheney responded, "I think what they're trying to do, obviously, is execute on their strategy. And if you think about their strategy, it isn't to defeat us militarily; they can't do that. But what they're betting on -- Osama bin Laden talks about it -- is that they can, in fact, ultimately break the will of the American people, that they can persuade enough Americans that we'll ultimately leave. And then they cite Beirut in 1983, Mogadishu in 1993 as examples where the U.S. took casualties and then departed. So that's their basic, fundamental, underlying strategy. … I think when they see something happen, such as happened in Connecticut this year, where the Democratic Party, in effect, purged Joe Lieberman, primarily over his support for the president and the war, that says to them that their strategy is working."

Biden Calls Cheney "Somewhere Between Dysfunctional And Delusional." Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (11/5, Schieffer) if the elections will impact "the president's war policy and what's going on in Iraq," Sen. Joseph Biden answered, "I do. Notwithstanding what Vice President Cheney says, that it won't have any impact at all, or that it's going to disregard the elections as it relates to Iraq. I think the combination of the Army Times and the Navy Times calling for Rumsfeld's resignation, which is a slap in the face of the way this war is being run, as well as the neo-conservatives like Perle and Adelman calling the president's policy dysfunctional, I think all of this is mounting. And what's going to happen is, if we make gains in the House and Senate, whether we win them or not, I think you'll see a lot of Republicans willing to join me and others in a plan for Iraq that is a rational way in which we can responsibly bring home more troops and leave a stable Iraq behind." Biden added that Cheney is "somewhere between dysfunctional and delusional about this war. … The fact of the matter is, very few Republicans in the Senate, if any, think the policy makes any sense the way we're going now."

Emanuel Outlines Democrats' "Five Basic Principles" Regarding Iraq. Rep. Rahm Emanuel was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert) if the Democrats have a plan for changing US policy on war in Iraq, Emanuel answered, "Whether Senator Biden's idea on Iraq -- which I think is a strong idea -- Senator Levin's program, Congressman Jack Murtha, and Congressman Ike Skelton, there are five basic principles that hold Democrats together on our approach to Iraq: First, regional cooperation; second, reconciliation among the parties; third, reconstruction of the economy; fourth, responsibility for results; and fifth is redeployment from Iraq. Those are the five principles."

White House Said To Be Making Plans To Work With A Democratic Congress. The New York Times' "White House Memo" (11/6, Stolberg, Sanger) reports, "In recent weeks, President Bush, as well, has appeared to dig in his heels on the war in Iraq, saying he would consider changes in tactics but not strategy." But "with Mr. Bush facing the likelihood of a remade political landscape in Washington, even if his party holds on to both houses of Congress, the White House is sending signals that Mr. Bush is open to a shift in approach. After six years of virtually ignoring Democrats as he pressed his own party to do his bidding on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush and his aides are charting a course that they say will take the president back to his roots as Texas governor, when he worked in a more bipartisan way with Democrats." They "are piecing together a domestic agenda that includes reviving the president's failed bid to overhaul entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, White House officials and allies of the administration said. The president has assigned Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to spearhead the effort, and the White House says it is quietly reaching out to Democrats on Capitol Hill."

Parties Unleash GOTV Efforts As GOP Sees Glimer Of Hope In Last-Minute Polls. The Washington Post (11/6, A1, Balz, VandeHei) reports, "Republicans seized on signs of movement in their direction yesterday as they unleashed a massive election-eve voter mobilization operation in an effort to stave off potentially substantial losses in the House and preserve at least a slender majority in the Senate." Democrats "answered the Republicans' get-out-the-vote machinery with intensified efforts to contact infrequent and still-undecided voters in a handful of tight Senate races as well as in a dozen GOP-held House districts where races were too close to call." A Pew Research Center poll "showed a significant narrowing in the partisan advantage in House races that the Democrats have enjoyed for much of the year, findings that echoed those of a Washington Post-ABC News poll released Saturday showing the Democrats with a six-point edge." The Pew poll "showed that the Democratic advantage had dropped to 47 percent to Republicans' 43 percent among likely voters, down from 50 percent to 39 percent two weeks ago. The poll found a drop in Democratic support among independents, but Pew Director Andrew Kohut said the most significant change over the past two weeks is that Republicans now outnumber Democrats among likely voters." However, "other weekend polls by Time and Newsweek magazines continued to show Republicans at a steep disadvantage, with Democrats enjoying double-digit margins in party preferences for the House."

ABC World News (10/30, story 2, 2:40, Morrell) last night also noted its own poll showing "51% of likely voters favor Democrats. 45% support Republicans. But that spread is shrinking, down eight points in two weeks." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary, was shown saying, "We don't look at this with rose-colored glasses. We look at every single race. The President's been out. And he's active in a lot of close campaigns. Look, we think we're going to hold the House and Senate." White House "officials acknowledge they will lose seats Tuesday. But believe they can escape with a slim majority. As one senior advisor told me…that this election is going to look a lot like 2000. After that election, the Senate was split 50-50. And Republicans held a seven-seat edge in the House. But even that would require everything breaking the GOP's way."

Despite some of the late polling, most media reports last night and this morning continue to suggest a big Democratic win is more than likely. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Feldmann), in a story headlined "All Signs Point To A US House Run By Democrats," says "If most of the political prognosticators are calling it right, the House of Representatives is poised for a change of leadership: the first Democratic majority in 12 years. Among the nonpartisan analysts who study the polls and dynamics of each of the 435 House races, the more cautious see the lower range of the Democratic net gain at about 20 seats -- more than enough to achieve the 15-seat net gain needed to take control. On the higher end, the Democrats could achieve a more commanding takeover with net gains of 30 to 40 seats, they say."

The AP (11/6, Espo) says Republicans "are staggering into the final hours of the election campaign like a spent force, with a less than lofty goal of losing seats but clinging to power. Political scandal already has claimed some of those who swept to power a dozen years ago…and tarnished the rest." The Financial Times (11/6, Yeager, Pennsylvania) runs a similar piece under the headline "Hopes Run Low For Republicans."

ABC World News (10/30, story 3, 2:15, Harris) reported "the Democrats are smelling opportunity. And they are bringing out their big guns in these final hours." ABC (Cordes) added, "Democrats were upbeat in this final weekend of campaigning. Some top Democratic strategists now predict that come Tuesday, the party could pick up double the 15 seats it needs to win control of the House of Representatives."

ABC World News (10/30, story 4, 2:40, Stephanopoulos) said "the story of the night," referring to Tuesday, is that "the Republican party is on defense. On one level, that's what always happens to Presidents in their sixth year. But this time around, it's intensified by the war. The war in Iraq. The number one issue. It's held down the President. It's held down Republicans. That's why there's so many seats in play." Gibson: "Everyone wonders how quickly will we know? And I'm fascinated by the illustration, when you look at the states across the East and Midwest. You go from Connecticut, to Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. Those states. There are 21 seats at play. And every one of them to are seats in the House that the Republicans are having to defend."

USA Today (11/6, Page) reports a new "national USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds remarkable parallels between the congressional elections Tuesday and the watershed elections in 1994 that swept Republicans into control of Congress. Then, likely voters by 51%-44% favored GOP congressional candidates. Now, 51%-44% favor Democratic ones. Then, 52% said they were paying 'quite a lot' of attention to the elections, the highest since the Gallup Poll began asking the question in 1958. Now, 50% say they are paying 'quite a lot' of attention. Then, disapproval of Congress was at 66%. Now, disapproval of Congress is at 70%."

USA Today (11/6, Lawrence) also reports, "Both political parties are making huge last-minute cash infusions into close House and Senate races, underscoring their traditional importance in endgame spending and the Democrats' new financial competitiveness with Republicans. Just since Friday, Republicans have put more than $2 million into Senate races in New Jersey, Tennessee and Virginia, federal reports show. Democrats have spent $1.1 million for Senate candidates in Maryland, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia." On the House side, Republicans "spent $1.1 million in a single day to help Peter Roskam in his race against Democrat Tammy Duckworth in Illinois. And in a sign of continuing concern, the Republicans invested $275,000 to help their embattled House campaign chief, New York Rep. Tom Reynolds." USA Today adds, "A check of 10 tight House races shows that as of Friday, Democratic party committees had spent nearly as much as Republicans in Indiana, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington. They outspent Republicans in New Hampshire, Connecticut and Arizona."

The New York Times (11/6, Zernike), in a story titled "National Issues, Led by Iraq, Dominate Final Appeals in Congressional Campaigns ," says Republicans are trying to ruen the election on local issues. However, "across the country, candidates clashed Sunday over the war, immigration, the economy, ethics and the Bush administration, seeking advantage in the closing hours of an election that will determine control of the House and the Senate."

The Washington Times (11/6, Hurt), in a story titled "Bitter Campaign Boils Down To Party Turnout," says Democrats "must overcome a Republican ground game that exceeded nearly all expectations in the past two national elections." Republican leaders, meanwhile, "continued warning yesterday that Election Day could be bleak for them and urged their conservative base to turn out."

The Washington Post (11/6, Grunwald) reports, "The season of persuasion is over. This is the season of motivation. … In the campaign's final weekend, candidates weren't trying to turn out voters who might not vote their way. They were chasing the 'ones and twos,' political-junkie shorthand for the most likely supporters on their computer-generated lists, and firing up their volunteers." The Los Angeles Times (11/6, Wallsten, Haburger) asks, "Which political force will prove stronger -- the niche-marketing effort, led by GOP strategist Karl Rove and powered by computerized outreach methods, or the classic 'throw the bums out' mood of an electorate uneasy with the Iraq war and unhappy with one-party rule? … As the two campaigns make their final appeals, the differences suggest that many of the advantages that have boosted Republicans to victory in the past -- more money, redrawn congressional districts and the superior voter targeting demonstrated by Shaw's courtship of Jews, Latinos and seniors -- may be less potent this time."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Chaddock) reports, "Until the 2002 campaign, Democrats, backed by labor union supporters, typically had the edge in turning out their voters. But the '72-hour' get-out-the-vote (GOTV) program developed by Karl Rove, President Bush's adviser, and Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee (RNC) chairman -- which includes microtargeted voter lists and a nearly year-round mobilization effort -- gave Republicans a strategic and technological edge that helped them hold onto the House and Senate in the past two elections. This year, the RNC promises 'the biggest midterm GOTV operation in history.'" Since then, "Democrats have scrambled to catch up." ABC World News (10/30, story 8, 2:35, Tapper) showed Mathew Dowd, "President Bush's pollster and co-author of a key book on what's called microtargeting," saying, "More Republicans drive Audis. And more Democrats drive Saabs." ABC added, "Every time you use your credit card or surf the Internet, you leave a data trail of your preferences. Corporate America has been using this information for years to categorize you and sell you products. Now, political groups are using it, combined with census data and polling, to sell you politicians."

In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/6, A14), George Ball, president of W. Atlee Burpee & Co., examines the seed purchasing habits of Democrats and Republicans. Both "red-state Republicans and blue-state Dems grow sunflowers, zinnias and marigolds. However, the differences quickly bloom. Blue states buy many more impatiens, snapdragons and columbines -- expensive and sophisticated sun or shade flowers with varied and subtle colors. On the other hand, red states favor overwhelmingly boisterous morning glories, traditional nasturtiums and inexpensive four o'clocks. The sunny red states like to keep it plain and simple; the dappled blues like to make it diverse and edgy."

Latest Rasmussen Polls Show Corker Beating Ford 53-45, Talent And Allen Leading Narrowly. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/6, Pierce) reports the latest Rasmussen Reports poll on the Tennessee Senate shows Republican Bob Corker with a 53-45 percent lead over Rep. Harold Ford. The Times notes the latest Rasmussen poll on Missouri's Senate race shows incumbent Sen. Jim Talent leading Democrat Claire McCaskill 48-46. Rasmussen also shows Sen. George Allen leading Democrat Jim Webb 49-48."

Democrats Focus On Pennsylvania Races. The Washington Times (11/6, Fagan) reports, "Top Democrats at several rallies in suburban Philadelphia this weekend worked to push their party's voters to the polls in a state where Democrats feel poised to sweep key races and oust the Senate's No. 3 Republican, Rick Santorum." Gov. Edward G. Rendell joined Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Democrat Bob Casey Jr., "who leads Mr. Santorum in polls, to declare the year of the Democrats here." Polls "show that five Republican-held House seats in the state are within reach of Democrats -- so much so that Mrs. Pelosi spent the final campaign weekend here stumping for Democratic challengers."

Mehlman, Dean Make Their Case. In USA Today (11/6), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman writes, "Tuesday, Americans will have the opportunity to choose between a party that wants to use every tool to keep us safe, or one that would take those tools away; between a party that wants to let you keep more of your own hard-earned money, or one that believes that money belongs to Washington; between a party that understands judicial restraint, or one that wants activist judges to fight its battles. Two very different visions for America, and one very strong reason for the American people to help Republicans make history and maintain our majorities in Congress."

Also in USA Today (11/6), DNC Chairman Howard Dean asks, "Isn't it time for a new direction? Democrats have a unified agenda to restore hope and opportunity, competence and responsibility. So on Tuesday, if you want to change what's going on in Washington, vote for Democrats."

More Commentary. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (11/6), "Bush isn't on the ballot tomorrow. But this election is, nonetheless, all about him. The question is whether voters will pry his fingers loose from at least some of the levers of power, thereby limiting the damage he can inflict in his two remaining years in office." Krugman adds, "Here's the thing: no matter how hard the Bush administration may try to ignore the constitutional division of power, Mr. Bush's ability to make deadly mistakes has rested in part on GOP control of Congress. That's why many Americans, myself included, will breathe a lot easier if one-party rule ends tomorrow."

Fred Barnes, in the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14), "Republicans face the prospect of losing a substantial number of Senate and House seats in the midterm election tomorrow, but it didn't have to be that way. For sure, the war in Iraq was always going to be a drag on Republicans. And an election in the sixth year of a presidency is often perilous for the president's party, a pattern that's held true in year six of the Bush era." But "Republicans have made matters worse by abandoning the reform agenda that animated their capture of Congress in 1994 and helped George Bush win the White House in 2000 and keep it in 2004."

Hastert's Future As Speaker In Doubt Even If GOP Wins House. The Washington Post (11/6, A7, Weisman) reports Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's "future is in doubt even if the Republicans retain control of the House because of unease among GOP lawmakers about his handling of the Foley page scandal and what a House ethics committee investigation might conclude about him, according to several Republican aides." House Chief Deputy Whip Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.) "said last week that the House Republican leadership elections scheduled for Nov. 15 should be postponed until the ethics committee delivers its final report. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) confirmed yesterday on 'Fox News Sunday' that he and Hastert have discussed that possibility." But if "Democrats seize control of the House in tomorrow's election, as many political analysts and pollsters are predicting, then Hastert is widely expected to exit the leadership stage and allow a new generation of Republican leaders to try to recapture the majority." Hastert "remains personally popular with House Republicans, but the discontent with his often lackadaisical, hands-off style is palpable." In addition to the Foley investigation, in "early 2004, as House Appropriations Committee investigators prepared to launch a sensitive audit of highly classified Capitol Hill security upgrades, Hastert's chief counsel made a surprise visit to the first meeting of the auditors." His "message was clear, according to participants: The speaker's office was not happy about the probe and would keep investigators on a tight leash. In September 2005, despite growing evidence of sweetheart deals, kickbacks, wasteful contracts and shoddy work, the probe was suddenly shut down."

Senate Polls Show Democrats Poised To Win Seats, Majority In Play. USA Today (11/6, Page) reports Democrats, "poised to score gains in the U.S. Senate, are struggling to pull ahead in the final seat they need to win control, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states find." Democratic challengers "are leading Republican incumbents — in some cases narrowly -- in Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, according to the USA TODAY surveys. Other polls show Democratic challengers ahead in Ohio and Pennsylvania." Even if Democrats "sweep those five races, however, they would fall one seat short of the six needed for majority status. Two GOP targets, in Tennessee and Virginia, now lead by 3 percentage points among likely voters." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "It says to me the Senate is still very much in play and could go either way." In a "separate nationwide USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44% among likely voters. That edge of 7 percentage points had narrowed from a 13-point margin two weeks ago." In the Senate, the USA TODAY state polls "show the Democratic incumbent considered most at risk, Democrat Robert Menendez of New Jersey, is now 10 points ahead of Tom Kean. Among GOP incumbents, however, Conrad Burns trails Jon Tester by 9 points in Montana, Jim Talent trails Claire McCaskill by 4 points in Missouri, and Lincoln Chafee trails Sheldon Whitehouse by 3 points in Rhode Island. Republican Sen. George Allen leads Jim Webb in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker leads Harold Ford in Tennessee by identical 49%-46% margins."

In his Chicago Sun-Times column (11/4), Bob Novak said the Democratic bid to flip the Senate is "clearly in sight." Two GOP seats "seem definitely lost and two more are in serious trouble. If the Democrats win those four, they have to win only two of three more precarious Republican seats while keeping the only two Democratic incumbencies in any kind of danger." Novak says Republicans "have privately put" the Ohio Senate race "on the hopeless list." In Rhode Island, Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse "should glide home in one of the country's most Democratic states." In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester "now holds only a small lead with a huge undecided vote." In Missouri, the race between Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill "may well be the single contest that determines control of the Senate." In Virginia, Democrat Jim Webb "appears to have a small lead against" Sen. George Allen "in what would be a bonus win never expected by party leaders." In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker "has jumped out to a lead against" Democrat Harold Ford "after trailing earlier." In New Jersey, Democrat Bob Menendez "leads and may be increasing his lead." In Maryland, Democrat Ben Cardin has "only a six-point lead" over Republican Michael Steele. In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey "looks like a cinch."

Frist Says Democrats Would Raise "Average Family" Taxes By 58%. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (11/5, Schieffer) if thinks Democrats will raise taxes if they take control of Congress, Senate majority leader Bill Frist said, "That's exactly right. … The two things you will see, if the Democrats were to take control of the House, is an increase on taxes, taxes across the board. Charlie Rangel said it, up front, that there's not a Bush tax cut that he won't try to get rid of. And that means the average family making $62,000 is going to see their federal taxes go up by 58 percent." Frist added, "The other very important consequence would be…that judges themselves, right now, would be more of the activist judges, legislating from the bench, proposed and nominated for the Supreme Court, and not common-sense judges like Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Sam Alito."

Dole Says Democrats "Content" To Lose Iraq War. USA Today (11/6) reports National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole "said Sunday that her party will retain its majority partly because 'Democrats appear to be content with losing' the war in Iraq." Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer "said his party wants to win the war, 'which is why we want to change the strategy.'" Dole "also said voters will be more focused on local issues."

Maryland, Virginia Races Seen As Indicators Of GOP's Future. The Washington Post (11/6, A1, Shear, Wagner) reports on the front page that two "of the Washington region's top Republicans -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- spent yesterday fighting off fierce electoral challenges that could stall their political careers and reverse GOP successes in their states." Allen "returned to the folksy approach that has endeared him to Virginians for almost two decades, tossing a football at FedEx Field before the Redskins game as he schmoozed with potential voters at a tailgate party. Later, he ditched a pair of brown Wranglers for a suit at an Ashburn event with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani." In Maryland, Ehrlich "mingled with volunteers at a Republican call center in Prince George's County yesterday afternoon, appearing relaxed and upbeat about his prospects. Afterward, he, too, campaigned with Giuliani, whom he called 'wildly popular within the [Republican] party and with many independents and Democrats.'" In Virginia, Democrat James Webb "campaigned in the southwest region," while in Maryland, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "appeared with former president Bill Clinton -- something Webb is scheduled to do today." Public polls "showed both men locked in dead heats. Surveys by Mason-Dixon published yesterday had Allen trailing Webb by one percentage point and Ehrlich tied with O'Malley. Previous polls, including a Washington Post poll last weekend, showed O'Malley ahead." Losses by Ehrlich, Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele, or Allen "particularly incumbents Allen or Ehrlich -- would raise questions about the future of the GOP in their respective states."

Democrats Seen As Making Gains By Running On Against Free Trade. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Hitt) reports that in Iowa's 1st CD, Democrat Bruce Braley is running for "a congressional seat held by a free-trade Republican for nearly two decades" and has "gained an edge by taking the opposite view: bashing globalization." Braley has "made opposition to the Bush administration's free-trade agenda a centerpiece of his campaign. He has run ads blaming the state's job losses on President Bush's 'unfair trade deals.'" Braley's stance has "helped propel the 49-year-old lawyer, who is running against an unabashedly free-trade Republican, into position to reverse recent trends and secure a Democratic win in Iowa's First District. His strong showing not only underscores how trade concerns have emerged as a central issue in many of this year's races but also suggests a more-protectionist U.S. trade policy if Democrats take Congress." Even if Democrats "don't win control, the campaign rhetoric may have a lasting effect, because some Republicans are finding it more painful politically to defend free trade." The "trend is worrying the business community. Top financial-services executives identified 'protectionism' as the biggest threat to continued economic growth, after terrorism, according to a recent Financial Services Forum survey."

Investors Discount Democratic Win With Divided Government Theory. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Conkey) reports the "prospect of big losses for business-friendly Republicans in tomorrow's midterm elections is eliciting more shrugs than fears on Wall Street." A Democratic "triumph that included winning one or both houses of Congress could undermine Republican economic policies such as tax cuts and deregulation that Wall Street tends to favor." Amid the "drumbeat of scandals and discouraging news from Iraq, futures traders in the Iowa Electronic Markets have raised the likelihood that Republicans will lose control of the House of Representatives to nearly 80% from 40% six months ago. The Iowa markets indicate that the Republicans ought to hold the Senate. That, plus a Republican president, may be one reason investors have taken a sanguine approach to the election." The "first and most frequently cited rationale for Wall Street's nonchalance at the specter of a Democratic triumph is the old 'gridlock is good' maxim. In other words, Democratic control of at least one chamber of Congress would mean divided government, making it less likely adverse legislation or excessive spending would pass." This theory "has holes, but it still carries great weight among many economists and investors."

A Democratic Congress Could Target Drug Company Profits. The New York Times (11/6, Berenson) reports that for the "big drug companies, the new Medicare prescription benefit is proving to be a financial windfall larger than even the most optimistic Wall Street analysts had predicted. But those gains may come back to haunt drug makers if Democrats take control of Congress this week." Democrats, who "have long charged that the drug industry is profiteering at taxpayers' expense, say they want to introduce legislation to revoke the law that bars Medicare from negotiating prices directly with drug makers like Pfizer for the medicines it buys." The government is "expected to spend at least $31 billion this year on the drug benefit, which provides partial drug coverage for people over age 65, according to the federal agency that runs Medicare. Next year, the program is expected to cost almost $50 billion — almost 20 percent of overall American drug spending." Democrats say "that directly negotiating with drug makers could save taxpayers tens of billions of dollars annually, though some independent analysts say those projections are probably exaggerated."

Hot Button Initiatives On Ballot In 37 States. The AP (11/5, Crary) reports voters across the country will "consider ballot measures on a multitude of hot-button topics — abortion, gay marriage, affirmative action, illegal immigration, sex crimes, even legalizing marijuana." There are "205 measures on the ballots in 37 states — a total topped only twice before. Huge sums have been spent, including tens of millions of dollars by tobacco companies fighting anti-smoking measures and by oil companies fighting a proposed California oil-production tax." Top initiatives include one in "sparsely populated South Dakota" where voters "face perhaps the most momentous choice — whether to uphold or reject a new state law that would ban abortions except when necessary to save a pregnant woman's life. Activists on both sides of the national abortion debate see it as a historic test of public sentiment." In "many other states, activists on the left and right hope turnout for certain ballot measures may have a spillover effect on crucial races in the battle for control of Congress." Liberals "see a boost for Democrats if low-income voters mobilize on behalf of measures to raise the state minimum wage in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio." Conservatives "hope last month's court ruling in New Jersey ordering equal rights for same-sex couples will trigger a backlash aiding Republican candidates in the eight states with ban-gay-marriage amendments on their ballots: Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin."

"New Breed Of Activist" To Monitor Poll Stations. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Kronholz) reports that on Tuesday "a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus. Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it." "This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," said Marybeth Kuznik, "who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania." The Journal adds, "Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count."

OMB Controller Praises "Scorecard." The Washington Post (11/6, A19, Williamson) reports in its "Noted With Horror" column, "'We would love to see all of America on a scorecard.' Linda Combs, Office of Management and Budget controller, speaking at a lunch discussion last week about the president's management scorecard, which tracks government agencies' progress on a series of management priorities, including strategic management of human capital, competitive sourcing, improved financial performance, expanded electronic government, and budget and performance integration." The "scorecard gives agencies -- write this down -- green for success, yellow for mixed results and red for unsatisfactory. Combs drew pained looks from federal employees in the audience when she said private-sector executives tell her that they want their own scorecard systems, because they 'love the red, yellow, green.'"

Unemployment Rate Falls To 4.4%. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Scherer, Arnoldy) reports, "In the last major economic report before Tuesday's showdown at the ballot box, the Labor Department says the unemployment rate is now at" 4.4%, "down from 4.6 percent in September. It is a piece of good news for an embattled president and suggests the economy is stronger than many recent estimates." But the "downside is that the Federal Reserve, which has not raised interest rates in its past three meetings, may have to think about a rate increase early next year - which would keep inflation in check but could cause unemployment to rise." Former Fed governor Lyle Gramley said, "By its first meeting in 2007, the Fed will have to give active consideration to raising interest rates. The odds are that rates are going up, not down."

Fed Official Says Monetary Policy Was Eased For Too Long. The Wall Street Journal (11/6) says in an editorial, "When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said 'never complain, never explain.' So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004." A Fed "worried about possible 'deflation' moved the overnight interest rate it charges banks in June 2003 to an extraordinarily low 1% and kept it there for another year. Mr. Fisher blamed this mistake on 'poor data' that underestimated inflation, leading 'to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today, as anybody not from the former planet of Pluto knows, the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country.' In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations."

Growing Number Of Local Governments Seek To Cut Pensions. The New York Times (11/6, Walsh) reports government workers' pensions "are protected by guarantees even stouter than those on pensions in the private sector. The legal promises, often backed up by union contracts, cover more than 15 million people." But "now a number of state and local governments are quietly challenging those guarantees. Financially troubled San Diego is the highest-profile example, but a handful of states, cities and smaller government bodies have also found ways to scale back existing promises and even shrink some current payments." While "still only scattered cases, these examples may be an early warning sign of what could be coming elsewhere. As local officials take stock of unexpectedly large obligations to retired public workers, some are starting to question whether service cuts, sales of government property and politically acceptable tax increases can ever go far enough to bring things into balance."

Houston Real Estate Market Remains Strong. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Herrick) reports Houston "missed the real-estate boom that sent home prices soaring on the East and West coasts. Now, with much of the nation's housing market in retreat, it has yet to feel even a tremor." In September, "local sales of single-family homes and condominiums were up 17.7% from a year earlier, logging their 32nd straight month of increase, according to the Houston Association of Realtors. The median price of an existing single-family home: $143,400, up 3%." Nationwide sales "of residential real estate fell 14.2% in September, according to the National Association of Realtors. Home prices nationally were down 2.2%, retreating in such former hot spots such as Washington, Boston and San Francisco." Houston's gains "are nothing like those seen in the past decade in the Northeast and California, but that may be the secret to Houston's success and the reason a bubble is unlikely to develop here. Land here is abundant, and the city has some of the least-restrictive land-use and construction rules in the nation. Those factors help supply to keep pace with demand and keep prices within reach of a broad range of potential buyers."

Lindsey Urges Congress To Expand H1-B Program. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/6), Lawrence B. Lindsey, former assistant to the president for economic policy, says, "Members of Congress have the opportunity to expand and improve a relatively small but highly successful part of our immigration policy" that "allows companies to bring in workers from overseas who possess skills that are not available domestically. The main users of the program are technology and health-care companies, although a number of highly skilled people in finance also work here under this program." The H1-B program "provides security within the country. The companies hiring these workers have already gone through a vetting process sufficient to justify their employment." Second, the program "obviously involves economic participation by the immigrant." Finally, "the H1-B visa program is a working model of an approach to immigration that provides an opportunity for civic integration for those who participate."

LATimes Urges Supreme Court To Strike Down Partial Birth Abortion Ban. The Los Angeles Times (11/6) says in an editorial, "On Wednesday, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. If law and not politics guide the justices, they will declare this blanket ban unconstitutional." Whatever "you call it, the procedure is extraordinarily rare and distasteful even to many supporters of abortion rights." But "reversing its 2000 decision on partial-birth laws wouldn't cause the same jolt as repudiating Roe or Casey. But it would still upend a precedent and interfere with the settled expectations of women and doctors alike about the availability of this procedure as a medical last resort."

NYTimes Says NCAA Not Meeting Educational Mission. The New York Times (11/6) editorializes, "The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus." The letter "showed that Congress has noticed the recruiting violations and the athletes who sometimes remain eligible to play without progressing or by attending bogus classes. It also implied that the N.C.A.A. might eventually lose its tax exemptions unless it forces athletic departments to conform more closely to an educational mission." An NCAA report "released last week touches on some of the same issues cited in the blistering letter from Congress. The problem is that athletic departments have more influence on university affairs than they should. They often use that influence to undermine the institutional mission."

Iran Open To Regional Talks With US. The AP (11/6, Karimi) reports Iran said Sunday it was "open to negotiations with the United States on Iraq and other regional issues but hinted it would not drop its refusal to talk about its contentious nuclear program. As the [UNSC] geared up for a protracted debate on sanctioning Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran praised Russia for its 'softer' stance on the issue." Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini "said Iran would consider talks with the US over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested. He would not elaborate, and there was no immediate response from the United States on the offer," the AP notes.

AFP (11/6, Farmani) says that although "it remains to be seen whether the United States is itself willing to renew the offer," Hosseini's comments "come at a time when the US is mired in mounting sectarian bloodshed and deadly attacks on its troops in Iraq, prompting calls for a rapid about-turn in its strategy."

Meanwhile, another AFP story (11/6, Couturier) reports, "Western countries that want to punish Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment are again facing reluctance on the part of Russia and China to grant support, with Moscow demanding a softening of a draft UN resolution. More than two months after the UN-imposed deadline of August 31 expired, it is still not possible to say when the UN Security Council will act." China and Russia "are reluctant to impose strict penalties on Iran, with which they maintain important economic and commercial ties."

China Seen As Shifting Stance On North Korea. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A6, Fairclough, King, Jr.) reports, "Shortly after North Korea conducted its first nuclear-weapons test last month, regulators here quietly told China's banks to suspend their dealings with the nation." Although Beijing "made no public announcement," the Journal says, "Still, the message to North Korea was clear: China, long averse to imposing any kind of economic sanctions, was willing to go beyond penalties imposed by the United Nations to force North Korea to back down. … China's unusual, if quiet, activism may signal a significant change in its view of the world and its approach to foreign policy since it formally wired itself into the global economy five years ago by joining the World Trade Organization. Beijing's long-held policy of not interfering in the 'internal affairs' of other nations appears to be giving way to a broader definition of its national interests—one that goes beyond satisfying its fast-growing appetite for oil and other raw materials. China also is showing a greater willingness to embrace global institutions and norms." The Journal notes that during a trip to Asia last month, Secretary Rice said, "It is an extraordinary thing for China to be now where it is."

US Envoys Prepare For Resumption Of North Korea Talks. The Washington Times/AP (11/6, Tabuchi) reports US Undersecretaries of State Nicholas Burns and Robert Joseph were in Tokyo today "coordinating with Japanese and South Korean officials before the resumption of long-delayed negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program." South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon "said the three countries worked closely together in the past and would continue to do so at the six-nation talks expected later this year." Ban is scheduled to meet Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe today for further talks. The two Americans "were to meet with Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other Japanese officials before traveling to South Korea later today."

WSJournal Deputy Editor Urges Assistance For North Korean Orphans. Wall Street Journal (11/6, A15) deputy editor Melanie Kirkpatrick writes, "Fortune has already shone on" two orphan children among a "small group of North Korean refugees who have taken sanctuary in the US Consulate in Shenyang, China." Kirkpatrick says there are among "thousands" of abandoned children in need of international assistance. She notes that the UN High Commission on Refugees "stands ready to help the Korean refugees in China—if only Beijing would let it. Several countries in the region are prepared to set up transit camps for refugees provided the US helps pay for it and South Korea ultimately accepts them for re-settlement, as its Constitution requires. But even if, in the happiest of worlds, all this were to occur, the stateless orphans could still be left out. According to groups that run the underground railroad, even South Korea, which accepts most of the Northerners who manage to escape, refuses to admit the children on the grounds that they are not true 'defectors.'"

Israel Vows To Continue Gaza Operations. The New York Times (11/6, Myre) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Sunday said "that the military would not halt its offensive in the northern Gaza Strip until Palestinian rocket fire toward Israel was significantly reduced." As fighting entered its fifth straight day on Sunday, more the than 40 Palestinians were reportedly killed in the offensive and Palestinians "called for international pressure on Israel to halt the offensive." Meanwhile, "In another development, a Palestinian lawmaker, Mustafa Barghouti, said that he was brokering the latest attempt at a Palestinian national unity government and that an agreement could be reached in days." The AP (11/6, Lavie) runs a similar report.

Syria Hints At Armed Resistance Over Return Of Golan. The AP (11/6, Aji) reports Syria "could resort to armed resistance if peace negotiations do not lead to Israel's return of the Golan Heights, the country's Information Minister said Sunday. Mohsen Bilal said international negotiations should lead to Israel giving back the Golan Heights… If that does not happen, he warned Syria could resort to 'other means, which struggling people have used at various points in history, beginning with legitimate resistance.' But Bilal said Syrians were eager to resume talks."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP

New York Times. "The Saddam Hussein Verdict." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) editorializes, "Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial 'a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.'" The Times adds, "The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds."

"Protecting The Right To Vote." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "No one expects Florida elections to go smoothly, but this year the state got off to an alarming start. Voters reported that after selecting Democratic candidates on electronic voting machines, the review screens registered that they had chosen Republicans. A spokeswoman for the Broward County supervisor of elections told The Miami Herald that the machines often fall out of sync under heavy use, but that they can be fixed when voters complain. That snapshot of Florida's early voting is confirmation — as if any were needed — that a great deal can go wrong tomorrow, much of it eminently preventable. Six years after the 2000 election meltdown, voting machines are still unreliable, and there are an array of other obstacles to voters who want their votes to count."

"College Sports Get A Warning." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) editorializes, "The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus." "Mind Over Gap."

Washington Post. "Verdict for Saddam Hussein." In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/6, 748K) says "the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded."

Wall Street Journal. "The Fed's Confession." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said 'never complain, never explain.' So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004." In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations."

"Justice For Saddam." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq." But "to make it permanent, the US must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the US commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job."

Los Angeles Times. "Don't Abort Precedence." The Los Angeles Times (11/6, 918K) says in an editorial, "On Wednesday, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. "Is Pakistan An Ally?" The Los Angeles Times (11/6, 918K) says in an editorial, "Preventing Afghanistan from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state." Islamabad is "clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests."

TERRORISM NEWS

DOJ Places Shaaban Under Special Administrative Measures. The Indianapolis Star (11/6, Corcoran) reports Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, the "Indiana truck driver found guilty of conspiring to betray the United States has been secluded in a Colorado super-maximum-security prison under a secret order approved by the U.S. attorney general." DOJ officials have isolated Shaaban under a "policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on the few conversations he's allowed to have, heavily restricts his access to news reports and prohibits anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him. Some inmates at the prison, which houses the federal government's worst of the worst, spend at least 23 hours a day in soundproof cells. They cannot speak to or make eye contact with other inmates. These 'special administrative measures,' also called 'SAMs orders,' are meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security."

CBP Officials Delay 16 Travelers At Houston Airport. The Houston Chronicle (11/4, Villafranca) reported, "Federal authorities delayed the departure Friday of 16 international travelers, including 15 Mexican nationals, who were boarding a Mexico City-bound plane at Houston's Bush Intercontinental Airport. A U.S. Customs and Border Protection official said data submitted by the passengers did not match the data on file when they entered the United States." Kelly Klundt, CBP spokeswoman, "declined to say what information was missing or did not match when the 16 passengers tried to board the 9 a.m. Continental flight."

Foreign Policy Article On Atomic Terror Attack Draws Skepticism. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/6, Pierce) reports, "Two leading U.S. nuclear scientists say a team of terrorists with industrial equipment, physics and engineering skills and access to highly enriched uranium could build a crude atomic weapon in the United States for less than $10 million. Writing in Foreign Policy…Peter Zimmerman and Jeffrey Lewis add that there is no evidence that al Qaeda or any other terrorist group currently possesses the technical expertise necessary to complete such an effort." However, the Times notes "some analysts told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that they were deeply skeptical of the Foreign Policy article. Arms-control specialist Milton Leitenberg of the University of Maryland called the scenario 'super-optimistic,' and said the authors had glossed over the difficulty of finding the kinds of highly qualified specialists the project would need."

Hoekstra Criticizes Administration Over Nuclear Website. The AP (11/5) reports, "House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra criticized the Bush administration on Sunday for its handling of a trove of once-secret documents from Saddam Hussein's covert nuclear program disclosed on a federal Web site. Hoekstra, R-Mich., complained the U.S. intelligence community hadn't properly declassified the documents. ... Hoekstra said his committee would review the documents to determine the former Iraqi leader's goals and capabilities before the war in 2003."

Conservative Pressure Blamed For Distribution Of Iraq Nuclear Program Documents. Newsweek's Michael Isikoff (11/13) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "shut down a government Web site after the disclosure that it had posted nuclear-research documents from Iraq's pre-Gulf War I weapons program. Set up in March at the insistence of congressional GOPers, the site was designed to post documents seized by the U.S. military in Iraq. But many were trivial memos and oddball letters. … Late last year House intel-committee chair Pete Hoekstra and Senate intel chair Pat Roberts pressed Negroponte's office to make the Iraqi docs available. They and others, including The Weekly Standard magazine, said the material might show Saddam did have WMD or ties to Al Qaeda. So the Defense Intelligence Agency began to review 48,000 boxes of material, located in a U.S. military warehouse in Doha, Qatar, and started posting it on an Operation Iraqi Freedom Web site. DIA spokesman Don Black said several hundred analysts, linguists, translators and contractors took part, weeding out diplomatically sensitive docs or those mentioning the names of U.S. persons (a potential violation of the U.S. Privacy Act)."

Los Alamos Incident Potentially "Greatest Breach Of National Security" In Decades." Newsweek (11/13, Barry, Hosenball) reports, "It began as a routine police call. At 4:16 p.m. on Oct. 17, two Los Alamos County police officers were dispatched to the Royal Crest Trailer Park. The cluster of mobile homes is located next to Los Alamos National Laboratory, the sprawling New Mexico compound that houses one of America's two main facilities for designing nuclear weapons. A resident had complained that two neighbors were shouting at each other and throwing rocks through the windows of their trailer. The cops expected to find the usual: a domestic dispute that had gotten out of hand. Instead, they discovered what one Los Alamos official—who, like all lab and government sources in this story, would not be named talking about sensitive matters—calls 'potentially the greatest breach of national security' in decades. … Panicked officials are now trying to determine how a low-level clerk was able to walk out of a high-security facility with hundreds of pages of nuclear secrets. The brief answer: laxness and budget cuts.

LANL Says Pilfered Documents Contained Mostly Low-Level Secrets. The Los Angeles Times (11/4) reported, "Los Alamos National Laboratory said that the classified documents discovered at a trailer park during a drug investigation last month did not include the most highly sensitive nuclear weapons information. The lab…said a 'careful and comprehensive analysis' of three electronic memory devices and paper copies of classified documents found in a residential trailer showed that they were mostly low-level secrets that are 20 to 30 years old." The Times noted, "The FBI is continuing a criminal investigation into a lab employee who owned the trailer."

Philadelphia Bank Withdrawals Raise Terror Questions. Under the headline "Did Bank Stop A Fraud Or Terrorist?," the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/4, Schaefer) reported, "On Wednesday morning, two men withdrew $8,700 from an account under the name of Shahid Batti at the Commerce Bank" in Upper Darby, Penn. "When they returned later in the day to withdraw an additional $9,700, bank officials became suspicious, denied the transaction and contacted police. … One man produced a passport from Pakistan, a New Jersey license and a Social Security card, all under the name of Batti -- and all fraudulent, according to police." The Inquirer added that the man later "identified himself as Raza Hussain from Brooklyn, N.Y.," and Upper Darby Police Superintendent Michael J. Chitwood "said police discovered a 'possible' connection between Hussain and a terrorist with the same birthday when they ran the names through the FBI Terrorism Screening Center. He said the FBI and the New York Police Department have been contacted."

The Philadelphia Daily News (11/4, Weichselbaum) reported Hussein, meanwhile, "is sitting in a Delaware County jail cell and has not posted the $100,000 bail, Chitwood said. …. 'There are a lot of red flags here,' Chitwood said. 'We don't know if we have an identity-theft issue; we don't know if we have a money-laundering issue, or a terrorist connection.' … But FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Hussain 'is not on the FBI terrorist-watch list, and has no known ties to terrorists. The Philadelphia FBI will continute their investigation to determine his true identity.'"

Student Break-In At Pittsburgh Stadium Prompts JTTF Investigation. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/6, Nephin) reports two Carnegie-Mellon University students "are facing criminal charges after police said they tried to break into Heinz Field early Sunday." Paul Sudeep and Anand Durvasula "were cooperative when apprehended, telling police they had tickets to Sunday afternoon's Pittsburgh Steelers game and 'decided to check things out so they knew where to go,' Harper said." The AP notes, "The Joint Terrorism Task Force -- made up of the FBI, city and Allegheny County police and the county sheriff's office -- conducted a sweep of the stadium with bomb-detecting dogs and found no explosives, Harper said. The men were being questioned by the terrorism task force, and Harper said the investigation was continuing." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/6, Rotstein, Guidry) also reports the story, under the headline "Heinz Field Arrests Spur Terror Response."

Reviewer Urges Reading Of Yoo's Book, But Criticizes His Conclusions. In the Washington Post (11/5, BW6), Geoffrey R. Stone reviews John Yoo's "War By Other Means: An Insider's Account Of The War On Terror," writing, "You should read this book, though not for the reasons the author intends. John Yoo is a law professor who served in the Office of Legal Counsel of the Department of Justice from 2001 to 2003. In that capacity, he participated -- often quite centrally -- in the key post-9/11 legal decisions that framed the Bush administration's war on terror, including the Patriot Act, the National Security Agency surveillance program and administration positions on torture, military tribunals and the treatment of alleged terrorist detainees at Guantanamo Bay. In War by Other Means, Yoo delivers on his subtitle. This is indeed 'an insider's account of the war on terror.' … At its core, War by Other Means offers spirited, detailed and often enlightening accounts of the decision-making process behind the key 2001-03 legal decisions. Yoo feels compelled to justify them because the Bush administration itself has 'often failed to explain clearly to the public the difficult decisions al Qaeda has forced upon us.'" But the "fundamental precept that drives Yoo's conclusions is his unyielding belief that in wartime, the president -- as commander-in-chief -- is exclusively in charge. Detention, surveillance and torture must all be within the president's unilateral control. Congress and the Supreme Court must defer to the president's judgment. This is an extreme, reckless and dangerous view. That it has shaped the policies of our government is nothing short of irresponsible."

WAR NEWS

Troops In Iraq Warn Of "Devastating" Results Of US Pullout. The Washington Post (11/6, White, 748K) reports from Iraq, "It is dusty and muddy, calm and chaotic, deafeningly loud and eerily quiet. The one thing the war is not, however, is finished, dozens of soldiers across the country said in interviews. And leaving Iraq now would have devastating consequences, they said. ... Many soldiers said the United States should not abandon its effort here. Such a move, enlisted soldiers and officers said, would set Iraq on a path to civil war, give new life to the insurgency and create the possibility of a failed state after nearly four years of fighting to implant democracy." The troops stress the need for more time to cement their accomplishments but also "expressed frustration with the nature of the fight, which many said amounted to driving around and waiting for the enemy to engage them, often with roadside bombs, known within the military as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs." The Post adds, "Soldiers and officers had difficulty conveying what victory in Iraq would look like or exactly how to achieve it. In some ways, victory is a moving target, they said, one that relies heavily on the Iraqi people gaining trust in the Iraqi security forces and the ability of the Iraqi government to support essential services."

Mallaby Mulls Costs Of Staying In Or Leaving Iraq. In his Washington Post (11/6, 748K) column, Sebastian Mallaby writes, "The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq. The nation will face an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out." Mallaby quotes three civil-war scholars -- "Oxford's Paul Collier, Stanford's James Fearon and Barbara Walter of the University of California at San Diego," who have "dispiriting" points: "[Iraqis' insistence on fighting each other] leads Fearon to the view that U.S. withdrawal is a precondition for the military test that in turn is a precondition for peace. If Fearon is right, remaining in Iraq actually prolongs the carnage. But even if he is wrong, it's not clear that remaining in Iraq is justified. In the past three months, 241 U.S. troops have died; another five years implies the death of 4,820 Americans, more than were killed in the terrorist attacks of 2001. The price of staying in Iraq is high, while the gains are uncertain. But it is also true that leaving Iraq could prove extremely costly. Fearon expects that withdrawal is likely to accelerate the conflict, unleashing an even more intense campaign of ethnic cleansing of civilians. ... But the strongest argument against withdrawal is that it might not be permanent. ... when Iraq's combatants fight themselves to stalemate, some coalition of external powers may have to enforce a peace, and the United States would probably be part of such an effort."

Galbraith Describes De Facto Partition Of Iraq. In an op-ed for Time (11/13) Peter Galbraith, former U.S. ambassador to Croatia, writes that President Bush "says the U.S.'s goal is a unified and democratic Iraq, but we have no way to get there. As Americans search for answers, there is one obvious alternative: split Iraq into separate Kurdish, Sunni and Shi'ite states. The case for the partition of Iraq is straightforward: It has already happened. The Kurds…enjoy the independence they long dreamed about. The Iraqi flag does not fly in Kurdistan, which has a democratically elected government and its own army. In southern Iraq, Shi'ite religious parties have carved out theocratic fiefdoms, using militias that now number in the tens of thousands to enforce an Iranian-style Islamic rule. To the west, Iraq's Sunni provinces have become chaotic no-go zones, with Islamic insurgents controlling Anbar province while Baathists and Islamic radicals operate barely below the surface in Salahaddin and Nineveh. And Baghdad, the heart of Iraq, is now partitioned between the Shi'ite east and the Sunni west."

Army Advisors Prepare To Help Iraqi Forces. The AP (11/6, Burns) reports from Fort Riley, Kansas, "... soldiers are preparing not to defeat the insurgents in Iraq but to coach the Iraqis to do that for themselves. It is an approach born of the realization that giving the Iraqis uniforms, rifles and bullets and training them in the basics of combat is not enough. To get the Iraqis ready to handle their own security, U.S. officials have concluded they need more American soldiers inside Iraqi army and police units to advise them. ... The advisers act as role models, steering Iraqis away from corruption, human rights abuses and other problems, while also going on raids and other missions to coach them and assess weaknesses." Anthony Cordesman of CSIS expresses skepticism, warning of "severe [numerical] limits" on the program. The AP describes simulation exercises in the advisors' training.

Iraq's Parliament To Consider Amnesty Proposals In December. U.S. News and World Report (11/13, Robinson) reports Samir Sumaidaie, Iraq's ambassador to the United States, "is under no illusions about the difficulty of achieving peace in his country. … But he has not lost hope. Obscured by the reports of spiraling violence and the latest contretemps between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and U.S. officials is the surprising fact that the Iraqi government itself has laid out a timeline for dealing with the most contentious issues tearing the country apart. Achieving a timeline is not the same thing as reaching substantive agreement on solutions, but it may provide the kickstart for a last-ditch attempt to avoid fullblown civil war-and if deadlines matter, it is a measuring stick of the Iraqis' own making." US News adds, "By all accounts, the toughest items on the agenda are those slated for December, when a law offering amnesty to Sunni and Baathist insurgents and demobilizing militias is supposed to be passed."

Redeployment Of Convicted Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Sparks Outrage. Time (11/13, Zagaorin) reports, "In a war effort marred by poor planning and misjudgments of the local scene, this move just about took the cake. Someone in the U.S. military thought it was a good idea to send Sergeant Santos Cardona, a dog handler convicted of abusing detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, back to serve again in Iraq. What's more, his unit's job was to help train Iraqi police. … Still, it was not until TIME.com reported last week that Cardona was on his way to Iraq that the military reconsidered his posting." Time notes, "By reversing course, the Army stanched the p.r. damage, but some harm had already been done. On hearing the news that Cardona was in Kuwait awaiting transfer to Iraq, Maryam al-Rais, a member of the Iraqi parliament, lamented, 'This is just the latest in a long list of insults to Iraqi dignity by the Americans.'"

US Translator Thought To Have Been Kidnapped By "Shiite Zarqawi." Newsweek's Periscope column (11/13, Johnson) reports, "Ever since the radical Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr joined the Iraqi government, his power on the streets has been slipping. Now U.S. and Iraqi officials worry that even more violent men might be taking up his mantle. One name has come up again and again: Abu Deraa, sometimes called 'the Shiite Zarqawi.' Abu Deraa and the death squad he runs have been waging a campaign of Shia terror across the city. He is suspected of torturing and killing scores of Sunnis in a bloody wave of ethnic cleansing in neighborhoods across Baghdad. U.S. officials believe Abu Deraa is responsible for the capture of a U.S. Army translator who disappeared two weeks ago while leaving the fortified Green Zone and remains missing." According to Newsweek, "Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki hasn't made the job of hunting him any easier. Last week U.S. forces launched a massive raid in Sadr City, targeting Abu Deraa. The attack reportedly killed two of his sons, but he escaped. Concerned about the political implications, Maliki ordered U.S. troops to end the assault and then dismantle the checkpoints they had set up to net Abu Deraa if he tried to slip away."

US Public Said To See Parallels Between Iraq And Vietnam. U.S. News and World Report (11/13, Walsh) reports, "At the White House, they call it the 'V' word. Vietnam. It is the historical parallel that the Bush administration dreads most, because of fears that comparisons with the bitter, bloody Southeast Asian conflict will cast even more doubt on the conduct of the war in Iraq today. … But the idea that Iraq increasingly resembles Vietnam in some important ways appears to be gaining credibility among historians, pundits, and, most important, the public."

Kerry Remarks Seen As Evidence That Democrats Have Vietnam-Era Mind-Set. U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (11/13) writes, "'You know, education, if you make the most of it, you study hard, you do your homework and you make an effort to be smart, you can do well. If you don't, you get stuck in Iraq.' Those two sentences, spoken by John Kerry last week, tell a lot about the mind-set of many -- not all, but many -- Democrats who supported him for president in 2004. … One thing they tell us is that Kerry's mind-set is still back in the Vietnam era. Today the statement is literally untrue: No one is 'stuck in Iraq' unless he or she volunteers, and the educational and economic levels of our military personnel are higher than those of civilians in the same age cohort. Kerry was evidently thinking back to the late 1960s, when there was a military draft and a college dropout could find himself drafted and 'stuck' in Vietnam."

White House Aide Volunteers To Serve With Marines In Afghanistan. The Washington Post's "In the Loop" column (11/6, Kamen) reports Kenneth Rapuano, former deputy undersecretary at the Energy Department for counterterrorism and "since July 2004 a deputy assistant to the president for homeland security, has volunteered for active duty as a lieutenant colonel in the Marines to serve with the Joint Special Operations Command in Afghanistan."

Koppel Decries Lack Of "Commitment To Sacrifice" In Conduct Of War On Terror. In the New York Times (11/6, 1.21M), Ted Koppel writes, "We are advised to adjust to the notion of warrantless wiretaps at home, unaccountable CIA prisons overseas and the rendition of suspects to nations that feature prominently on the State Department's list of human rights abusers, because the threats we face are 'existential.' But apparently they are not existential enough to warrant any kind of widely shared commitment or sacrifice, like increased taxes or a military draft to meet the Pentagon's growing need for manpower. ... We are left with the impression that the grown-ups in Washington would prefer to make the difficult decisions for us without involving the courts, Congress or the press. That is precisely the wrong way to go about winning this war." Koppel adds, "Back when the United States was widely admired, it was for all that was most cumbersome about our democratic process."

LATimes Questions Pakistan's Allegiance. The Los Angeles Times (11/6) says in an editorial, "Preventing Afghanistan from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state." Islamabad is "clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests."

DOJ Enron Task Force's Berkowitz To Join Latham & Watkins. Law.com (11/6, Slater) reports Sean Berkowitz, "the director of the Department of Justice's Enron Task Force in the trial of Jeffrey Skilling and the late Kenneth Lay, will join the Chicago office of Latham & Watkins, the law firm announced Thursday, Nov. 2. The announcement came on the heels of Enron Corp. co-prosecutor John Hueston joining Irell & Manella." Berkowitz said, "I did a careful look around Chicago firms and felt that Latham provided the best opportunities to capitalize on my experience in the Justice Department, and to transfer that into a national and international practice." Berkowitz, "pursued by Kirkland & Ellis and DLA Piper, among others, has several ties to Latham lawyers. He worked with John Lynch, a founding partner of Latham's Chicago office, when they represented different parties in General Instrument Corp.'s securities litigation, and with Latham associate Deborah Steiner in the U.S. Attorney's office. Between his Enron experience and his associate years at Katten Muchin Rosenman before joining the U.S. Attorney's office in Chicago, Berkowitz expects to make a pretty seamless public-to-private transition. 'Enron was one of the most complex matters out there, so I don't imagine I'll find anything in private practice that'll be insurmountable from a technical standpoint,' said Berkowitz, whose provocative cross-examination of Skilling ignited an unflattering outburst from the fallen executive."

Rudolph's Letters Provide Glimpse Of Federal Prison's "Bomber Row." Time (11/13, Vollers) reports the Federal Correctional Complex in Florence, CO "is a virtual theme park of penal experiences, ranging from a minimum-security camp…to the concrete fortress that was built to be the most secure prison in the country: the Administrative Maximum U.S. Penitentiary, or ADX for short. The inmates in ADX Florence include drug kingpins, gang leaders, hit men, snipers and, lately, more and more, international terrorists, including al-Qaeda shoe bomber Richard Reid; mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing Ramzi Yousef and at least seven of his accomplices; and four men convicted of involvement in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa. … Until now, almost nothing has been written about the inner workings of the ADX. Since 9/11, journalists have been routinely denied access to the facility, its staff and inmates. But Eric Robert Rudolph, who is serving life without parole at the prison for the fatal bombings at the Atlanta Olympics and an abortion clinic in Alabama, has written letters to me, the author of a book about his case, and to his mother Patricia Rudolph, who has shared them with me. These missives offer a unique first-hand account of life on Bombers Row."

Boston Mayor Optimistic About Expanding Gang Truces. The Boston Globe (11/6, Smalley) reports Boston Mayor Thomas Menino "said yesterday that he is optimistic about the possibility of brokering more gang truces across Boston similar to the one that police, clergy, and youth outreach workers established between two of the city's most violent gangs. Menino, who credited police and the Rev. Jeffrey Brown with cementing the pact between the Heath Street gang in Jamaica Plain and the H-Block gang in Roxbury, also praised the young gang members who came to the bargaining table." Menino said, "You have to give the…gang members a lot of credit for wanting to work together." Boston police consultant Jack McDevitt "said the truce could become a national model, in part because Heath Street and H-Block's long, bloody feud gives the treaty more street credibility. He said he plans to recommend the idea to six cities he is working with to fight gang violence under a US Department of Justice initiative. 'It gives some cover to other groups that might feel, 'OK, these are pretty serious folks and they did it so we can do it, too,' McDevitt said." Organizers trying to preserve the truce "have offered incentives to gang members, including tutoring, improvements to a teen center, and corporate box seats for a New England Patriots game."

Violent Crime In Manchester, New Hampshire, Comparably Low. The New Hampshire Union Leader (11/6, Brooks) reports, "Manchester has consistently ranked among the least violent cities of its size in New England, an analysis of federal crime data reveals. FBI records show the Queen City saw fewer robberies and aggravated assaults than almost any other similarly sized city in the region between 2001 and 2005, the last year for which data was available. Homicides also were rare. Altogether, Manchester reported fewer violent crimes in recent years than all but one other New England city of more than 100,000 residents. Only Stamford, Conn., could claim fewer." Police Chief John Jaskolka said, "The perception is that violent crime is way up. Actually, our numbers are fairly low." Officials and residents "have lately called the security of several Manchester neighborhoods into question, particularly since city police patrolman Michael Briggs was killed by gunfire in the center city last month. Police have since ordered high-intensity patrols in a smattering of hot spots. Many residents, meanwhile, have banded together via neighborhood watch groups."

Courts Embrace Electronic Monitoring. USA Today (11/6, Heath) reports, "Electronic monitors that can pinpoint criminals on a map can now also tell whether they've been driving too fast, drinking or violating other laws. Courts nationwide increasingly are embracing such tracking of people's behavior as a way to stop them from repeating the actions that got them in trouble with the law, though it remains less common than satellite surveillance of sex offenders." Among the tools are automobile black boxes and alcohol-sniffing bracelets.

Group Says Arkansas Rehabilitation Center Not Up To DOJ Standards. The Arkansas Democrat Gazette (11/5, Upshaw) reports, "An advocacy group that has been monitoring Alexander Youth Services Center for months said Saturday that Arkansas isn't meeting the mental health, education and special education needs of the children at the troubled facility as required by the U. S. Department of Justice and state law." Dana McClain of the Disability Rights Center says "problems at the center are systemic. … 'We don't think this is rehabilitation, and state law says it is supposed to be [for youthful offenders]. I think it's punishment,' she said. 'I feel like these children are being set up to go to adult prison.'"

Jury Kept Secret In Drug-Trafficking, Racketeering Case. The Washington Times (11/6, Mcelhatton) reports closing arguments "are expected today in a gang-related racketeering and drug-trafficking case in the District in which the judge took the unusual step of appointing an anonymous jury. Prosecutors say they want the names of the jurors to remain secret because the gang has tried to tamper with the judicial system, including impersonating a law-enforcement officer to kill a cooperating witness. Gerald Eiland and Frederick Miller are among several men accused of running a drug organization and car-theft ring based in the District. They have pleaded not guilty."

Legal Experts Say Laptop Search Case Could End Up In Supreme Court. In a story credited to Copley News Service, the San Diego Union-Tribune (11/5, Krasnowski) reported on the case of Michael Arnold, who was charged with possession of child pornography after a customs agent found images on his laptop when he returned from the Philippines. His "arrest was heralded as a success for the federal government's Operation Predator campaign against criminals who prey on children," but last month, "a judge threw out the computer evidence against him, setting up a court battle in which a man accused of vile behavior could help determine how far border agents can go in searching people's computers and the future of some privacy rights. It's an issue – spurred by advances in technology, and increased concerns about terrorism and border security – that some legal experts expect will end up before the U.S. Supreme Court." In the case, US District Judge Dean Pregerson "ruled the border officer needed reasonable suspicion to search Arnold's computer because the machines can contain vast amounts of private information. … Prosecutors contend border officers can search such items routinely, saying the computer search wasn't invasive or destructive but rather a standard inspection of a person at the border that courts have long supported."

Business Travelers Concerned About Searches. In his "Business Itinerary" column in the Los Angeles Times (11/4), James Gilden wrote, "It is cases like Arnold's that have corporate travel managers up in arms — but not because of the pornography connection. Their concern is with what happens to the proprietary data that business travelers often carry on their laptops." Gilden added, "The association of travel executives is not concerned as much with the constitutional questions as it is with the practical implications for business travelers. It has tried to get answers from Customs and Border Protection about its policies regarding the search and seizure of laptops and measures taken to protect sensitive business information on them but has not received an answer to its queries, Executive Director Gurley said."

Monterey County, California, Crime Lab Experiencing Major Delays. The Monterey (CA) Herald (11/5, Reynolds) reports, "Crimes in Monterey County are going unsolved and prosecutions delayed as piles of unprocessed evidence grow higher in the county's primary crime lab, law enforcement officials say. In some cases, The Herald has found, more than a year passed before fingerprints were processed, leaving detectives frustrated and criminals walking free." The lab "is so badly understaffed -- down from five employees to two -- that arrests have had to wait as crimes go unsolved for more than a year. In one example, a fingerprint was lifted in an April 2005 larceny case, but the print was not processed until June 2006. In the interim, investigators say, the same man had moved on from nonviolent fraud to carjacking." Detectives "complain that backlogs in the forensic services crime lab mean arrests aren't being made when they should. Law enforcement personnel described cases such as a 12-month delay in running fingerprints for an attempted murder case."

Columnist Says Solicitor General May Be "Ultimate Authority" On Patent Law. In his Washington Post (11/6, A19) column, Charles Lane asks, "When it comes to patent law, who is the ultimate authority? Is it the Supreme Court? Or the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, the specialty court for patent and trademark law established by Congress in 1982? Actually, it's none of the above. But before I reveal the correct answer, let me congratulate you for having read this far beyond the words 'patent law.' This eye-glazing technical topic has been known to send even people who like tax law screaming from the room. That you may still be interested shows a commendable understanding of patent law's significance, notwithstanding its arcane nature. … Arguably, the real power in patent law these days is not a court at all, but the Office of the Solicitor General." In the "10 Supreme Court patent cases in which the solicitor general has participated since 1995, the SG is undefeated, according to a recent study by Jonathan Franklin, a Supreme Court specialist at the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski. What's behind the court's deference to the executive branch? In part, say patent law specialists, it appears that the justices are increasingly second-guessing the rulings of the Federal Circuit, which was designed to help clean up patent law by concentrating all federal appeals in a single expert body. From the Federal Circuit's inception until the mid-'90s, the justices seemed content to let it call the shots. But as the information technology revolution has spread, the high court has shown a willingness to review decisions of the Federal Circuit, whose critics say it is too favorable to patent holders. None of the justices are experts on patent law. Thus, they lean heavily on the expertise of the solicitor general, who receives plenty of input from the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the Federal Trade Commission and others within the executive branch."

Hughes Will Case Returning To Court. USA Today (11/6, Kasindorf) reports, "Nearly 30 years after jurors declared that a will left by Howard Hughes that gave a fortune to a Utah gas station owner was fake, Melvin Dummar is back in court claiming he was cheated out of a share in the billionaire's estate. … Several weeks after Hughes died at age 70 in 1976, a will purportedly in his handwriting was discovered on a desk in the Salt Lake City headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. News media went wild over the surprising bequest of $156 million to the obscure Dummar." In 1978, Nevada and Texas juries decided the will "was a forgery. Now, Dummar, 62, says a new witness came forward in 2004 who can confirm his story. He revived the half-forgotten case in June by filing a complaint of fraud and racketeering in federal court against Hughes heir William Lummis, 85, and Frank Gay, 77, former chief operating officer of Hughes' companies."

Tennessee GOP Chair Says Fraud Possible In Memphis. The AP (11/5) reports Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis Jr. "complained to Shelby County election officials that electronic voting machine cards were missing in Memphis, the hometown of Democratic U.S. Senate nominee Harold Ford Jr." In a letter dated Thursday, Davis wrote, "It has come to our attention that several smart cards used in early voting are missing from at least one early voting site in Memphis, Tenn. The lack of oversight and control over these smart cards has created a situation which could allow for voter fraud." The letter "called on the commission to 'locate these missing smart cards as soon as possible.' Tennessee Election Coordinator Brook Thompson said Friday that even if the cards aren't recovered, there is no danger of fraud. 'The cards are programmed such that once you use them, they cannot be reused until they are reactivated by the Election Commission,' he said."

DOJ Election Monitoring Effort Includes Kansas. The Lawrence Journal-World (11/6) reports, "A federal prosecutor will be available during Tuesday's election to respond to reports of possible election fraud and voting rights violations in Kansas. Assistant U.S. Atty. Leon Patton will be available as part of the Justice Department's nationwide Election Day program, which is an effort to increase the department's ability to deter election fraud and discrimination at the polls."

"New Breed Of Activist" To Monitor Poll Stations. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Kronholz) reports that on Tuesday "a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus. Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it." "This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," said Marybeth Kuznik, "who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania." The Journal adds, "Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count."

Kentucky School District Faces DOJ Civil Rights Probe. The AP (11/5) reports, "An eastern Kentucky school district faces a federal civil rights inquiry, attorneys for the school system said. The Greenup County School District and the U.S. Department of Justice Office of Civil Rights have exchanged preliminary materials, but the agency has not scheduled a visit to the area." School officials "wouldn't say what the nature of the inquiry is. Greenup Superintendent John Younce would neither confirm nor deny that an inquiry is under way or that federal officials are planning a visit to the district."

Morgan Stanley, Visa Europe To Settle Antitrust Dispute. The Financial Times (11/6, Buck) reports Morgan Stanley and Visa Europe "have agreed to settle a long-running antitrust dispute, in a move that could bring to an end a six-year competition probe by the European Commission into the credit card group. The dispute broke out after Visa refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network. The US investment bank had wanted to offer card services to shops and merchants in the European Union. However, Visa denied it access to its network, pointing to the fact that Morgan Stanley runs the Discover card in the US in competition with Visa."

CVS-Caremark Deal Would Create $75 Billion "Behemoth." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Levitz, Armstrong) reports CVS Corp.'s "$21 billion pact to buy Caremark Rx Inc. marks the biggest gamble yet for Thomas Ryan, the CVS chief who will lead the new company." Ryan "has helped build CVS from a regional drugstore chain into a national giant by buying rivals such as Revco DS Inc., Eckerd and Albertsons Inc.'s Save-On and Osco stores. Since ascending to the CEO and president posts at CVS in 1998, he has more than doubled the number of CVS stores to about 6,200. Sales are now $37 billion, up from $15 billion when he took over." The "savvy manager" has a "talent for overhauling and integrating sagging drugstore chains. But the Caremark deal, which would create a behemoth with $75 billion in annual revenue, represents a bigger deal than any he has tried before and CVS's first major acquisition of a company that isn't another drugstore chain."

Google-YouTube Antitrust Approval Noted. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B8) reports, "U.S. antitrust regulators cleared Google Inc.'s $1.65 billion purchase of online video-sharing company YouTube Inc., based on a document published Friday. No other details were available. A transaction involving Google and YouTube was listed on the Federal Trade Commission's daily publication of transactions whose reviews have been terminated."

Report Claims DOJ Declining To Prosecute FBI Terror Cases. The AP (11/5, Jordan) reports DOJ "increasingly has refused to prosecute FBI cases targeting suspected terrorists over the past five years, according to private researchers who reviewed department records. The government says the findings are inaccurate and 'intellectually dishonest.' The report being released Monday by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University raises questions about the quality of the FBI's investigations. Prosecutors declined to bring charges in 131 of 150, or 87 percent, of international terrorist case referrals from the FBI between October 2005 and June 2006, according to the report. The study was based on the most recent data available from the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys. That number marks the peak of generally steady increases from the 2001 budget year, when prosecutors rejected 33 percent of such cases from the FBI, according to the report. The data 'raise troubling questions about the bureau's investigation of criminal matters involving individuals the government has identified as international terrorists,' the report said."

USA Today (11/6, Johnson) reports DOJ "challenged the findings and said the analysis represented an 'astonishing misunderstanding' of the inner workings of the federal criminal justice system. 'This report contains inaccurate figures, relies on a faulty assumption that every referral from an investigative agency should result in a criminal prosecution and ignores the reality of how the war on terrorism is being conducted,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse." In the weeks after 9/11, DOJ "announced a dramatic transformation of its mission, from a prosecution-driven institution to an agency that emphasizes prevention and the development of a domestic intelligence system. Because of the new mission, Roehrkasse said, cases rejected for prosecution don't necessarily close investigations."

Burrus Says FBI Willing To Run Sting On Congress If Needed. McClatchy (11/5, Gordon) reports Assistant FBI Director James Burrus says the bureau "is ramping up its ability to catch crooked politicians and might run an undercover sting on Congress." Burrus "called the bureau's public corruption program 'a sleeping giant that we've awoken,' and predicted the nation will see continued emphasis in that area 'for many, many, many years to come.' So much evidence of wrongdoing is surfacing in the nation's capital that Burrus recently committed to adding a fourth 15- to 20-member public corruption squad to the FBI's Washington field office." FBI agents are investigating "about a dozen" members of Congress, "including as many as three senators. The Justice Department also is expected to begin seeking indictments soon after a massive FBI investigation of the Alaska Legislature. If conditions warrant, Burrus said, he wouldn't balk at urging an undercover sting like the famed Abscam operation in the late 1970s in which a U.S. senator and six House members agreed on camera to take bribes from FBI agents posing as Arab sheikhs."

Jefferson Fundraising Faltered In Wake Of FBI Probe Revelations. Under the headline "Probe Hits Jefferson In Wallet," the New Orleans Times-Picayune (11/4, Walsh) reported, "The federal bribery probe targeting U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is issue No. 1 in the race to unseat him, but it has also played a powerful role behind the scenes" in his reelection campaign. "Though he has not been charged, revelations that the FBI found $90,000 stashed in Jefferson's freezer in August 2005 have earned him the cold shoulder from many once-loyal donors, the majority of whom have migrated to the campaign of state Rep. Karen Carter, also a Democrat, who has become the favorite of the political establishment. … Jefferson's $151,375 haul between July 23 and Sept. 30 was eclipsed by Carter's $327,162 and Shepherd's $199,900." The Times-Picayune noted, "A review of Jefferson's campaign finance reports show that those who have stuck with him financially are members of his family, long-time friends and business associates, a few fellow members of the Congressional Black Caucus and a smattering of sympathetic businesses and unions."

FBI Evidence Leads Nigeria To Charge Government Officials. ABC News (11/3, Ross, Rhee, 12:56 p.m.) reported in its "The Blotter" blog, "Nigerian officials say the bribery investigation of Congressman William Jefferson…has uncovered a massive corruption scheme involving several members at the highest levels of the Nigerian government. Acting on information provided by the FBI, Nigerian fraud investigators have now indicted Vice President Atiku Abubakar on 14 counts of corruption, involving tens of millions of dollars allegedly diverted from government accounts. According to Nuhu Ribadu, head of a new anti-corruption squad created by Nigeria's president, $23 million of the diverted money is still missing. Ribadu said $6.7 million of the missing funds has been traced to a U.S. company tied to Congressman Jefferson's family." ABC noted, "Several other top Nigerian officials, including a state governor, have also been implicated in the scheme to divert government funds."

Mississippi Mayor Indicted On Fraud Conspiracy Charges. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger/AP(11/4) reported Winstonville, Miss., Mayor Milton Tutwiler "and a business partner have been indicted on charges of conspiracy to defraud the federal government." Tutwiler and Kenneth L. Blockett "are accused in connection with a more than $1.3 million grant by Mid-Delta Empowerment Zone Alliance to Winstonville to construct a building for the Mound Bayou Chemical Co. in 2001. The indictment also charged misapplication of funds by Tutwiler." The AP noted, "The case was investigated by the Internal Revenue Service, the FBI and the state auditor's office. The grant for the project, predicted to bring 150 jobs to the Delta, was awarded in August, 2001. … However, the plant never finished and never opened."

Prominent Florida Lobbyist Indicted In Palm Beach Corruption Probe. The Palm Beach Post (11/4, Dubocq, Musgrave) reported, "Political fallout again shook Palm Beach County government Friday when William Boose, a powerful lobbyist and former planning director, was charged as a co-conspirator in the federal corruption case against former County Commission Chairman Tony Masilotti." Boose "is accused of helping to conceal Masilotti's $1.3 million profit from a government land deal." The Post noted, "A grand jury accused Boose of helping Masilotti cover up a scheme to secretly profit from a 2003 land deal in Martin County. When FBI agents started asking questions, Boose allegedly lied and falsified legal bills to disguise the fact he didn't charge Masilotti full price for legal services. … His business relationship with the commissioner never was disclosed, the grand jury reported."

Former Florida FCI Guards Convicted In Sex-For-Contraband Scheme. The Tallahassee Democrat (11/4, Subramanyam) reported, "Two former Federal Correctional Institution officers are headed to prison following their convictions Friday evening in federal court." Gregory Dixon "was found guilty on three counts of bribery after three former and current FCI inmates testified he gave them contraband in exchange for sex. … He was found not guilty on two conspiracy charges and witness tampering. He was found guilty on the charge of conspiracy to accept illegal gratuity, which carries a lesser sentence." Codefendant Alan Moore "was convicted of witness tampering and on the lesser charges of conspiracy and accepting illegal gratuity. He was found not guilty of bribery involving an exchange of contraband for sex." The AP (11/4, Kaczor) added, "'Any prosecution is trying to send a message,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls said after the verdict. Defense lawyer Robert Harper said he didn't think it would be the right kind of message, though. 'This case to me sends a dangerous message to every male correctional officer at every female correctional institution,' Harper said."

Executive Pleads Guilty In Indiana Concrete Price-Fixing Probe. The Indianapolis Star (11/4, Corcoran) reported, "Only two area ready-mix concrete executives are still awaiting trial in connection with a broad price-fixing conspiracy after Friday's sudden guilty plea by a third executive in federal court. Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., are scheduled to go on trial Nov. 13." The Star noted that Builder's Concrete & Supply Vice President John J. Blatzheim "pleaded guilty Friday, acknowledging he joined the local conspiracy in April 2003. In exchange, federal prosecutors dismissed a charge of lying to the FBI and antitrust investigators that carried a five-year prison term."

Judge Grants US Request To Maintain Custody Of Jeffs Evidence. The Deseret Morning News (11/4, Winslow) reported, "Federal authorities are trying to keep their hands on evidence seized by the FBI when Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs was captured. In an unusual move, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah asked a Nevada federal judge to let three of its lawyers handle the evidence battle," and "on Friday, a federal judge in Las Vegas granted their request." Defense lawyers say the "seized documents, letters and other papers…are protected by the FLDS leader's right to freedom of religion and clergy-communicant privilege," but "federal prosecutors in Utah have filed an unlawful flight to avoid prosecution warrant against Jeffs and have threatened to seek a grand-jury indictment should he ever be granted bail." The Morning News noted, "Jeffs was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in August during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas."

FBI Considering Billboard Campaign Boston Art Theft Investigation. The Boston Globe (11/4, Murphy) reported, "The FBI is considering a billboard campaign as part of its international hunt for $300 million worth of artwork that was stolen from the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston in 1990 by thieves who masqueraded as police officers to get inside, according to the agency 'We are evaluating investigative techniques designed to solicit information from the public regarding the investigation, including the use of billboards,' said Thomas Larned, an assistant special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Boston office. … Larned said that using billboards as part of a publicity campaign was under consideration, 'however we have no imminent plans.'" The Globe notes, "Julian Radcliffe -- chairman of the Art Loss Register in London, which is the world's largest database of stolen art and antiques dedicated to their recovery -- said he had never heard of billboards being used to help locate stolen pieces. Radcliffe added, "I think the chances of it attracting somebody who knows where the pictures are is probably not very high."

Boston SAC Appointed FBI Inspection Division Chief. In a story taking very positive tone toward FBI Boston SAC Kenneth W. Kaiser, the Boston Globe (11/4, Murphy) reported the he was appointed Friday "to serve as assistant director of the Inspection Division, which evaluates and audits the work of the FBI's field offices, conducts internal investigations of alleged misconduct by bureau employees, and investigates shootings by FBI agents. It will be a bittersweet departure for Kaiser, who said yesterday that he regrets being unable to capture fugitive gangster James 'Whitey' Bulger," but Kaiser "said he believes that he has left the once-beleaguered office in better shape than he found it by repairing the FBI's relationship with other law enforcement agencies after it had been badly frayed by corrupt agents who protected Bulger from prosecution and helped him slip away just before his 1995 indictment." Kaiser said in a telephone interview, "I think the perception now is that the FBI is a team player…that we really are looking for Whitey Bulger, and that the Boston office isn't a corrupt office." The AP (11/4) noted, "During Kaiser's tenure, the bureau launched an investigation into the Big Dig and secured an indictment an alleged Al Qaeda operative. He also commanded an emergency team in Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina.

Murdered Virginia Woman Was Undercover Informant For Police, FBI. The Washington Times (11/6, McElhatton) reports, "An Alexandria woman fatally shot last month in what police are calling a targeted hit worked undercover and cooperated with the FBI in violent-crime and drug cases up and down the East Coast, previously sealed records show." Bethlehem Ayele "assisted in a homicide investigation in Connecticut, arranged an FBI sting in Florida and testified against drug dealers in the District." She was killed "while waiting at a stoplight," and "the shooting prompted immediate speculation about whether Miss Ayele's death was tied to her testimony against members of the so-called Murder Inc. drug gang in the District. … 'Detectives still believe she was targeted, but they have not determined exactly why,' Amy Bertsch, a spokeswoman for the Alexandria Police Department, said yesterday."

California Marijuana Law Said To Create Risk For Doctors. The AP (11/5, Leff) reports that since California "passed the nation's first medical marijuana law a decade ago, a provision requiring written doctor approval to grow and buy pot has created conflict between the state mandate and federal drug laws, and strained the doctor-patient relationship. Until the stalemate is resolved, doctors recommending marijuana do it with trepidation and a good deal of risk. … Although a federal appeals court ruled four years ago that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration cannot go after doctors merely because they recommend marijuana to patients, the state medical board's guidelines make it clear the ruling did not amount to immunity either from prosecution or disciplinary proceedings."

Future Of Law Unclear. In a separate story, the AP (11/5) writes, "A decade ago, California voters were the first in the United States to approve medical marijuana, and 10 other states have since followed suit. But the future of the landmark California statute is no clearer now than when voters headed to the polls on Nov. 5, 1996. The federal government still refuses to recognize Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act approved by 56 percent of voters. … The DEA says it is targeting dispensaries and other large–scale growing and selling operations, whether the marijuana is for medical or illicit use." News outlets that used a version of the AP story include CBS News, FOX News, Forbes, the Washington Post, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Tribune, Boston Herald, and Arizona Republic.

Medical Marijuana Claims Seen As Misleading. In Los Angeles, KCAL-TV (11/3) reports on its Web site that the assertion that all medical marijuana "is headed for seriously ill patients is misleading," based on statistics from the California Branch of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML)." The DEA and its local and state counterparts "routinely report that large-scale drug traffickers hide behind and invoke Proposition 215, even when there is no evidence of any medical claim."

In Alabama, British Aristocrat Admits Role In Transporting 15,000 Pounds Of Marijuana. The Mobile (AL) Press-Register (11/4, Kirby) reports a British aristocrat who "fought extradition to the United States for the better part of a decade stood in handcuffs and leg shackles Friday before a federal judge in Mobile to admit his guilt in a massive drug conspiracy. Giles Richard Carlyle-Clarke…pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana. He admitted responsibility for 15,000 pounds of marijuana that came into the country by way of Baldwin County and St. Petersburg, Fla." Prosecutors "hailed the plea as the latest victory in an investigation that dates to the 1980s and has resulted in more than 70 indictments and 65 convictions."

The AP (11/3) also reports on Carlyle-Clarke's guilty plea.

Texas Authorities Grapple With High Cost Of Destroying Drugs. In McAllen, Texas, the AP (11/5, Brezosky) reports in a region that "is a gateway for drugs coming from Latin America and bound for cities throughout the United States, destroying drugs means sending a caravan of vehicles and officers on a two-day trip costing $8,000 to $10,000. For McAllen, in particular, it means unloading tons of contraband from the 8-foot by 40-foot evidence bunker and into a rented moving van, which is then driven to a privately run incinerator near Dallas. … 'For obvious reasons of security and safety, we can't reveal where we burn or destroy our evidence, but it is a concern for us in terms of the costliness of it,' Houston-based DEA spokesman Ray D'Alessio said. 'We're exploring different options right now.'"

Houston DEA Agent Targeted By Ex-Wife In Murder-For-Hire Case. The Houston Chronicle (11/5, Rogers) reports a Houston DEA agent's ex-wife "pleaded guilty Friday to trying to hire someone to kill him. Pamela Bishop, 38, got deferred adjudication for solicitation of capital murder of Donald Noell Bishop. The conviction will be dropped from her criminal record if she stays out of trouble the next six years. … Except for saying the incident stemmed from an acrimonious divorce, her attorney…declined to comment on the circumstances surrounding the charge because the couple are still in a custody fight for their children."

Colorado Newspaper Endorses Marijuana Amendment. The Rocky Mountain News (11/3) reports the Colorado Springs Gazette has endorsed Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of small amounts of marijuana. 'We encourage freedom lovers to vote yes on Amendment 44,' the newspaper said on its editorial page. 'The long journey toward a more rational and workable national drug control policy begins with a single step,'" the newspaper said.

IMMIGRATION

Texas Launches Online Border Monitoring. The AP (11/4) reported, "Texas launched its ambitious effort to use Internet users to watch the border for illegal immigrants. But the network of surveillance cameras was plagued by technical problems, the images were grainy and the cameras were placed so high that it was hard to distinguish a person from, say, a bush. Republican Gov. Rick Perry, who announced plans over the summer to spend $5 million on the virtual posse, asked for 'forgiveness on the front end of this,' but dismissed the problems as routine computer glitches."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (11/4, Mcgee) reported, "Gov. Rick Perry's spokeswoman, Kathy Walt, said Friday that cameras may have been down for temporary adjustments and that the Web site is still a 'test site.' … The Border Patrol has cameras in every sector of Texas' border with Mexico, said Mike Friel, spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection. He said the cameras work in daylight or at night and can be rotated 180 degrees by the Border Patrol agents or National Guardsmen who use them." The cameras "were installed free by companies that hope to win contracts when the governor installs more, Walt said. Perry wants to have 70 to 100 cameras on the border eventually, she said."

Judge Rules City Officials Cannot Fine Landlords For Housing Illegal Immigrants. US News and World Report (11/5) reports, "The country's immigration battle took another turn last week when a federal judge blocked two landmark immigration ordinances in Hazleton, Pa., from being enforced just hours before they were to go into effect. The measures, now on hold until November 14, would have allowed city officials to fine landlords housing illegal immigrants and deny business permits to companies that hire them. Judge James Munley said enforcement would cause 'irreparable harm' to businesses catering to Hispanics. His decision was in response to a suit filed by Hispanic groups and the American Civil Liberties Union."

Border Agents Plan To Appeal Shooting Sentence. The Washington Times (11/6, Seper) reports, that Jose Alonso Compean, 28, and Ignacio Ramos, 37, "sentenced to lengthy prison terms for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect as he fled across the Rio Grande want a new trial, saying three jurors claim they were pressured into returning guilty verdicts." Compean was sntenced to 12 years in prison, and Ramos to 11, for "causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation."

Ramos' attorney, Mary Stillinger, "plans to appeal the case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans based, in part, on sworn affidavits of three jurors -- Robert Gourley, Claudia Torres and Edine Woods -- who said they were incorrectly instructed that their verdict had to be unanimous and that the judge would not accept a hung jury."

CNN Live Sunday (11/5, 6:37 p.m.) contrasts Compean and Ignacio's sentences with six-year sentences handed down against two agents convicted of taking bribes. CNN notes that Compean and Ignacio were charged under a law intended to prosecute drug smugglers and other violent criminals. Former prosecutor Laurie Levenson added, "Prosecutor have lots of discretion in deciding what charges to bring. … Once prosecutors decide an agent has crossed the line into criminal behavior, they are inclined to throw the book at them."

CBP Debuts Unmanned Aerial Vehicles At Mexican Border. The Washington Times (11/6, Seper) reports, "U.S. Customs and Border Protection has launched its newest weapon in securing the nation's borders with the debut of an unmanned aerial vehicle capable of providing an 'eye in the sky' for Border Patrol agents on the ground. … The agency's new unmanned aircraft, known as the MQ-9 Predator B, began limited operations last week from Libby Army Airfield in Fort Huachuca, Ariz., to support enforcement activities along the U.S.-Mexico border. The aircraft was introduced during ceremonies Tuesday in Arizona hosted by Air and Marine Assistant Commissioner Michael Kostelnik." The unmanned aircraft "give the agency improved and expanded mission capabilities to meet what" CBP Commissioner W. Ralph. Basham "has described as 'the continuing terrorist threat to our nation.'"

Impact Of 1986 Immigrant Reform Bill Assessed. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Henao) reports, "Twenty years ago Monday, Congress passed the largest effort to date to curb undocumented immigration to this country. Under the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), employers were sanctioned for the first time for hiring undocumented workers." The bill "also called for tighter controls along the Mexican border. But the bill was a compromise: Enforcement was balanced by an amnesty provision." Nearly "3 million undocumented immigrants were granted legal residence under the amnesty. Most of them were Mexican (more than 80 percent) and lived in the Los Angeles area. Salvadorans, Filipinos, Haitians, Poles, and Vietnamese also benefited from the program." Critics "say the bill set a damaging precedent for future amnesties. IRCA supporters say the word 'amnesty' mischaracterizes the bill's intent." Former Rep. Romano Mazzoli, a sponsor of IRCA, "defends the bill as the best way to combat illegal immigration at the time. The six administrations that followed, he says, are to blame for not enforcing tighter restrictions." The Monitor also examines the stories of seven immigrants who took advantage of the amnesty program.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION

Bush Welcomes Saddam Death Sentence As Some Question Pre-Election Timing. The death sentence given Sunday to former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and two former senior members of his regime dominates Monday's headlines. On the only network news broadcast Sunday evening, ABC World News (10/30, lead story, 2:50, Harris) lead its program with a report on the sentencing. As party of its report, ABC noted briefly that President Bush, while campaigning in Texas yesterday, "called the outcome of that trial a milestone for the Iraqi people. He said the verdict and death sentence provide a verdict and measure of justice many thought would never come." Bush was shown saying, "Iraq has a lot of work ahead as it builds its society, as it delivers equal justice and protects all its citizens. Yet, history will regard today's judgment as an important achievement on the path to a free and just and unified society."

The AP (11/6, Loven) reports Bush "painted Saddam's conviction and sentence as vindication of the sacrifices made by American soldiers in Iraq. More than 2,800 members of the US military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003." Said Bush, "They've sacrificed for the security of the United States. … Without their courage and skill, today's verdict would not have happened." AFP (11/6, Knox), meanwhile, says that "two days before Tuesday's vote, dozens of congressional races were too close to call and two national public opinion surveys favored Democrats overall but suggested a late burst of energy among Bush's Republicans." Bush "was in Nebraska and Kansas as part of an 11th-hour political rescue mission for struggling Republican candidates facing unexpectedly strong Democratic challenges in part because of anger at the war in Iraq. 'Saddam Hussein was a threat,' he said, amid signs the conflict could cost his party control of the US Congress. 'My decision to remove Saddam Hussein was the right decision, and the world is better off for it.'"

Some Democrats and media analysts suggested the timing of the sentence was designed to influence the US elections. In its report on the sentencing, the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A3, Shishkin) notes, "With US congressional elections taking place this week, many Iraqis suspect the Bush administration somehow influenced the timing of the sentence to benefit the Republican party," but White House spokesman Tony Snow Sunday dismissed the idea as "preposterous."

The Washington Post (11/6, A16, Baker) reports, "Bush called the verdict a "landmark event" in Iraq's transition to democracy, and aides hoped it would be seen as vindication of his decision to go to war. Democrats were quick to agree that justice had been done for a vicious tyrant but argued it would not fix what they see as the debacle in Iraq." The Post also notes that the timing of the verdict "stirred anxiety among Democrats who worried it could be a 'November surprise' that would persuade Republicans to turn out," and "some voiced suspicions that the Bush administration had orchestrated the court schedule to influence the vote, a contention the White House rejected."

The New York Times (11/6, Nagourney, Rutenberg) says Bush "seized on the conviction of Saddam Hussein as a milestone in Iraq, seeking to rally Republican voters with the issue of national security as some polls suggested that his party might be making gains in the final hours of the campaign." The Times also notes that the White House "said the timing of the announcement, two days before Election Day, had nothing to do with American politics and had been dictated by the Iraqi court. But Mr. Bush moved quickly to put it to use in what has been his central strategic imperative over the past week, trying to rouse Republican voters to turn out."

The issue also came up on the Sunday political talk shows. On CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer) White House spokesman Tony Snow said the claim that the verdict was timed to coincide with US elections is "preposterous," Adding, "This is one of these tinfoil hat sort of things, where people suddenly decide, if there is news that may call into questions the things that they've been saying, that somehow we've been scheming and plotting with the Iraqis. … The important thing about this is we've got an independent Iraqi judiciary. The Iraqis are the ones who conducted the trial. The Iraqi judges are the ones who spent all the time poring over the evidence from July 27 to the present."

House majority leader John Boehner was asked on Fox News Sunday (11/5, Wallace) if he thinks the Saddam Hussein verdict will "energize" Republicans, Boehner replied, "I think so. … Democrats just want to give up in Iraq. They just want to pull out the troops. We're in a very serious war with people who want to kill us. And if we don't win in Iraq, we're going to embolden terrorists all over the world. And today's victory is a victory for the Iraqi people."

Sen. Elizabeth Dole, on NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert), said, "I think what this shows is that the Iraqis are putting their past behind them; the establishment of the rule of law. I feel that this will mean they are moving forward.

On NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert) Rep. Rahm Emanuel commented that though "it's good that he is behind bars and getting the justice that he deserves…I would also like to remind that, about three years ago when he was caught…there were about 800 Americans who were dead at that point. Today there are a little over 2,800 Americans that have died. It won't change the facts on the ground there. And it won't impact the election here."

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, on CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer) said, "This is another step forward in making sure that we defeat radical Islam and keep the homeland safe. … This is now one more step in building a safe and a more secure Iraq. And we've had other victories that people don't focus on."

GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, discussing the sentencing, called for deployment of additional US troops to Iraq. During an appearance on CNN's Early Edition (11/5, Blitzer), Graham said that while the verdict is "a step forward" the overall violence "is worse. And I don't think we've ever had enough troops on the ground. … You'll never convince me that the security apparatus that we have in place now is working. We need more Iraqi troops. We need more American troops, coalition troops, in the short-term. To have a democracy, you can't have this level of violence."

Reactions To Saddam Death Sentence Said To Highlight Rift Among Iraqis. The Washington Times/AP (11/6, Hurst) reports, "An Iraqi court yesterday sentenced Saddam Hussein to death for crimes against humanity, convicting the former dictator and six subordinates in the torture and murder of nearly 150 Shi'ites from the city of Dujail in 1982." Saddam "trembled and shouted 'God is great' when Chief Judge Raouf Abdul-Rahman declared the former leader guilty and sentenced him to hang." The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Peterson) notes Saddam also "accused the judge of the US-created tribunal of being a 'mouthpiece of occupation and colonialism,' and cursed 'your law and your articles and clauses.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/6, Daragahi) says the trial, "once viewed as a means of reconciliation and justice, instead seemed to fuel the sectarian division that grips the country. Some Shiites and Kurds celebrated. Some Sunnis mourned angrily."

USA Today (11/6, Brook) reports "celebratory gunfire that erupted Sunday after the announcement of Saddam Hussein's death sentence dissipated quickly as Iraqis went about their lives in a city fractured by sectarian violence." In other areas, "the verdict was denounced. Demonstrators in Tikrit, the former Iraqi leader's hometown, defied a curfew and carried his picture through the streets. Residents of some Sunni neighborhoods in the capital traded gunfire with police, while mortar shells burst in other Sunni areas."

In a front page report, the Washington Post (11/6, A1, Knickmeyer) says that following the sentencing, "A divided and violence-ridden Iraq broke into starkly disparate displays of emotion." The Post notes that the US "largely funded Hussein's trial, and US officials close to the trial said Sunday's outcome vindicated the policy of having courts in individual nations try cases involving war crimes and crimes against humanity. The Bush administration has been a leading opponent of international tribunals, fearing that US soldiers could be tried before them for political reasons."

The Chicago Tribune (11/6, Madhani) notes "the court also convicted former Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan of premeditated murder and sentenced him to life in prison. Three other co-defendants of Hussein -- Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid, Ali Dayih Ali and Abdullah Kazim -- were convicted of murder and torture and sentenced to up to 15 years in prison." An eighth defendant, Mohammed Azawi Ali, "a low-ranking Baath party official, was acquitted for lack of evidence."

Also on its front page, the New York Times (11/6, A1, Burns, Semple) reports that although "an automatic appeal of the death sentence will delay it…some Iraqi judicial officials privately held out the possibility that Mr. Hussein could go to the gallows in a matter of months, perhaps before next spring. That may depend on behind-the-scenes maneuvering by Mr. Hussein's embattled successors in Iraq's new government, who have already shown that they are not hesitant to pressure judges in the case." Meanwhile, the Times says the "contrasting reaction to the verdicts, in the heavily fortified courthouse in Baghdad and across Iraq, was a testament to the bitter divisions sown by the toppling of Mr. Hussein in April 2003, and to the country's spiraling descent since then into a near-anarchy of insurgency and sectarian killing." Outside of Iraq, the reaction "was negative from some in other Arab countries and from Western legal-monitoring and rights groups, which had been critical of procedures at the trial, saying they were loaded in favor of 'victor's justice' and that the Bush administration should have insisted that an international court hear the cases." The New York Times (11/6, Tavernise) runs another story on the verdict titled "In A Divided Iraq, Reaction To Saddam Death Sentence Conforms To Sectarian Lines."

In a report on Iraqis' reactions to the sentence, the Washington Post (11/6, A15, Raghavan, Dehema) says that "for the Sunnis of Kadhimiyah, the verdict drove another nail into the coffin of the man many still see as the leader of their community, which once ruled Iraq but now feels more besieged than ever. The sentence, some said, was the work of a victor's court that was more interested in vengeance than judicial fairness." Meanwhile, "For the more numerous Shiites…after decades of repression under Hussein's government, the verdict delivered the justice they have long sought. … Shiites also rejoiced in the hope that their political future in Iraq and in the region would become more secure."

The Financial Times (11/6, A1, Negus) says the court is expected "to produce a long written explanation of its judgment in the coming weeks, which legal experts say will be crucial in determining whether Mr. Hussein and his co-defendants were given a fair hearing."

Under the headline "Hussein Sentence Could Heighten Rifts In Iraq," the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A3, Shishkin) warns that sentence "could deepen Iraq's sectarian rifts and inflame the anti-American insurgency. … With violence on the streets of Baghdad at its highest level in years, the verdict is unlikely to alter the pattern of the sectarian conflict or attacks against US troops, but it will provide another divisive issue for a country struggling to hold itself together." For example, the Journal notes that "in a sign of how embittered the Sunnis are at Iraq's current leadership, Saleh al-Mutlaq, [a] Sunni politician, warned that the verdict could lead to more sectarian attacks for which the Shiite government will bear responsibility."

In a separate report on reaction around the Middle East, the New York Times (11/6, Fattah) reports that "many in the region said that the verdict had been a foregone conclusion and questioned whether it had been fair. … Many analysts and others in the region who followed the trial said that what mattered was how the court had reached its judgment and that the process had seemed highly flawed. But critics and supporters of Mr. Hussein…said they were left with more frustration than closure. Most Arabs interviewed Sunday said they did not believe the trial was fair. They said it had seemed politicized, that the judges had not seemed to be in control of the process and that rulings about procedures had seemed contradictory. Almost everyone agreed that the verdict was unlikely to stop the violence gripping Iraq."

The AP (11/6, Kole) reports, "Worldwide, the range of reactions -- including a European outcry over capital punishment and doubts about the fairness of the tribunal that ordered Saddam to hang -- reflected new geopolitical fault lines drawn after America's decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and depose its dictator." The European Union "welcomed the verdict but said Saddam should not be put to death. At the Vatican, Cardinal Renato Martino, Pope Benedict XVI's top prelate for justice issues, called the sentence a throwback to 'eye for an eye' vengeance." Islamic leaders "warned that executing Saddam could inflame those who revile the U.S., undermining President Bush's policy in the Middle East and inspiring terrorists."

In an analysis, the AP (11/6, Reid) says, "The future of Iraq may depend little on whether Saddam Hussein hangs. The Sunni insurgency is so deeply entrenched and sectarian bloodlust so strong that Iraq seems set to continue spiraling into violence—regardless of its former president's fate. Some fear that the Saddam verdict, by angering the Sunni minority, could intensify the violence once a curfew in Baghdad is lifted. Others say they hope the verdict gives Iraqis a chance 'to unite and build a better future,' in the words of the US Ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. But in the end, Saddam's fate is not what's driving the violence in Iraq now. Instead, religious, nationalistic and sectarian passions have taken over and are tearing the country apart."

The New York Times (11/6, Preston) reports, "Lawyers and human rights advocates broadly agreed that the Iraqi tribunal's proceedings frequently fell short of international standards for war crimes cases." But "even critics of the trial said the five Iraqi judges who heard the case had made a reasonable effort to conduct a fair trial in the face of sustained pressure from Iraqi political leaders for a swift death sentence. American lawyers pointed to substantial evidence offered by the prosecution implicating Mr. Hussein in the crimes against humanity with which he had been charged." McClatchy (11/6, Youssef) and USA Today (11/6, Jervis), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

The Washington Post (11/6, Kennicott) analyzes Saddam's demeanor during the sentencing, saying "Hussein managed to remain consistent to his prewar public image throughout it all. The military fatigues came off, but with his Koran in hand and the formulaic and economical arm gestures of an impatient despot he never seemed anything less than entirely convinced that he was still Saddam Hussein, a latter-day incarnation of Nebuchadnezzar. Throughout it all, he had a loyal audience. … A broken man doesn't take such care with his cuffs, nor stuff a handkerchief in his breast pocket, as Hussein did for his court appearance. Only the fatigue in his eyes and the gaunt appearance of his face suggested any sign of soul searching -- and even that reading of his visage is probably wishful thinking."

NYTimes Criticizes Trial, Urges Appeals Court To Defer Death Sentence. The New York Times (11/6) editorializes, "Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial 'a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.'" The Times adds, "The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds."

More Commentary. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/6), former CPA head Paul Bremer writes, "Without resolving Saddam Hussein's fate -- and the human-rights record of the regime he led -- the Shiites and Kurds can never make true peace with their Sunni fellow citizens. So the verdict should be seen as a necessary, though not sufficient, step in helping Iraq's persecuted majority put behind them the awful years of Saddam's brutal rule."

In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/6) says "the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded."

The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14) editorializes, "Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq." But "to make it permanent, the US must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the US commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job."

Cheney Says Election Won't Affect Bush's Policies In Iraq. Vice President Cheney, asked on ABC's This Week (11/5) if he foresees Tuesday's vote having any influence over "the President's Iraq policy," replied, "I think it'll have some effect, perhaps, in the Congress, but the President's made clear what his objective is: It's victory in Iraq, and it's full speed ahead on that basis. And that's exactly what we're going to do." When host George Stephanopoulos noted that "it seems like the public has turned against it right now," Cheney said, "It may not be popular with the public. It doesn't matter in the sense that we have to continue the mission and do what we think it right. And that's exactly what we're doing. We're not running for office; we're doing what we think it right."

The Financial Times (11/6, Luce) notes Cheney also "said that a US withdrawal from Iraq would undermine the 'war on terror' by sending the wrong signals to allies such as Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, and Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan. 'You cannot make national security policy on the basis of that [election outcomes],' he said."

The AP (11/6), meanwhile, reports Cheney "will spend Election Day on his first hunting trip since he accidentally shot a companion last February while aiming at a covey of quail on a private Texas ranch."

Cheney Claims Lamont's Primary Win Boosted Iraqi Insurgents. Stephanopoulos also asked Cheney, on ABC's This Week (11/5), if a Democratic victory would also represent a victory for Iraqi insurgents. Cheney responded, "I think what they're trying to do, obviously, is execute on their strategy. And if you think about their strategy, it isn't to defeat us militarily; they can't do that. But what they're betting on -- Osama bin Laden talks about it -- is that they can, in fact, ultimately break the will of the American people, that they can persuade enough Americans that we'll ultimately leave. And then they cite Beirut in 1983, Mogadishu in 1993 as examples where the U.S. took casualties and then departed. So that's their basic, fundamental, underlying strategy. … I think when they see something happen, such as happened in Connecticut this year, where the Democratic Party, in effect, purged Joe Lieberman, primarily over his support for the president and the war, that says to them that their strategy is working."

Biden Calls Cheney "Somewhere Between Dysfunctional And Delusional." Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (11/5, Schieffer) if the elections will impact "the president's war policy and what's going on in Iraq," Sen. Joseph Biden answered, "I do. Notwithstanding what Vice President Cheney says, that it won't have any impact at all, or that it's going to disregard the elections as it relates to Iraq. I think the combination of the Army Times and the Navy Times calling for Rumsfeld's resignation, which is a slap in the face of the way this war is being run, as well as the neo-conservatives like Perle and Adelman calling the president's policy dysfunctional, I think all of this is mounting. And what's going to happen is, if we make gains in the House and Senate, whether we win them or not, I think you'll see a lot of Republicans willing to join me and others in a plan for Iraq that is a rational way in which we can responsibly bring home more troops and leave a stable Iraq behind." Biden added that Cheney is "somewhere between dysfunctional and delusional about this war. … The fact of the matter is, very few Republicans in the Senate, if any, think the policy makes any sense the way we're going now."

Emanuel Outlines Democrats' "Five Basic Principles" Regarding Iraq. Rep. Rahm Emanuel was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (11/5, Russert) if the Democrats have a plan for changing US policy on war in Iraq, Emanuel answered, "Whether Senator Biden's idea on Iraq -- which I think is a strong idea -- Senator Levin's program, Congressman Jack Murtha, and Congressman Ike Skelton, there are five basic principles that hold Democrats together on our approach to Iraq: First, regional cooperation; second, reconciliation among the parties; third, reconstruction of the economy; fourth, responsibility for results; and fifth is redeployment from Iraq. Those are the five principles."

White House Said To Be Making Plans To Work With A Democratic Congress. The New York Times' "White House Memo" (11/6, Stolberg, Sanger) reports, "In recent weeks, President Bush, as well, has appeared to dig in his heels on the war in Iraq, saying he would consider changes in tactics but not strategy." But "with Mr. Bush facing the likelihood of a remade political landscape in Washington, even if his party holds on to both houses of Congress, the White House is sending signals that Mr. Bush is open to a shift in approach. After six years of virtually ignoring Democrats as he pressed his own party to do his bidding on Capitol Hill, Mr. Bush and his aides are charting a course that they say will take the president back to his roots as Texas governor, when he worked in a more bipartisan way with Democrats." They "are piecing together a domestic agenda that includes reviving the president's failed bid to overhaul entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, White House officials and allies of the administration said. The president has assigned Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to spearhead the effort, and the White House says it is quietly reaching out to Democrats on Capitol Hill."

Parties Unleash GOTV Efforts As GOP Sees Glimer Of Hope In Last-Minute Polls. The Washington Post (11/6, A1, Balz, VandeHei) reports, "Republicans seized on signs of movement in their direction yesterday as they unleashed a massive election-eve voter mobilization operation in an effort to stave off potentially substantial losses in the House and preserve at least a slender majority in the Senate." Democrats "answered the Republicans' get-out-the-vote machinery with intensified efforts to contact infrequent and still-undecided voters in a handful of tight Senate races as well as in a dozen GOP-held House districts where races were too close to call." A Pew Research Center poll "showed a significant narrowing in the partisan advantage in House races that the Democrats have enjoyed for much of the year, findings that echoed those of a Washington Post-ABC News poll released Saturday showing the Democrats with a six-point edge." The Pew poll "showed that the Democratic advantage had dropped to 47 percent to Republicans' 43 percent among likely voters, down from 50 percent to 39 percent two weeks ago. The poll found a drop in Democratic support among independents, but Pew Director Andrew Kohut said the most significant change over the past two weeks is that Republicans now outnumber Democrats among likely voters." However, "other weekend polls by Time and Newsweek magazines continued to show Republicans at a steep disadvantage, with Democrats enjoying double-digit margins in party preferences for the House."

ABC World News (10/30, story 2, 2:40, Morrell) last night also noted its own poll showing "51% of likely voters favor Democrats. 45% support Republicans. But that spread is shrinking, down eight points in two weeks." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary, was shown saying, "We don't look at this with rose-colored glasses. We look at every single race. The President's been out. And he's active in a lot of close campaigns. Look, we think we're going to hold the House and Senate." White House "officials acknowledge they will lose seats Tuesday. But believe they can escape with a slim majority. As one senior advisor told me…that this election is going to look a lot like 2000. After that election, the Senate was split 50-50. And Republicans held a seven-seat edge in the House. But even that would require everything breaking the GOP's way."

Despite some of the late polling, most media reports last night and this morning continue to suggest a big Democratic win is more than likely. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Feldmann), in a story headlined "All Signs Point To A US House Run By Democrats," says "If most of the political prognosticators are calling it right, the House of Representatives is poised for a change of leadership: the first Democratic majority in 12 years. Among the nonpartisan analysts who study the polls and dynamics of each of the 435 House races, the more cautious see the lower range of the Democratic net gain at about 20 seats -- more than enough to achieve the 15-seat net gain needed to take control. On the higher end, the Democrats could achieve a more commanding takeover with net gains of 30 to 40 seats, they say."

The AP (11/6, Espo) says Republicans "are staggering into the final hours of the election campaign like a spent force, with a less than lofty goal of losing seats but clinging to power. Political scandal already has claimed some of those who swept to power a dozen years ago…and tarnished the rest." The Financial Times (11/6, Yeager, Pennsylvania) runs a similar piece under the headline "Hopes Run Low For Republicans."

ABC World News (10/30, story 3, 2:15, Harris) reported "the Democrats are smelling opportunity. And they are bringing out their big guns in these final hours." ABC (Cordes) added, "Democrats were upbeat in this final weekend of campaigning. Some top Democratic strategists now predict that come Tuesday, the party could pick up double the 15 seats it needs to win control of the House of Representatives."

ABC World News (10/30, story 4, 2:40, Stephanopoulos) said "the story of the night," referring to Tuesday, is that "the Republican party is on defense. On one level, that's what always happens to Presidents in their sixth year. But this time around, it's intensified by the war. The war in Iraq. The number one issue. It's held down the President. It's held down Republicans. That's why there's so many seats in play." Gibson: "Everyone wonders how quickly will we know? And I'm fascinated by the illustration, when you look at the states across the East and Midwest. You go from Connecticut, to Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana. Those states. There are 21 seats at play. And every one of them to are seats in the House that the Republicans are having to defend."

USA Today (11/6, Page) reports a new "national USA TODAY/Gallup Poll finds remarkable parallels between the congressional elections Tuesday and the watershed elections in 1994 that swept Republicans into control of Congress. Then, likely voters by 51%-44% favored GOP congressional candidates. Now, 51%-44% favor Democratic ones. Then, 52% said they were paying 'quite a lot' of attention to the elections, the highest since the Gallup Poll began asking the question in 1958. Now, 50% say they are paying 'quite a lot' of attention. Then, disapproval of Congress was at 66%. Now, disapproval of Congress is at 70%."

USA Today (11/6, Lawrence) also reports, "Both political parties are making huge last-minute cash infusions into close House and Senate races, underscoring their traditional importance in endgame spending and the Democrats' new financial competitiveness with Republicans. Just since Friday, Republicans have put more than $2 million into Senate races in New Jersey, Tennessee and Virginia, federal reports show. Democrats have spent $1.1 million for Senate candidates in Maryland, Montana, Tennessee and Virginia." On the House side, Republicans "spent $1.1 million in a single day to help Peter Roskam in his race against Democrat Tammy Duckworth in Illinois. And in a sign of continuing concern, the Republicans invested $275,000 to help their embattled House campaign chief, New York Rep. Tom Reynolds." USA Today adds, "A check of 10 tight House races shows that as of Friday, Democratic party committees had spent nearly as much as Republicans in Indiana, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington. They outspent Republicans in New Hampshire, Connecticut and Arizona."

The New York Times (11/6, Zernike), in a story titled "National Issues, Led by Iraq, Dominate Final Appeals in Congressional Campaigns ," says Republicans are trying to ruen the election on local issues. However, "across the country, candidates clashed Sunday over the war, immigration, the economy, ethics and the Bush administration, seeking advantage in the closing hours of an election that will determine control of the House and the Senate."

The Washington Times (11/6, Hurt), in a story titled "Bitter Campaign Boils Down To Party Turnout," says Democrats "must overcome a Republican ground game that exceeded nearly all expectations in the past two national elections." Republican leaders, meanwhile, "continued warning yesterday that Election Day could be bleak for them and urged their conservative base to turn out."

The Washington Post (11/6, Grunwald) reports, "The season of persuasion is over. This is the season of motivation. … In the campaign's final weekend, candidates weren't trying to turn out voters who might not vote their way. They were chasing the 'ones and twos,' political-junkie shorthand for the most likely supporters on their computer-generated lists, and firing up their volunteers." The Los Angeles Times (11/6, Wallsten, Haburger) asks, "Which political force will prove stronger -- the niche-marketing effort, led by GOP strategist Karl Rove and powered by computerized outreach methods, or the classic 'throw the bums out' mood of an electorate uneasy with the Iraq war and unhappy with one-party rule? … As the two campaigns make their final appeals, the differences suggest that many of the advantages that have boosted Republicans to victory in the past -- more money, redrawn congressional districts and the superior voter targeting demonstrated by Shaw's courtship of Jews, Latinos and seniors -- may be less potent this time."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Chaddock) reports, "Until the 2002 campaign, Democrats, backed by labor union supporters, typically had the edge in turning out their voters. But the '72-hour' get-out-the-vote (GOTV) program developed by Karl Rove, President Bush's adviser, and Ken Mehlman, Republican National Committee (RNC) chairman -- which includes microtargeted voter lists and a nearly year-round mobilization effort -- gave Republicans a strategic and technological edge that helped them hold onto the House and Senate in the past two elections. This year, the RNC promises 'the biggest midterm GOTV operation in history.'" Since then, "Democrats have scrambled to catch up." ABC World News (10/30, story 8, 2:35, Tapper) showed Mathew Dowd, "President Bush's pollster and co-author of a key book on what's called microtargeting," saying, "More Republicans drive Audis. And more Democrats drive Saabs." ABC added, "Every time you use your credit card or surf the Internet, you leave a data trail of your preferences. Corporate America has been using this information for years to categorize you and sell you products. Now, political groups are using it, combined with census data and polling, to sell you politicians."

In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/6, A14), George Ball, president of W. Atlee Burpee & Co., examines the seed purchasing habits of Democrats and Republicans. Both "red-state Republicans and blue-state Dems grow sunflowers, zinnias and marigolds. However, the differences quickly bloom. Blue states buy many more impatiens, snapdragons and columbines -- expensive and sophisticated sun or shade flowers with varied and subtle colors. On the other hand, red states favor overwhelmingly boisterous morning glories, traditional nasturtiums and inexpensive four o'clocks. The sunny red states like to keep it plain and simple; the dappled blues like to make it diverse and edgy."

Latest Rasmussen Polls Show Corker Beating Ford 53-45, Talent And Allen Leading Narrowly. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/6, Pierce) reports the latest Rasmussen Reports poll on the Tennessee Senate shows Republican Bob Corker with a 53-45 percent lead over Rep. Harold Ford. The Times notes the latest Rasmussen poll on Missouri's Senate race shows incumbent Sen. Jim Talent leading Democrat Claire McCaskill 48-46. Rasmussen also shows Sen. George Allen leading Democrat Jim Webb 49-48."

Democrats Focus On Pennsylvania Races. The Washington Times (11/6, Fagan) reports, "Top Democrats at several rallies in suburban Philadelphia this weekend worked to push their party's voters to the polls in a state where Democrats feel poised to sweep key races and oust the Senate's No. 3 Republican, Rick Santorum." Gov. Edward G. Rendell joined Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Democrat Bob Casey Jr., "who leads Mr. Santorum in polls, to declare the year of the Democrats here." Polls "show that five Republican-held House seats in the state are within reach of Democrats -- so much so that Mrs. Pelosi spent the final campaign weekend here stumping for Democratic challengers."

Mehlman, Dean Make Their Case. In USA Today (11/6), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman writes, "Tuesday, Americans will have the opportunity to choose between a party that wants to use every tool to keep us safe, or one that would take those tools away; between a party that wants to let you keep more of your own hard-earned money, or one that believes that money belongs to Washington; between a party that understands judicial restraint, or one that wants activist judges to fight its battles. Two very different visions for America, and one very strong reason for the American people to help Republicans make history and maintain our majorities in Congress."

Also in USA Today (11/6), DNC Chairman Howard Dean asks, "Isn't it time for a new direction? Democrats have a unified agenda to restore hope and opportunity, competence and responsibility. So on Tuesday, if you want to change what's going on in Washington, vote for Democrats."

More Commentary. Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (11/6), "Bush isn't on the ballot tomorrow. But this election is, nonetheless, all about him. The question is whether voters will pry his fingers loose from at least some of the levers of power, thereby limiting the damage he can inflict in his two remaining years in office." Krugman adds, "Here's the thing: no matter how hard the Bush administration may try to ignore the constitutional division of power, Mr. Bush's ability to make deadly mistakes has rested in part on GOP control of Congress. That's why many Americans, myself included, will breathe a lot easier if one-party rule ends tomorrow."

Fred Barnes, in the Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14), "Republicans face the prospect of losing a substantial number of Senate and House seats in the midterm election tomorrow, but it didn't have to be that way. For sure, the war in Iraq was always going to be a drag on Republicans. And an election in the sixth year of a presidency is often perilous for the president's party, a pattern that's held true in year six of the Bush era." But "Republicans have made matters worse by abandoning the reform agenda that animated their capture of Congress in 1994 and helped George Bush win the White House in 2000 and keep it in 2004."

Hastert's Future As Speaker In Doubt Even If GOP Wins House. The Washington Post (11/6, A7, Weisman) reports Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's "future is in doubt even if the Republicans retain control of the House because of unease among GOP lawmakers about his handling of the Foley page scandal and what a House ethics committee investigation might conclude about him, according to several Republican aides." House Chief Deputy Whip Eric I. Cantor (R-Va.) "said last week that the House Republican leadership elections scheduled for Nov. 15 should be postponed until the ethics committee delivers its final report. House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) confirmed yesterday on 'Fox News Sunday' that he and Hastert have discussed that possibility." But if "Democrats seize control of the House in tomorrow's election, as many political analysts and pollsters are predicting, then Hastert is widely expected to exit the leadership stage and allow a new generation of Republican leaders to try to recapture the majority." Hastert "remains personally popular with House Republicans, but the discontent with his often lackadaisical, hands-off style is palpable." In addition to the Foley investigation, in "early 2004, as House Appropriations Committee investigators prepared to launch a sensitive audit of highly classified Capitol Hill security upgrades, Hastert's chief counsel made a surprise visit to the first meeting of the auditors." His "message was clear, according to participants: The speaker's office was not happy about the probe and would keep investigators on a tight leash. In September 2005, despite growing evidence of sweetheart deals, kickbacks, wasteful contracts and shoddy work, the probe was suddenly shut down."

Senate Polls Show Democrats Poised To Win Seats, Majority In Play. USA Today (11/6, Page) reports Democrats, "poised to score gains in the U.S. Senate, are struggling to pull ahead in the final seat they need to win control, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states find." Democratic challengers "are leading Republican incumbents — in some cases narrowly -- in Missouri, Montana and Rhode Island, according to the USA TODAY surveys. Other polls show Democratic challengers ahead in Ohio and Pennsylvania." Even if Democrats "sweep those five races, however, they would fall one seat short of the six needed for majority status. Two GOP targets, in Tennessee and Virginia, now lead by 3 percentage points among likely voters." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "It says to me the Senate is still very much in play and could go either way." In a "separate nationwide USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken Thursday through Sunday, Democrats were favored over Republicans for Congress by 51%-44% among likely voters. That edge of 7 percentage points had narrowed from a 13-point margin two weeks ago." In the Senate, the USA TODAY state polls "show the Democratic incumbent considered most at risk, Democrat Robert Menendez of New Jersey, is now 10 points ahead of Tom Kean. Among GOP incumbents, however, Conrad Burns trails Jon Tester by 9 points in Montana, Jim Talent trails Claire McCaskill by 4 points in Missouri, and Lincoln Chafee trails Sheldon Whitehouse by 3 points in Rhode Island. Republican Sen. George Allen leads Jim Webb in Virginia and Republican Bob Corker leads Harold Ford in Tennessee by identical 49%-46% margins."

In his Chicago Sun-Times column (11/4), Bob Novak said the Democratic bid to flip the Senate is "clearly in sight." Two GOP seats "seem definitely lost and two more are in serious trouble. If the Democrats win those four, they have to win only two of three more precarious Republican seats while keeping the only two Democratic incumbencies in any kind of danger." Novak says Republicans "have privately put" the Ohio Senate race "on the hopeless list." In Rhode Island, Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse "should glide home in one of the country's most Democratic states." In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester "now holds only a small lead with a huge undecided vote." In Missouri, the race between Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democrat Claire McCaskill "may well be the single contest that determines control of the Senate." In Virginia, Democrat Jim Webb "appears to have a small lead against" Sen. George Allen "in what would be a bonus win never expected by party leaders." In Tennessee, Republican Bob Corker "has jumped out to a lead against" Democrat Harold Ford "after trailing earlier." In New Jersey, Democrat Bob Menendez "leads and may be increasing his lead." In Maryland, Democrat Ben Cardin has "only a six-point lead" over Republican Michael Steele. In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey "looks like a cinch."

Frist Says Democrats Would Raise "Average Family" Taxes By 58%. Asked on CBS' Face the Nation (11/5, Schieffer) if thinks Democrats will raise taxes if they take control of Congress, Senate majority leader Bill Frist said, "That's exactly right. … The two things you will see, if the Democrats were to take control of the House, is an increase on taxes, taxes across the board. Charlie Rangel said it, up front, that there's not a Bush tax cut that he won't try to get rid of. And that means the average family making $62,000 is going to see their federal taxes go up by 58 percent." Frist added, "The other very important consequence would be…that judges themselves, right now, would be more of the activist judges, legislating from the bench, proposed and nominated for the Supreme Court, and not common-sense judges like Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Sam Alito."

Dole Says Democrats "Content" To Lose Iraq War. USA Today (11/6) reports National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman Elizabeth Dole "said Sunday that her party will retain its majority partly because 'Democrats appear to be content with losing' the war in Iraq." Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer "said his party wants to win the war, 'which is why we want to change the strategy.'" Dole "also said voters will be more focused on local issues."

Maryland, Virginia Races Seen As Indicators Of GOP's Future. The Washington Post (11/6, A1, Shear, Wagner) reports on the front page that two "of the Washington region's top Republicans -- Virginia Sen. George Allen and Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. -- spent yesterday fighting off fierce electoral challenges that could stall their political careers and reverse GOP successes in their states." Allen "returned to the folksy approach that has endeared him to Virginians for almost two decades, tossing a football at FedEx Field before the Redskins game as he schmoozed with potential voters at a tailgate party. Later, he ditched a pair of brown Wranglers for a suit at an Ashburn event with former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani." In Maryland, Ehrlich "mingled with volunteers at a Republican call center in Prince George's County yesterday afternoon, appearing relaxed and upbeat about his prospects. Afterward, he, too, campaigned with Giuliani, whom he called 'wildly popular within the [Republican] party and with many independents and Democrats.'" In Virginia, Democrat James Webb "campaigned in the southwest region," while in Maryland, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley "appeared with former president Bill Clinton -- something Webb is scheduled to do today." Public polls "showed both men locked in dead heats. Surveys by Mason-Dixon published yesterday had Allen trailing Webb by one percentage point and Ehrlich tied with O'Malley. Previous polls, including a Washington Post poll last weekend, showed O'Malley ahead." Losses by Ehrlich, Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele, or Allen "particularly incumbents Allen or Ehrlich -- would raise questions about the future of the GOP in their respective states."

Democrats Seen As Making Gains By Running On Against Free Trade. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Hitt) reports that in Iowa's 1st CD, Democrat Bruce Braley is running for "a congressional seat held by a free-trade Republican for nearly two decades" and has "gained an edge by taking the opposite view: bashing globalization." Braley has "made opposition to the Bush administration's free-trade agenda a centerpiece of his campaign. He has run ads blaming the state's job losses on President Bush's 'unfair trade deals.'" Braley's stance has "helped propel the 49-year-old lawyer, who is running against an unabashedly free-trade Republican, into position to reverse recent trends and secure a Democratic win in Iowa's First District. His strong showing not only underscores how trade concerns have emerged as a central issue in many of this year's races but also suggests a more-protectionist U.S. trade policy if Democrats take Congress." Even if Democrats "don't win control, the campaign rhetoric may have a lasting effect, because some Republicans are finding it more painful politically to defend free trade." The "trend is worrying the business community. Top financial-services executives identified 'protectionism' as the biggest threat to continued economic growth, after terrorism, according to a recent Financial Services Forum survey."

Investors Discount Democratic Win With Divided Government Theory. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Conkey) reports the "prospect of big losses for business-friendly Republicans in tomorrow's midterm elections is eliciting more shrugs than fears on Wall Street." A Democratic "triumph that included winning one or both houses of Congress could undermine Republican economic policies such as tax cuts and deregulation that Wall Street tends to favor." Amid the "drumbeat of scandals and discouraging news from Iraq, futures traders in the Iowa Electronic Markets have raised the likelihood that Republicans will lose control of the House of Representatives to nearly 80% from 40% six months ago. The Iowa markets indicate that the Republicans ought to hold the Senate. That, plus a Republican president, may be one reason investors have taken a sanguine approach to the election." The "first and most frequently cited rationale for Wall Street's nonchalance at the specter of a Democratic triumph is the old 'gridlock is good' maxim. In other words, Democratic control of at least one chamber of Congress would mean divided government, making it less likely adverse legislation or excessive spending would pass." This theory "has holes, but it still carries great weight among many economists and investors."

A Democratic Congress Could Target Drug Company Profits. The New York Times (11/6, Berenson) reports that for the "big drug companies, the new Medicare prescription benefit is proving to be a financial windfall larger than even the most optimistic Wall Street analysts had predicted. But those gains may come back to haunt drug makers if Democrats take control of Congress this week." Democrats, who "have long charged that the drug industry is profiteering at taxpayers' expense, say they want to introduce legislation to revoke the law that bars Medicare from negotiating prices directly with drug makers like Pfizer for the medicines it buys." The government is "expected to spend at least $31 billion this year on the drug benefit, which provides partial drug coverage for people over age 65, according to the federal agency that runs Medicare. Next year, the program is expected to cost almost $50 billion — almost 20 percent of overall American drug spending." Democrats say "that directly negotiating with drug makers could save taxpayers tens of billions of dollars annually, though some independent analysts say those projections are probably exaggerated."

Hot Button Initiatives On Ballot In 37 States. The AP (11/5, Crary) reports voters across the country will "consider ballot measures on a multitude of hot-button topics — abortion, gay marriage, affirmative action, illegal immigration, sex crimes, even legalizing marijuana." There are "205 measures on the ballots in 37 states — a total topped only twice before. Huge sums have been spent, including tens of millions of dollars by tobacco companies fighting anti-smoking measures and by oil companies fighting a proposed California oil-production tax." Top initiatives include one in "sparsely populated South Dakota" where voters "face perhaps the most momentous choice — whether to uphold or reject a new state law that would ban abortions except when necessary to save a pregnant woman's life. Activists on both sides of the national abortion debate see it as a historic test of public sentiment." In "many other states, activists on the left and right hope turnout for certain ballot measures may have a spillover effect on crucial races in the battle for control of Congress." Liberals "see a boost for Democrats if low-income voters mobilize on behalf of measures to raise the state minimum wage in Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Montana, Nevada and Ohio." Conservatives "hope last month's court ruling in New Jersey ordering equal rights for same-sex couples will trigger a backlash aiding Republican candidates in the eight states with ban-gay-marriage amendments on their ballots: Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin."

"New Breed Of Activist" To Monitor Poll Stations. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, B1, Kronholz) reports that on Tuesday "a new breed of activist will be on guard, monitoring polling stations for everything from voting-machine glitches to long lines to registration snafus. Energized by disputed results in 2000 and 2004, they have left jobs as music conductors, real-estate agents and software engineers to form groups that expect to turn out thousands of volunteers who don't trust the country's ability to count its votes and have decided to do something about it." "This is going to be the most heavily watched election in history," said Marybeth Kuznik, "who founded a group called VotePA after the 2004 election to monitor voting issues in Pennsylvania." The Journal adds, "Many of the groups share liberal roots, their members smarting from the narrow Democratic losses in the last two presidential elections. But they also share in Ms. Kuznik's assurances -- and the tax and lobbying status that requires them to remain nonpartisan -- that they simply want to see a clean count."

OTHER NEWS

OMB Controller Praises "Scorecard." The Washington Post (11/6, A19, Williamson) reports in its "Noted With Horror" column, "'We would love to see all of America on a scorecard.' Linda Combs, Office of Management and Budget controller, speaking at a lunch discussion last week about the president's management scorecard, which tracks government agencies' progress on a series of management priorities, including strategic management of human capital, competitive sourcing, improved financial performance, expanded electronic government, and budget and performance integration." The "scorecard gives agencies -- write this down -- green for success, yellow for mixed results and red for unsatisfactory. Combs drew pained looks from federal employees in the audience when she said private-sector executives tell her that they want their own scorecard systems, because they 'love the red, yellow, green.'"

Unemployment Rate Falls To 4.4%. The Christian Science Monitor (11/6, Scherer, Arnoldy) reports, "In the last major economic report before Tuesday's showdown at the ballot box, the Labor Department says the unemployment rate is now at" 4.4%, "down from 4.6 percent in September. It is a piece of good news for an embattled president and suggests the economy is stronger than many recent estimates." But the "downside is that the Federal Reserve, which has not raised interest rates in its past three meetings, may have to think about a rate increase early next year - which would keep inflation in check but could cause unemployment to rise." Former Fed governor Lyle Gramley said, "By its first meeting in 2007, the Fed will have to give active consideration to raising interest rates. The odds are that rates are going up, not down."

Fed Official Says Monetary Policy Was Eased For Too Long. The Wall Street Journal (11/6) says in an editorial, "When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said 'never complain, never explain.' So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004." A Fed "worried about possible 'deflation' moved the overnight interest rate it charges banks in June 2003 to an extraordinarily low 1% and kept it there for another year. Mr. Fisher blamed this mistake on 'poor data' that underestimated inflation, leading 'to a policy action that amplified speculative activity in the housing and other markets. Today, as anybody not from the former planet of Pluto knows, the housing market is undergoing a substantial correction and inflicting real costs to millions of homeowners across the country.' In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations."

Growing Number Of Local Governments Seek To Cut Pensions. The New York Times (11/6, Walsh) reports government workers' pensions "are protected by guarantees even stouter than those on pensions in the private sector. The legal promises, often backed up by union contracts, cover more than 15 million people." But "now a number of state and local governments are quietly challenging those guarantees. Financially troubled San Diego is the highest-profile example, but a handful of states, cities and smaller government bodies have also found ways to scale back existing promises and even shrink some current payments." While "still only scattered cases, these examples may be an early warning sign of what could be coming elsewhere. As local officials take stock of unexpectedly large obligations to retired public workers, some are starting to question whether service cuts, sales of government property and politically acceptable tax increases can ever go far enough to bring things into balance."

Houston Real Estate Market Remains Strong. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, Herrick) reports Houston "missed the real-estate boom that sent home prices soaring on the East and West coasts. Now, with much of the nation's housing market in retreat, it has yet to feel even a tremor." In September, "local sales of single-family homes and condominiums were up 17.7% from a year earlier, logging their 32nd straight month of increase, according to the Houston Association of Realtors. The median price of an existing single-family home: $143,400, up 3%." Nationwide sales "of residential real estate fell 14.2% in September, according to the National Association of Realtors. Home prices nationally were down 2.2%, retreating in such former hot spots such as Washington, Boston and San Francisco." Houston's gains "are nothing like those seen in the past decade in the Northeast and California, but that may be the secret to Houston's success and the reason a bubble is unlikely to develop here. Land here is abundant, and the city has some of the least-restrictive land-use and construction rules in the nation. Those factors help supply to keep pace with demand and keep prices within reach of a broad range of potential buyers."

Lindsey Urges Congress To Expand H1-B Program. In a Washington Times op-ed (11/6), Lawrence B. Lindsey, former assistant to the president for economic policy, says, "Members of Congress have the opportunity to expand and improve a relatively small but highly successful part of our immigration policy" that "allows companies to bring in workers from overseas who possess skills that are not available domestically. The main users of the program are technology and health-care companies, although a number of highly skilled people in finance also work here under this program." The H1-B program "provides security within the country. The companies hiring these workers have already gone through a vetting process sufficient to justify their employment." Second, the program "obviously involves economic participation by the immigrant." Finally, "the H1-B visa program is a working model of an approach to immigration that provides an opportunity for civic integration for those who participate."

LATimes Urges Supreme Court To Strike Down Partial Birth Abortion Ban. The Los Angeles Times (11/6) says in an editorial, "On Wednesday, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. If law and not politics guide the justices, they will declare this blanket ban unconstitutional." Whatever "you call it, the procedure is extraordinarily rare and distasteful even to many supporters of abortion rights." But "reversing its 2000 decision on partial-birth laws wouldn't cause the same jolt as repudiating Roe or Casey. But it would still upend a precedent and interfere with the settled expectations of women and doctors alike about the availability of this procedure as a medical last resort."

NYTimes Says NCAA Not Meeting Educational Mission. The New York Times (11/6) editorializes, "The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus." The letter "showed that Congress has noticed the recruiting violations and the athletes who sometimes remain eligible to play without progressing or by attending bogus classes. It also implied that the N.C.A.A. might eventually lose its tax exemptions unless it forces athletic departments to conform more closely to an educational mission." An NCAA report "released last week touches on some of the same issues cited in the blistering letter from Congress. The problem is that athletic departments have more influence on university affairs than they should. They often use that influence to undermine the institutional mission."

Iran Open To Regional Talks With US. The AP (11/6, Karimi) reports Iran said Sunday it was "open to negotiations with the United States on Iraq and other regional issues but hinted it would not drop its refusal to talk about its contentious nuclear program. As the [UNSC] geared up for a protracted debate on sanctioning Iran over its nuclear program, Tehran praised Russia for its 'softer' stance on the issue." Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini "said Iran would consider talks with the US over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested. He would not elaborate, and there was no immediate response from the United States on the offer," the AP notes.

AFP (11/6, Farmani) says that although "it remains to be seen whether the United States is itself willing to renew the offer," Hosseini's comments "come at a time when the US is mired in mounting sectarian bloodshed and deadly attacks on its troops in Iraq, prompting calls for a rapid about-turn in its strategy."

Meanwhile, another AFP story (11/6, Couturier) reports, "Western countries that want to punish Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment are again facing reluctance on the part of Russia and China to grant support, with Moscow demanding a softening of a draft UN resolution. More than two months after the UN-imposed deadline of August 31 expired, it is still not possible to say when the UN Security Council will act." China and Russia "are reluctant to impose strict penalties on Iran, with which they maintain important economic and commercial ties."

China Seen As Shifting Stance On North Korea. The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A6, Fairclough, King, Jr.) reports, "Shortly after North Korea conducted its first nuclear-weapons test last month, regulators here quietly told China's banks to suspend their dealings with the nation." Although Beijing "made no public announcement," the Journal says, "Still, the message to North Korea was clear: China, long averse to imposing any kind of economic sanctions, was willing to go beyond penalties imposed by the United Nations to force North Korea to back down. … China's unusual, if quiet, activism may signal a significant change in its view of the world and its approach to foreign policy since it formally wired itself into the global economy five years ago by joining the World Trade Organization. Beijing's long-held policy of not interfering in the 'internal affairs' of other nations appears to be giving way to a broader definition of its national interests—one that goes beyond satisfying its fast-growing appetite for oil and other raw materials. China also is showing a greater willingness to embrace global institutions and norms." The Journal notes that during a trip to Asia last month, Secretary Rice said, "It is an extraordinary thing for China to be now where it is."

US Envoys Prepare For Resumption Of North Korea Talks. The Washington Times/AP (11/6, Tabuchi) reports US Undersecretaries of State Nicholas Burns and Robert Joseph were in Tokyo today "coordinating with Japanese and South Korean officials before the resumption of long-delayed negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program." South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon "said the three countries worked closely together in the past and would continue to do so at the six-nation talks expected later this year." Ban is scheduled to meet Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe today for further talks. The two Americans "were to meet with Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and other Japanese officials before traveling to South Korea later today."

WSJournal Deputy Editor Urges Assistance For North Korean Orphans. Wall Street Journal (11/6, A15) deputy editor Melanie Kirkpatrick writes, "Fortune has already shone on" two orphan children among a "small group of North Korean refugees who have taken sanctuary in the US Consulate in Shenyang, China." Kirkpatrick says there are among "thousands" of abandoned children in need of international assistance. She notes that the UN High Commission on Refugees "stands ready to help the Korean refugees in China—if only Beijing would let it. Several countries in the region are prepared to set up transit camps for refugees provided the US helps pay for it and South Korea ultimately accepts them for re-settlement, as its Constitution requires. But even if, in the happiest of worlds, all this were to occur, the stateless orphans could still be left out. According to groups that run the underground railroad, even South Korea, which accepts most of the Northerners who manage to escape, refuses to admit the children on the grounds that they are not true 'defectors.'"

Israel Vows To Continue Gaza Operations. The New York Times (11/6, Myre) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert Sunday said "that the military would not halt its offensive in the northern Gaza Strip until Palestinian rocket fire toward Israel was significantly reduced." As fighting entered its fifth straight day on Sunday, more the than 40 Palestinians were reportedly killed in the offensive and Palestinians "called for international pressure on Israel to halt the offensive." Meanwhile, "In another development, a Palestinian lawmaker, Mustafa Barghouti, said that he was brokering the latest attempt at a Palestinian national unity government and that an agreement could be reached in days." The AP (11/6, Lavie) runs a similar report.

Syria Hints At Armed Resistance Over Return Of Golan. The AP (11/6, Aji) reports Syria "could resort to armed resistance if peace negotiations do not lead to Israel's return of the Golan Heights, the country's Information Minister said Sunday. Mohsen Bilal said international negotiations should lead to Israel giving back the Golan Heights… If that does not happen, he warned Syria could resort to 'other means, which struggling people have used at various points in history, beginning with legitimate resistance.' But Bilal said Syrians were eager to resume talks."

EDITORIAL WRAP-UP

New York Times. "The Saddam Hussein Verdict." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) editorializes, "Hussein got a fairer trial than he ever would have allowed in his courts. But

DOJ_NMG_0091350

Iraq got neither the full justice nor the full fairness it deserved. President Bush overreached in calling the trial 'a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law.'" The Times adds, "The appeals court that will now review the verdict can undo some of the damage by taking into account some of these deficiencies. At least, it should defer the carrying out of any death penalty long enough to allow the completion of a second trial, in which Mr. Hussein is charged with ordering genocidal massacres against the Kurds."

"Protecting The Right To Vote." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) says in an editorial, "No one expects Florida elections to go smoothly, but this year the state got off to an alarming start. Voters reported that after selecting Democratic candidates on electronic voting machines, the review screens registered that they had chosen Republicans. A spokeswoman for the Broward County supervisor of elections told The Miami Herald that the machines often fall out of sync under heavy use, but that they can be fixed when voters complain. That snapshot of Florida's early voting is confirmation — as if any were needed — that a great deal can go wrong tomorrow, much of it eminently preventable. Six years after the 2000 election meltdown, voting machines are still unreliable, and there are an array of other obstacles to voters who want their votes to count."

"College Sports Get A Warning." The New York Times (11/6, 1.21M) editorializes, "The National Collegiate Athletic Association's enthusiasm for fighting corruption in college sports is partly driven by the fear of federal intervention. That fear came a step closer to being realized last month, when the House Ways and Means Committee fired off a tough-minded letter demanding that the N.C.A.A. explain how profit-seeking, win-at-all-cost athletic departments operate on campus." "Mind Over Gap."

Washington Post. "Verdict for Saddam Hussein." In an editorial, the Washington Post (11/6, 748K) says "the trial was tumultuous, deeply flawed and often painful to watch; and some of the brave Iraqis who committed themselves to making it work lost their lives. The result was imperfect, to be sure, but also well-founded."

"Epidemic In Prince George's."

Wall Street Journal. "The Fed's Confession." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, 2.03M) says in an editorial, "When it comes to admitting error, central bankers tend to emulate Benjamin Disraeli, who famously said 'never complain, never explain.' So it was nothing short of astonishing last week for Richard Fisher, President of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, to confess in public that the Fed had blundered by keeping monetary policy too easy for too long in 2003 and 2004." In other words, the Fed itself is responsible for the current housing bust because its over-easy policy created a real estate frenzy that was bound to end once the Fed tried to regain control over inflation expectations."

"Justice For Saddam." The Wall Street Journal (11/6, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "Justice for Saddam is one admirable legacy of the American sacrifice in Iraq." But "to make it permanent, the US must also defeat the insurgency that battles on in Saddam's name. No matter what happens in Tuesday's election, the US commander in chief who ended Saddam's tyranny has to find a strategy and generals who will finish the job."

Los Angeles Times. "Don't Abort Precedence." The Los Angeles Times (11/6, 918K) says in an editorial, "On Wednesday, while pundits will be busy analyzing election results, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in an emotionally charged case likely to reverberate in future political campaigns. At issue is a federal law that prohibits a controversial abortion method without making an exception for when the procedure is necessary to protect a woman's health. DOJ_NMG_0091351

"Is Pakistan An Ally?" The Los Angeles Times (11/6, 918K) says in an editorial, "Preventing Afghanistan from falling to a resurgent Taliban must be a top priority for the Bush administration and the new Congress in the next two years. To succeed, more will have to be asked of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. Despite Pakistan's claim to have stopped supporting the Taliban after its 2001 ouster, the evidence is now overwhelming that the Pakistani security service — the Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI — and probably the senior military leadership are tolerating, if not backing, Taliban forces. Washington has been turning a blind eye to this problem, reluctantly concluding that there is no alternative but to support the flawed but friendly Musharraf as the only practical bulwark against a radical Islamist takeover of a crucial nuclear state." Islamabad is "clearly hedging against what it sees as a hostile, pro-India government in Kabul and an inevitable Western abandonment of Afghanistan by keeping its old Taliban ally as a viable option. The respected Jane's Intelligence Digest last week cited independent reports confirming what Afghan President Hamid Karzai has been fuming about for months: ISI-sponsored Taliban training camps and jihadist madrasas have multiplied along the Afghan-Pakistani border. Moreover, we now know that the agreement the Pakistani government signed with tribal leaders in North Waziristan on Sept. 5 sold out Afghan and U.S. interests."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DC Circuit To Consider Detainee Challenges. The New York Times (11/7, Lewis) reports, "The Bush administration's successful effort to have Congress eliminate the right of Guantánamo prisoners to challenge their detentions before federal judges is now moving toward what may be an epic battle in the courts. … And while lawsuits on the topic are spread across the judiciary, the principal battleground, legal experts say, is the federal appeals court in Washington. That court has been considering for three years whether the hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have the right of habeas corpus — that is, the ability to ask a federal judge to review the reasons for their detention. … But the law passed by Congress last month eliminating the habeas right supersedes almost all of the arguments that have gone before and is now the focus of the legal confrontation, government and civil liberties lawyers agree. In a ruling last June, the Supreme Court had said that an earlier measure did not eliminate habeas lawsuits that were already in the courts. However, in October, the administration used more explicit language, saying the new law retroactively blocked federal courts from entertaining habeas lawsuits by Guantánamo detainees." The Times adds, "The three-judge appeals court panel will have to decide whether the pending lawsuits brought by the 430 or so remaining detainees at Guantánamo should be thrown out, as the Bush administration has argued, or whether the new law is unconstitutional, as civil liberties groups have contended. … Whatever resolution is reached by the three appellate judges — David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, both appointees of Republican presidents, and Judith W. Rogers, appointed by a Democrat — it will almost certainly end up before the Supreme Court. A decision could come from the appeals court before the end of the year."

Liquid Restrictions Go Into Effect At EU Airports. The AP (11/6) reported rules went into effect across the European Union Monday limiting "passengers to carrying 100 milliliters (a fifth of a pint) of liquid per container on board planes. … All liquids — not only water and soft drinks but also soups, creams, lotions, oils, perfumes, sprays, gels, toothpaste and shaving cream — are subject to security checks before passengers board their planes. The containers must fit into a clear re-sealable plastic bag to be presented at security checkpoints, officials said." EU spokesman Ferran Tarradellas Espuny said over the weekend that EU airports must apply the regulation "to protect civil aviation against the threat of homemade liquid explosives."

Shaaban Held At Colorado's Supermax Prison. The AP (11/7) reports, "An Indiana truck driver convicted of plotting to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein is incarcerated at a federal super-maximum-security prison in Colorado under an order approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a report Monday said." The AP continues, "Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, of Greenfield, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on his conversations, restrict his access to news reports and prohibit anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him, The Indianapolis Star reported." The AP adds, "Shaaban is being held under an order known as a special administrative measure, which is meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security. … William Dazey Jr., a public defender who assisted Shaaban at his trial in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis earlier trial this year, said the order was unusual. … 'I have not seen evidence that would support the notion (Shaaban) is a threat to the United States,' Dazey said." The AP notes, "Among the other convicts held under similar conditions at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex about 90 miles south of Denver are Zacarias Moussaoui, the alleged '20th hijacker' in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and Richard Reid, who tried in December 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe on a Paris-to-Miami flight."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, DHS Working To Thwart Terror Recruiting In US Prisons. In a front-page story, USA Today (11/7, Hall, 2.27M) reports the FBI and DHS are "working with prisons in dozens of states to improve intelligence gathering and monitoring of inmates in a stepped-up campaign to curb homegrown terrorism behind bars. … Chief among the concerns is that radical Muslim clerics could have access to prisoners and coerce them with terrorist literature. 'It's a concern because we know that violent extremist groups will target people in prisons,' said Donald Van Duyn, the FBI's counterterrorism director." USA notes, "The intensified surveillance follows the recent arrests of people alleged to be home-grown terrorism suspects in London and Canada," and "Homeland Security officials…are worried that similar plots could be hatched in U.S. prisons. 'Prisons can be a breeding ground,' says Charles Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer."

British-Based Al Qaeda Agent Planned Attacks On US Targets. USA Today/AP (11/7, 10A, Stringer) reports, "An al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain planned to bomb the New York Stock Exchange and plotted a series of attacks on London, one to blow up a London subway train as it passed below the River Thames, prosecutors said at a sentencing hearing Monday. Dhiren Barot, 34, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic." Barot "and seven alleged accomplices spent more than four years making detailed plans to attack a host of financial industry targets in the USA." Prosecutor Edmund Lawson "said the group considered using a radioactive 'dirty bomb' and igniting a gasoline tanker to ram it into a high-profile British target. Lawson showed clips of a reconnaissance video shot in 2001 during a visit to New York by Barot. The shaky footage — shown on screens in the courthouse — zoomed in on the World Trade Center as an unseen man mimicked the sound of an explosion. Prosecutors said Barot did not have prior knowledge of the Sept. 11 terror attacks." The New York Times (11/7, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "The potential targets included…the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund in Washington…Citigroup in Manhattan and the Prudential building in Newark, prosecutors have said." The Washington Times/AP (11/7, Stringer) reports Barot "was born a Hindu in India, but was brought to Britain as a toddler. He converted to Islam when he was about 20, Mr. Lawson said."

FBI, ICE Agents Field Questions From NYC Muslim Youth. NY1 New York City (11/6) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Muslim students put FBI and immigration officials on the hot seat Sunday at a taping in Queens of a well known Pakistani talk show," hosed by Hamid Mir. "NY1 Criminal Justice reporter Solana Pyne was there as a panel answered questions about everything from FBI training to the success of the war on terror. … 'Are FBI agents or other government officials trained, or getting trained to learn more about Islam?' asked one student in attendance. … 'FBI Agents can't all look like me,' said FBI special agent, Andrew Arena. 'They can't all be white guys. We have got to diversify and that's very, very important. We train our agents from day one in the academy to understand the Muslim faith.'" NY1 noted, "In the last few years, FBI and immigration officials have held several meetings with members of the city's Muslim communities," but "the event Sunday evening was unusual, not only because it included Muslim leaders from across the country, but also because it was the first with Muslim teens and young adults. … Hundreds of students attended the event, and as to how successful it was, well, it depends on who was asked."

Holiday Travelers Urged To Review TSA Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Marks, 58K) reports, "Planes are expected to be fuller, prices higher, and security lines longer than ever" this holiday season. In addition to the fact that "major airlines have cut back on the number of planes flying" in order to increase profits, "there are those vaunted Transportation Security Administration security checks - the other major reason experts are urging travelers to get to the airport as early as possible." Holiday travelers who usually don't fly "may be confused about what the TSA will and will not allow on board." The Monitor gives a brief description of the agency's rules and adds that they are detailed at www.tsa.gov, "a must-see for anyone who hasn't flown in recent months. 'To make it more understandable to people we've launched a campaign called 3-1-1,' says Ellen Howe, a TSA spokeswoman. 'It's a reminder of three ounces or less, one quart-sized bag, one bag per traveler, and that bag needs to be pulled out of your carry-on and placed into the bin.'"

USA Today (11/7, Adams, 2.27M) reports that if Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson International, the USA's busiest airport, "is any sign, it could be a tough season when the volume of travelers soars later this month for Thanksgiving. Willie Williams, federal security director at Hartsfield-Jackson, says screening there is running as much as 30% slower than before the liquids ban. … Airline officials say lines have increased at almost every sizable airport. But at certain airports, high volumes of less-experienced leisure travelers, combined with the physical layout, give rise to extraordinary problems." Despite the TSA's national education campaign, Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas McCarran, says he thinks "'this holiday season will be problematic.' Airports nationally 'will be getting a lot of people who haven't traveled since all this happened, and they won't have a clue.'"

Understanding Of Security Rules Said To Place Passengers In Specific Categories. USA Today (11/7, Yu, 2.27M) reports from Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson International, where passengers "fall into distinct categories" based on their understanding of carry-on restrictions. "Some understand in detail what the government now requires to clear security checkpoints under rules changes implemented in August and revised in September. Others? Not so much." USA Today goes on to describe three categories: The Initiated, The Uninitiated and The Big Picture People, those who have a "general notion of the rules," but are less clear on specifics. The article frequently notes the TSA's efforts to make passengers aware of carry-on rules, but concludes by quoting David Vernon, a "Big Picture" person, who says the "whole liquid thing is annoying. I didn't even notice the signs. And (even if I did), I probably wouldn't have read it."

WAR NEWS:

Khalilzad To Resign Iraq Post In Coming Months. The AP (11/7, Gearan) reports, "Zalmay Khalilzad, the plainspoken dealmaker and Republican insider who has won praise and criticism for attempts to broker Sunni political participation in Iraq's fragile government, is likely to quit his post as US ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior Bush administration official said Monday." Khalilzad "has been a public face of Bush administration attempts to project both willingness to change strategy or tactics in an unpopular war and solidarity with the increasingly fractious Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki." Khalilzad's departure "has been rumored for months, but he has not turned in his resignation, the State Department official said." The official "spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes. Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year, but is more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said."

The Financial Times (11/7, Negus), at the end of an interview with Khalizad, report US officials "said the envoy would probably return to an academic or private sector job in the US. His replacement may be Ryan Crocker, who is ambassador to Pakistan."

Newspapers For US Military Personnel Urge Rumsfeld To Resign. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Four newspapers produced by the Gannett newspaper chain for US military personnel are running an editorial saying Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld must go. It's time for him to resign, the editorial says, because he has lost credibility with top military officers. The paper's editor denies the timing is at all political but the White House is calling this piece, shabby, inaccurate and grandstanding."

Rumsfeld To Be Introduced By Commentator Who Called For His Resignation. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/7, McCaslin) reports the American Spectator's Robert L. Bartley dinner's master of ceremonies "will no doubt be a bit uncomfortable when introducing the keynote speaker. That master of ceremonies would be myriad-hat wearer Ben Stein, and the keynote address will be delivered by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Inside the Beltway can't help but recall Mr. Stein, in his 'CBS Sunday Morning' commentary barely one week ago pointing out that the situation in Iraq has become so difficult that if he were still a White House speechwriter…this is what he would suggest President Bush announce today: … 'I have this morning accepted Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's resignation with sincere thanks for his service to the nation. Despite his flaws, he is a great American. He will be replaced by a truly heroic American, Senator John McCain of Arizona.'"

Iraqi Appeals Court To Rule On Saddam Death Sentence By Mid-January. The AP (11/7, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on Saddam Hussein's guilty verdict and death sentence by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said Monday, setting in motion a possible execution by mid-February. If the ruling is upheld, The Associated Press has learned that Iraq's three-man presidential council is pledged to allow Saddam's hanging to take place." The execution "must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision." The AP also reports, "The surge in violence expected immediately after Sunday's verdict did not happen. The Interior Ministry credited a round-the-clock curfew in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces."

All three networks ran stories on the aftermath of the verdict. CBS Evening News (11/6, story 7, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The former dictator could be hanged early next year and those who still support him are furious." CBS

(Logan) added, "Once again, Iraqi streets echoed with the sound of his name. A cry of anger from Iraq's Sunnis who see in Saddam's guilty sentence their own loss of power and protection. In court Sunday, the defiant dictator tried his best to drown out the judgment. 'Go to hell, you and the court,' he yelled."

NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 8, 2:35, Engel, 9.87M) said that at the beginning of the trial "Saddam had an animal charisma that was frightening. He dominated the courtroom, taking notes, laughing, bullying witnesses, insulting the judges. … As he was sentenced to death Sunday, I saw his eyes again. Now flat, lifeless, defeated."

ABC World News (11/6, story 6, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) said the verdict against Saddam "split Iraqis but was also a warning to other strongmen in the region." Salama Ahmed Salama, Egyptian columnist: "In the Arab world, never it hasn't had any tradition of holding their leaders to account."

Rice Touts Saddam Verdict As Evidence Rule Of Law Is Strong In Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume) reported Secretary of State Rice "said the guilty verdict delivered to Saddam Hussein and the death sentence is evidence that the rule of law is strong in Iraq and that Saddam will be punished for his crimes." Fox added, "On the day after the sentence was announced more noisy demonstrations in Iraq but no surge of deadly violence that many had feared."

European Leaders, Rights Groups Criticize Sentence. The New York Times (11/7, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "European politicians on Monday spoke out against the death sentence for Saddam Hussein. Arab officials and commentators derided what they said was a flawed and politicized trial, while for the first time broadly acknowledging Mr. Hussein's crimes." Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, "speaking to reporters on Monday, said he opposed the death penalty for Mr. Hussein, joining several other European leaders and European Union officials who announced their opposition to the sentence. When pressed by reporters, Mr. Blair spoke of his longstanding opposition to capital punishment. He said he did not intend to protest the sentence, and condemned Mr. Hussein's brutality." The Times adds, "European leaders insisted that the viciousness of the actions of which Mr. Hussein was found guilty had not changed their view that state-sponsored killing was wrong. Some warned that executing Mr. Hussein would only worsen the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq." Amnesty International said "it 'deplored' Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as 'deeply flawed and unfair.'"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, 918K) editorializes, "Even critics of the US invasion that brought him down acknowledge that his rule was not just brutal but bestial. Holding him accountable for his crimes is a matter of simple (if rough) justice." But "it will be a 'milestone' for the rule of law in Iraq only if Sunnis can be convinced that the new order in their country isn't as unjust as the old one."

Attorney and law professor Alan Dershowitz writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/7, A12, 2.03M), "The Nuremberg trials it is not. But then again, Saddam Hussein is no Hitler or Goering." Dershowitz adds "perfect justice is an illusion," and Saddam, "this exemplar of perfect injustice," has been "subjected to imperfect justice. The result is satisfying, and should serve as an object lesson to the many dictators who continue to terrorize their people and others in the expectation that they will never be brought to justice.

Anne Applebaum writes in the Washington Post (11/7, 748K), "It is true that the execution of Hussein, if and when it occurs, could well have a positive effect on Iraqi politics. If nothing else, it will eliminate once and for all the Baathist dream of a Hussein-led revanche -- a dream that even Hussein himself appears to have cherished; witnesses say he was genuinely surprised by the verdict and was shaking afterward. But his death will also probably put an end to this truth-telling project, one that has been unique and unprecedented in the Arab world. For the first time, an Arab dictator was held accountable for crimes against his people." Applebaum concludes, "Thanks to American incompetence in Iraq, it may be the last time for a long time, too."

Baathists May Be Allowed To Return To Government Jobs. USA Today/AP (11/7) reports, "A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to die, the Iraqi government declared a major concession Monday to the Sunni Arabs who backed him. The action could result in thousands of purged members of Saddam's party being reinstated in their jobs. … The political concession was detailed by the government organization that had been charged with removing Saddam loyalists from state institutions. Under a draft law, the organization would amend its rules to enable former Baath Party members to regain their jobs." The Washington Times (11/7, 88K) runs a similar AP story.

The Washington Post (11/7, A17, Anderson, 748K) reports, "Ali al-Lami, executive director of the Supreme National Commission for de-Baathification, said in an interview that the commission had drafted a law for parliament that would give 1.5 million former Baathists who 'excommunicate' themselves from the party the option of returning to their former government jobs or drawing a pension for their past employment." Other estimates "have put the number of purged Baathists in the tens of thousands; the figures could not be reconciled."

57 Iraqis Charged With Prison Abuse. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/7, Raghavan, 748K) reports, "-- Iraq's Interior Ministry has charged 57 employees, including high-ranking officers, with human rights crimes for their roles in the torture of hundreds of detainees once jailed in a notorious eastern Baghdad prison known as Site 4 ... The charges marked the first time the present Iraqi government has taken criminal action against members of its own security forces for operating torture chambers inside Interior Ministry prisons, said Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman." The charges come after previous stonewalling by Shiite officials who "have said such accusations are exaggerations, branding them attempts by Sunnis to discredit the Shiite-led government." The Post continues, "It remains to be seen whether [Interior Minister] Bolani, a Shiite and an engineer by training, can take on senior figures in his ministry who are suspected of links to Shiite militias. Many are left from the days of his predecessor, Bayan Jabr, who many Sunnis allege turned the ministry into his own Shiite fiefdom and a haven for the militias."

Third Marine Pleads Guilty In Iraq Murder Case. The New York Times (11/7, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "A marine corporal pleaded guilty on Monday in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi in April, the third person charged in the case to do so." Lance Cpl. Tyler Jackson "received reduced charges of aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice" by plea bargaining. Military law experts "say the number of deals in the Hamdaniya case and the rapid legal proceedings are somewhat unusual," with law professor and former Marine prosecutor Gary Solis saying, "At some point, a prosecutor has to prosecute." One defendant's lawyer, Jane Siegel, theorized that the command was interested in "expediting the process and saving ... a lot of money."

The AP (11/6, Watkins) reports, "Jackson, who has been in military prison since May, spoke only to confirm his identity and attorneys' names and say he understood his rights."

Balad "Massacre" Recalled. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Daragahi, 918K) reports in a 2,515-word front page article, "There were no heroes here. When gunmen murdered dozens of people in this once peaceful Shiite market city over two days last month, no one stepped in to stop the killing. Not U.S. forces, whose stated purposes in Iraq include preventing all-out civil war. Not the Iraqi security forces, who mostly turned a blind eye to the massacre. Not the people of Balad, who allowed decades of fear and hatred to overwhelm their better instincts." The Times reports the unfolding of the violence and how "the U.S. military monitored events from its base just outside Balad, where its role in policing conflicts has become increasingly marginal," stunning the locals. The Times speculates, "But perhaps U.S. soldiers — consciously or unconsciously — do make a grim calculation that benefits them. Sunni insurgents in the countryside attack American troops as well as Shiites. By contrast, Shiite gunmen often welcome Americans to their towns and primarily target young Sunni men suspected of being insurgents."

Pakistani Support For Islamists Seen As Fading. The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Montero, 58K) reports after the bombing of the suspected Pakistani madrassah, "hundreds of miles away, in the cosmopolitan cities of Karachi, Lahore, and Islamabad, relative silence has prevailed. The difference in response is telling, observers say. It underscores not only an important gap in understanding between the tribal areas and the rest of the country - a gulf that helps keep the area underdeveloped and prone to extremism - but an erosion of the Islamist parties' power on the national stage." Many of the religious parties "have slowly cozied up in recent months to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's military regime. Such compromises have ultimately undermined their claims to independent credentials, analysts point out. That's perhaps one reason why last week's calls for nationwide strikes were dismissed as pure political play."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

5th Circuit Panel Rejects Challenge To Lay Conviction Erasure. The Houston Chronicle (11/7, Hays) reports, "An appeals court panel has slapped down an Enron shareholder's challenge of a judge's decision to erase former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's criminal convictions." The Chronicle continues, "The three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused to order U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston to reverse his October ruling that cleared Lay's name because the ex-chairman died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal." The Chronicle adds, "The appeal panel's ruling, issued last week, reiterated what Lake said in his decision: Legal precedent says that 'when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed.' … That is how all such situations are to be addressed unless the law is changed by Congress, the U.S. Supreme Court or by the full 5th Circuit, the panel ruled." The Chronicle notes, "Russell P. Butler, the shareholder who challenged Lake's ruling, said he would appeal the panel's decision to the Supreme Court. … 'I think we have a good chance,' said Butler, who said he lost $8,000 when the disgraced company collapsed nearly five years ago."

DOJ_NMG_0091361

Former Homestore Official Sentenced For Securities Fraud. Inman News (11/7, Roberts) reports, "Peter Tafeen, a former Homestore executive who pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud for his participation in a fraudulent advertising scheme, today was sentenced to serve 30 months in federal prison. … Tafeen was also sentenced to three years of supervised release following the prison sentence, and six months of the supervised release program must be served in home confinement." Inman continues, "Tafeen, who faced a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, served as executive vice president of business development at Homestore from 1997 to November 2001. Homestore, which has operated Realtor.com and other property-search Web sites, this year re-branded as Move Inc. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said, 'The sentence … was very fair and it reflected both Tafeen's involvement in the crime and his assistance in cooperating with the government during (Stuart) Wolff's trial.'" Inman adds, "Brian J. Hennigan, a lawyer for Tafeen who is a partner at Los Angeles law firm Irell & Manella LLP, said that Tafeen, who is currently out on bond, will report to prison Jan. 8. The judge, he said, has recommended that Tafeen serve his prison sentence in a Pensacola, Fla.-area prison near Tafeen's home. … As part of a plea agreement announced in March, Tafeen had agreed to testify against his former boss, Stuart Wolff, who was chief executive of Homestore during the accounting scandal. Tafeen had faced similar charges to Wolff before entering into the plea agreement, which came a few weeks before his trial was scheduled to begin."

US Had Tough Challenge In McKesson Prosecution. The California Recorder (11/7, Scheck) reports, "The securities fraud trial against the former CEO and general counsel of HBOC -- now McKesson Corp. -- was never an easy one for the government. … The government's central witnesses were snitches of questionable credibility -- so much so that prosecutors declined to bring one key witness to the stand. … And in an earlier bench trial of another executive, a judge found their testimony was not credible enough to convict. … So it wasn't terribly surprising Friday when a jury acquitted former CEO Charles McCall and ex-GC Jay Lapine of conspiring to commit securities fraud while deadlocking on six other counts." The Recorder adds, "That's not to say it didn't hit the lawyers involved like a sack of bricks: There were tears on both sides, most notably from Theodore Wells Jr., the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who represented McCall in the six-week trial. … 'I've been living in a hotel in San Francisco since August the 14th working, truly, 20-hour days,' Wells told a group of reporters outside the courtroom. 'The fact that I was emotional, given the circumstances, is entirely understandable.'" The Recorder notes, "Mark Topel of Topel & Goodman, who argued Lapine's case, was similarly relieved after the acquittal and U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins' subsequent declaration of a mistrial on the other counts. … Topel said he saw the case as one in which the people who admitted to the conspiracy -- a brace of lower-ranking executives who entered guilty pleas -- couldn't be trusted when it came to fingering higher-ups. … He pointed to prosecutors' decision to not take testimony from Jay Gilbertson, the company's CFO who in 2003 pleaded guilty to being involved in the fraud scheme which misstated billions of dollars in earnings. Gilbertson blamed it on Lapine and McCall, and was seen as potentially being the key witness before the trial started."

Federal Reserve Warns Traders About Illicit Bond Activity. The Washington Post (11/7, D01, Henderson) reports, "The Federal Reserve put traders on notice yesterday that it is scrutinizing activity in the bond market, highlighting recent concerns that some traders may have made illicit profits by manipulating securities prices." The Post continues, "Dino Kos, executive vice president of the markets group at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, led an hour-long discussion of such concerns yesterday with representatives of the bank's 22 primary dealers -- the banks and securities firms that trade Treasury securities with the central bank." The Post adds, "The Fed meets with its dealers periodically to discuss market issues, but this was the first session devoted to suspicions at the Treasury Department about possible manipulation of the market for government bills, notes and bonds, and for futures contracts and other financial contracts linked to the securities. … The government's concerns were detailed in a Sept. 27 speech by James Clouse, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for federal finance. He described ways in which traders could control the supply of highly sought Treasury securities, driving up their prices. Such practices enable traders to borrow money at low interest rates and then invest it at higher rates to earn a profit."

Virginia Set To Execute Man For Slaying Of Bank Guard. The AP (11/7, Gelineau) reports, "Attorneys for a man scheduled to be executed Thursday for the 1999 slaying of a bank security guard have appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court and say his life should be spared because a prosecutor withheld information about a key witness." The AP continues, "John Yancey Schmitt, 33, is set to die by injection at Greensville Correctional Center in Virginia for the fatal shooting of 39-year-old Earl Shelton Dunning during a bank robbery. … In their petition to the Supreme Court and in a clemency petition to Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, Schmitt's attorneys criticize prosecutor Warren Von Schuch's actions, which they say could have influenced the jury's decision to recommend a death sentence. In the clemency petition, they also argue the shooting of Dunning was accidental." The AP notes, "Von Schuch said there was no prosecutorial misconduct, and described the killing as cold-blooded and clearly premeditated. … 'The court found that we did nothing wrong,' Von Schuch said. 'This is simply defense attorneys misrepresenting the truth to the public.'"

Jeffs Supporters Continue Expansion Of South Dakota Compound. The AP (11/7) reports, "A compound reportedly occupied by members of polygamist leader Warren Jeffs' sect continues to expand southwest of Pringle, South Dakota, even though Jeffs is behind bars in southern Utah. … Private investigators have said they believed the Pringle compound was among places Jeffs had hidden while he was on the run, but state and federal authorities said they could not confirm that." Custer County Equalization Director Les Struble "said one or two lodges a year have been built on the gated compound. The lodges are each about 3,000 square feet, with large kitchens and living rooms, plus separate bedrooms and bathrooms."

FBI Says Texas Man Faces Federal Charges In Kidnap-For-Ransom. The El Paso Times (11/7, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "Noe Guadalupe Ochoa, 20, of Sunland Park is facing five separate charges stemming from the May 4 kidnapping at gunpoint of a 16-year-old El Paso boy, whose identity was withheld because he is minor, Federal Bureau of Investigations spokeswoman Agent Andrea Simmons said." The Times notes, "An FBI investigation revealed that the teenager was taken from outside his home and held for ransom in Juárez. The day after he disappeared he was rescued by FBI agents and the Chihuahua state police anti-kidnapping unit. The teenager was found unharmed and in a car in Juárez near the Paso del Norte Bridge, where a ransom was supposed to be delivered." KFOX-TV El Paso (11/6) reported on its Web site, "Ochoa now faces charges including kidnapping a minor, using a firearm in a crime of violence, and possession and conspiracy to distribute marijuana."

Montana Murder Among Unsolved Cases FBI Investigating For Duncan Link. The AP (11/7) reports, "The FBI is investigating whether convicted murderer and sex offender Joseph Edward Duncan III might be involved in the slaying of a Montana teenager found dead in North Dakota four years ago. 'We're a long way from saying he's a suspect, but it's certainly a case we're reviewing,' said Donald Robinson, an FBI supervisor in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho." Russell Turcotte "was 19 when he disappeared in July 2002," and Duncan "was living in Fargo when Turcotte disappeared." The AP notes, "Robinson said the FBI is putting together a timeline on Duncan's whereabouts dating back to the early 1990s. 'Every single day Mr. Duncan was out of custody, we're looking at where he was -- and we're looking at all sorts of unsolved crimes,' Robinson said."

Dallas Woman Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud. The AP (11/7) reports, "A Dallas woman who pleaded guilty to defrauding the Federal Emergency Management Agency of $80,000 through false claims for Hurricane Katrina benefits was sentenced Monday to nearly six years in prison. U.S. District Judge David C. Godbey sentenced Lakietha Diann Hall, 35, to 70 months in prison. She was ordered to pay $83,254 in restitution." The AP notes, "Hall was accused of leading a scam in which she submitted online claims for disaster and unemployment assistance on behalf of several of the other defendants, falsely stating that their primary homes were in areas devastated by Katrina and that the hurricane caused them to lose their jobs. All of Hall's co-defendants have pleaded guilty."

Connecticut Businessman Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges. The Hartford Courant (11/1, 195K) reported in "Local Briefing" that "the owner of an East Windsor mail consolidation business pleaded guilty Tuesday to mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said." Thomas J. Rueli, "who owned Total Logistics Services Inc., was charged with establishing a line of credit with a commercial lender of up to $12 million based on fraudulently inflated account data. He was also accused of paying bribes to another business owner and conspiring not to report the transactions to the IRS, O'Connor said in a statement."

Utah Man Snared In Nationwide Sting Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charge. The Deseret Morning News (11/7) reports, "A La Verkin man is facing a mandatory five-year prison sentence after admitting to downloading dozens of images of child pornography off the Internet." Terence D. William "appeared in U.S. District Court on Monday to enter a guilty plea to one count of receiving child pornography. William was arrested and charged last August as part of a nationwide sting on a Web site based out of Orlando, Fla., that sold images of child pornography. The federal investigation netted more than 125 people who allegedly subscribed to the Web site, including three Utah men." The Morning News notes that "William admitted to downloading between 10 and 150 images of children engaged in sexual acts."

Texas Prosecutor Under Probe For Soliciting Sex From Teen Kills Himself. The New York Times (11/7, Eaton) reports from Terrell, TX, "A prosecutor in this North Texas town killed himself Sunday as the police tried to arrest him on charges of soliciting sex over the Internet from a person he thought was a 13-year-old boy." The Times continues, "The prosecutor, Louis Conradt Jr., 56, had been caught in a sting operation set up by Dateline NBC, the television news magazine, and an Internet watchdog group called Perverted Justice. An NBC camera crew was outside the house to film the scene when the fatal shot was fired. … Mr. Conradt had refused to open the door when police officers arrived at his house, where he lived alone, said Sgt. Snow Robertson of the Police Department in Murphy, a nearby town where officers said Mr. Conradt intended to meet the boy he thought he had communicated with. … Officers eventually forced their way into the house, only to find that Mr. Conradt had shot himself in the head with a small-caliber semi-automatic handgun, Sergeant Robertson said. Mr. Conradt died later at Parkland Hospital in Dallas." The Times adds, "Police officers from Murphy had gone to the house with a tactical team and two officers from Terrell to serve a warrant for Mr. Conradt's arrest. One of the officers from Terrell knew Mr. Conradt from his work as a prosecutor, Sergeant Robertson said. … Mr. Conradt had been a district attorney in Kaufman County and was the chief felony assistant district attorney in Rockwall County at the time of his death. … The police planned to search his computer and his house, Sergeant Robertson said. … The sergeant's department had been working with Perverted Justice and NBC News in a sting operation singling out people who solicit sex from children."

Series Of Deaths In Wisconsin City Puzzles Authorities. The Washington Post (11/7, A03, Gutsche) reports from La Crosse, WI, "At night the Mississippi River here is black like pavement. Lights brighten the shoreline, where walkways end with a steep drop at the river's edge. There is no railing. Even to a familiar eye, the river looks like an empty parking lot. … This is where eight young men have apparently drowned in the past nine years, just blocks from the busy downtown bar district where many victims had been reported seen last. The latest victim was found in October." The Post continues, "Officials from the city and the three colleges and universities here -- as well as a group of vocal college students -- say the men became intoxicated and accidentally fell into the river. … Yet as the number of fatalities grows, so does the idea that a serial killer could be loose." The AP adds, "All of the victims were young, athletic, and either visiting La Crosse or attending college in the city. Toxicology results have indicated that almost all had high levels of alcohol in their systems when they died. … Still, the similarities among the apparent drowning victims have many concerned that the students are being stalked -- lured into the black waters by a female posing as a police officer or a man wielding a gun, locals say. … While the idea of a serial killer is gaining credence in some quarters of La Crosse, other residents say the explanation is merely a way to deflect attention from the criticism that city and college officials are not working hard enough to crack down on underage drinking or to secure the waterline from accidental drownings."

Cities Cracking Down On Jury Duty No-Shows. USA Today (11/7, Parker) reports, "The murder trial in the shootings that left five people dead at Pato's Place Bar was the biggest in the history of Tulare, Calif. However, when the judge in the case tried to pick a jury, only 160 of 500 people summoned to jury duty showed." USA continues, "The shortage of jury candidates delayed last year's trial of Donald and Timothy Young, brothers charged with capital murder. It also prompted court officials in Tulare, a city of 52,000 between Fresno and Bakersfield, to revamp the jury system in July." USA adds, "Tulare is among dozens of communities across the USA that are punishing no-show jury candidates. … 'We were down to a 50% response rate. That is simply not acceptable,' says Tulare County Superior Court Judge Lloyd Hicks. … Tulare jury candidates who fail to show are warned that they could be found in contempt of court. If they do not respond, a second letter is sent, warning that a warrant will be issued for their arrest, Hicks says. … No one keeps national figures on jury duty no-shows, but the American Judicature Society considers the problem an epidemic in some communities, especially large urban areas such as Miami, Houston and Atlanta, where no-show rates routinely top 50%, says David McCord, a society spokesman."

Abortion Clinics Seek Probe Of Bill O'Reilly's Access To Kansas Records. The AP (11/7, Hanna) reports, "Two abortion clinics asked the state's highest court Monday to investigate Attorney General Phill Kline and Fox television's Bill O'Reilly over O'Reilly's statements that he had information from Kansas abortion records." The clinics' attorneys "want the Kansas Supreme Court to seize records that Kline, an outspoken abortion opponent, obtained on 90 of the clinics' patients. Kline received edited versions of the records from a district judge on Oct. 24 after arguing he wanted to review the records for evidence of possible crimes including rape and illegal abortions." The attorneys "asked the court to appoint a special prosecutor to determine whether O'Reilly's information came from the records turned over to Kline."

House Democrat's Challenge To Budget Bill Dismissed. The AP (11/7) reports, "A federal judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit filed by U.S. House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion budget bill because the House and Senate did not approve identical versions." The AP continues, "House Democrats accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush in February. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, sued in April along with 10 other House members to prevent the law from being implemented." The AP adds, "The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1. … When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months. The lawsuit said the oversight amounted to an additional $2 billion in spending, and the plaintiffs claimed that because they never had the chance to vote on the version signed into law, the law was invalid." The AP notes, "The Department of Justice had sought the lawsuit's dismissal, claiming the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment and were not in 'any way personally affected or injured.'"

Supreme Court To Consider Partial Birth Abortion Case On Wednesday. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Savage, 918K) reports whether the partial birth procedure, "known medically as dilation and extraction or D&X, will be legal comes before the Supreme Court on Wednesday, the day after the midterm elections." With "two new Bush appointees on the court — one replacing a justice who supported abortion rights," abortion opponents "are optimistic that, for the first time, the court will uphold an outright ban on an abortion method. The campaign against the procedure has succeeded where other attacks on abortion failed." By "branding it gruesome and unnecessary," opponents "won broad support for a criminal ban, even from lawmakers who usually vote in support of abortion rights." A win for "abortion foes would chip away at the court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which held that women have a constitutional right to an abortion. Those fighting a ban argue that the disputed procedure is sometimes the safest method for aborting a fetus in midterm and, despite the attention it receives, is not commonly used."

CNN.com (11/7, Mears) reports, "The morning after the closely fought midterm elections, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear its first major abortion case in six years. … The hot-button issue has been debated for years among social and religious activists, voters and judges themselves." CNN continues, "At issue in Wednesday's arguments is the constitutionality of a federal law banning a specific late-term procedure its critics call 'partial-birth' abortion. … After Justice Samuel Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor this year, court watchers have been waiting for a pair of cases to signal whether the court is shifting to the right." CNN adds, "For a quarter of a century, O'Connor, the first woman on the high court, was a key swing vote upholding the basic right to abortion. The views of Alito, a more conservative jurist, could prove crucial in the new debate. So, too, could the views of moderate-conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, who takes O'Connor's place as the key swing vote. … Even with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts joining the bench in recent months, many legal scholars say the outcome is far from clear. … Three federal appeals courts have ruled against the government, saying the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 is unconstitutional because it does not provide a 'health exception' for pregnant women facing a medical emergency. … The federal law has never gone into effect, pending the outcome of nearly three years of legal appeals."

The National Law Journal (11/7, Coyle) reports, "In weighing the constitutionality of a federal law, the U.S. Supreme Court sometimes gives deference to congressional findings of fact. How will it view the critical finding at the heart of its latest abortion challenge?" The Journal continues, "The justices this week will hear arguments in two cases testing the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. Partial-birth abortion is a term used for an abortion procedure, intact dilation and extraction, infrequently used in second-trimester pregnancies. … Although the high court's abortion precedents and the future of a woman's right to choose abortion will dominate discussions, the cases also are very much about separation of powers and the roles of the legislative and judicial branches in making and interpreting laws, say scholars on both sides." The Journal notes, "In enacting the 2003 law, Congress made explicit findings in the statute that partial-birth abortion 'is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother.' A health exception to abortion restrictions has been central to the court's abortion jurisprudence since the landmark Roe v. Wade. The lack of such an exception was a key basis for a 5-4 majority's decision to strike down a Nebraska partial-birth abortion law, very similar to the federal law, just six years ago. Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914. … In the 2003 law, Congress criticizes Stenberg and the findings of the trial judge that gave rise to the Stenberg high court case. The federal lawmakers call for a 'high degree' of deference to their own findings, a call echoed by the Bush administration and its supporters in briefs defending the federal law. … But opponents contend that that type of deference is not due because Congress did not engage in neutral fact-finding. A fundamental right, requiring heightened court scrutiny and independent review of congressional findings, is at issue, and two district judges, in extensive trials in the two cases, made findings contrary to those of Congress."

DOJ To Monitor Polls In 22 States. The AP (11/7, Jordan) reports, "Federal poll watchers will be in 22 states Tuesday, safeguarding against fraud or discrimination in election districts marked by tight races, large numbers of minority voters and faulty ballot machines." The AP continues, "Justice Department monitors and observers are being assigned to Cuyahoga County, Ohio, which has been dogged by problems with computerized touch-screen voting machines. They will be in Bergen County, N.J., a must-win prize for both candidates in the state's Senate race. … And they will watching more than a dozen counties nationwide where polls are on American Indian reservations and in big cities dominated by black voters." The AP adds, "In all, the Justice Department is sending an estimated 850 poll watchers to 69 cities and counties — what officials on Monday called an unprecedented number, and twice as many during the 2002 congressional midterm elections. … The government has dispatched poll watchers to ensure fair elections since the 1965 Voting Rights Act was enacted. … Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, who heads the Justice Department's civil rights programs, told reporters last week that the election districts were selected in part because of close races there. … They include Fort Bend and Galveston counties in Texas, where Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is seeking to keep a GOP hold on the seat vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Texas Democrats have accused Sekula-Gibbs of twice entering early voting locations — which is prohibited by law — to introduce herself to voters and workers."

CNN.com (11/7, Frieden) reports, "After weeks of considering requests for a federal presence, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Civil Rights Division lawyers decided to send 850 poll watchers to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states." CNN continues, "The federal authorities are being sent to monitor a wide variety of specific issues. In New Orleans, Louisiana, however, the observers will be there primarily to provide support to a wobbly post-Katrina election system that could be overwhelmed by residency issues. … The federal force includes more than 500 trained observers from the Office of Personnel Management. They are going to places with troubled histories as certified by the Attorney General or the federal courts under provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1965. Those locations include polling places where allegations of racial, ethnic and language discrimination have surfaced in the past -- some as far back as the 1970s." CNN adds, "The Justice Department is also sending more than 350 monitors, including attorneys from its Civil Rights Division and U.S. Attorneys offices, to other hot spots where complaints have been registered or tensions have run high. … The Justice Department has declined official comment on why any of the locations were selected. … Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim said the anticipated closeness of races would be one factor in making the final decisions on where to send observers. But in the end, few of the jurisdictions receiving federal scrutiny will be in states with heated Senate races."

FBI Looks Into Alleged Virginia Voter Intimidation. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (11/7, Schapiro) reports, "The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department. … Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment." The Times-Dispatch notes, "Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County. .. .Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls."

Cross Burning Attempted At Louisiana Town Hall. The AP (11/7) reports, "Someone tried to set a cross on fire in the town hall parking lot of Grand Coteau, where the black mayor is in a runoff Tuesday against a white woman. Authorities said Monday that they had few leads, other than for a pickup truck seen leaving the parking lot without its lights on late Thursday, the night before the cross was planted." Grand Coteau Police Chief Jonty Coco "said the state police and the FBI had been informed. A preliminary investigation indicated the cross had been soaked with used motor oil, he said."

Alleged California Pimp Charged With Sex Trafficking. The AP (11/5) reported, "A California man suspected of being a pimp has been charged with sex trafficking." Jeremiah Crayton "is charged in Phoenix with two counts of Sex Trafficking of a Minor and two counts of Interstate Transportation of a Minor for Prostitution." US Attorney Paul Charlton "says they plan to aggressively prosecute those who trade in the pain and misery of children. The complaint alleges that in August of 2004, Crayton took a juvenile female, who he knew was under 18 from Phoenix to San Francisco, where he forced her to work as a prostitute."

New York City Plans To Make Gender Designation A Personal Choice. The New York Times (11/7, Cave) reports, "Separating anatomy from what it means to be a man or a woman, New York City is moving forward with a plan to let people alter the sex on their birth certificate even if they have not had sex-change surgery." The Times continues, "Under the rule being considered by the city's Board of Health, which is likely to be adopted soon, people born in the city would be able to change the documented sex on their birth certificates by providing affidavits from a doctor and a mental health professional laying out why their patients should be considered members of the opposite sex, and asserting that their proposed change would be permanent." The Times adds, "Applicants would have to have changed their name and shown that they had lived in their adopted gender for at least two years, but there would be no explicit medical requirements. .. . If approved, the new rule would put New York at the forefront of efforts to redefine gender. A handful of states do not require surgery for such birth certificate changes, but in some of those cases patients are still not allowed to make the change without showing a physiological shift to the opposite gender." The Times notes, "In New York, the proposed change comes after four years of discussion among health officials, an eight-member panel of transgender experts and vital records offices nationwide. It is an outgrowth of the transgender community's push to recognize that some people may not have money to get a sex-change operation, while others may not feel the need to undergo the procedure and are simply defining themselves as members of the opposite sex. While it may be a radical notion elsewhere, New York City has often tolerated such blurring of the lines of gender identity. … And the proposal reflects how the transgender movement has become politically potent beyond its small numbers, having roots in the muscular politics of the city's gay rights movement."

WSJournal Praises Michigan Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "Today in Michigan, voters face a choice on Proposal 2, which would add the following language to the state constitution: 'The state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting.' One might think a law banning discrimination would be a triumph for civil rights. Instead, opponents have spent $3 million trying to defeat it, using some of the most low-down arguments of this low-down election year. … Polls in Michigan had the Civil Rights Initiative narrowly ahead in the final days, notwithstanding the 3-to-1 funding advantage of the opponents. If it prevails despite the distortions used by opponents, it will be a tribute to the faith among Michigan voters in equal opportunity."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Queries Merrill Lynch On Buyouts. Bloomberg (11/7, Cole) reports, "Merrill Lynch & Co., the world's third-largest securities firm, received a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an antitrust inquiry of the leveraged-buyout industry, a person familiar with the probe said." Bloomberg continues, "Justice officials have already sent letters seeking information to Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the inquiry isn't public. The Merrill letter was reported earlier today by the Wall Street Journal. … 'The DOJ is probably focusing on three to four deals initially, and if it finds any problems then it may widen the probe to include other firms and deals,' Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said today in a telephone interview. Boland said the probe may last more than a year." Bloomberg adds, "LBO firms have teamed up on $201 billion of acquisitions this year, compared with $31 billion in all of 2001, according to data compiled by London-based Private Equity Intelligence Ltd. In July, the industry's biggest deal was announced, the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc. by KKR, Bain Capital LLC, Merrill Lynch's private-equity unit and HCA co-founder Thomas F. Frist Jr. … Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill acquired Hertz Global Holdings Inc. last year from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion. The Park Ridge, New Jersey-based car-rental company said last month it planned to sell as much as $1.83 billion of shares in an initial public offering."

The AP (11/7) reports, "Regulators are looking into whether private equity firms, which are increasingly the driving force behind some of Wall Street's biggest buyout deals, have engaged in anticompetitive behavior." The AP continues, "The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said in a statement Monday it is weighing whether it provides adequate oversight of the private equity market." The AP adds, "Merrill's private equity business, Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, has been on a tear, with profits of more than $300 million last quarter. The operation was involved in the $21.3 billion leveraged buyout agreement of hospital chain HCA Inc. Kohlberg Kravis and Bain Capital LLC also took part in that deal. … The news comes as investors are cheering the premiums that private equity deals can bring; the private equity deals can also generate enormous fees on Wall Street. Monday brought a flurry of private equity news, with offers being made for Four Seasons Hotels Inc. and OSI Restaurant Partners Inc., which is the parent of such chains as Outback Steakhouse."

DOJ Requests Information On Smithfield-Premium Standard Deal. The AP (11/7) reports, "Smithfield Foods Inc. and Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's two largest hog producers, said Monday they received requests for additional information from federal regulators related to Smithfield's pending acquisition of Premium Standard." The AP continues, "The request by the Department of Justice's antitrust division extends the waiting period imposed by federal law until 30 days after the two companies have substantially complied with the request." The AP adds, 'Under terms of the deal announced in September, Smithfield Foods will buy Premium Standard for about $674 million in cash and stock. Smithfield will also assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt. .. Both companies said they intend to respond expeditiously to the request and to work toward a prompt closing, which they hope to achieve in the first quarter of 2007."

Ahold To Sell US Foodservice. The AP (11/7, Sterling) reports, "Supermarket chain operator Royal Ahold NV announced plans Monday to sell its U.S. Foodservice unit, which distributes bulk food to cafeterias, as part of a major strategic shift back to its roots in retailing." The AP continues, "As part of the plan, Ahold also said it would sell its Tops stores in New York and Pennsylvania, divest its retail operations in Poland and Slovakia, and sell its 49 percent stake in Portugal's Jeronimo Martins Retail. … 'The basic decision we've taken is to commit to retail, to go back to where we come from,' Chief Executive Anders Moberg told reporters. 'We will keep retail operations in markets in the United States and in Europe only where we can secure and maintain a No. 1 or No. 2 position.'" The AP adds, "Analysts said the moves were the logical next step for Ahold, which has gradually returned to firm financial footing by refinancing and selling assets after an accounting scandal centered around U.S. Foodservice pushed it to the edge of bankruptcy in 2003. … Ahold said last week that third-quarter sales at its Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice operation, which distributes food to cafeterias in hospitals, schools and prisons, increased by 5 percent to $4.5 billion. Analysts put its value at around $5 billion."

Morgan Stanley, Visa Settle European Network Access Dispute. The AP (11/7) reports, "Morgan Stanley and Visa International have agreed to settle a long-running dispute over business in Europe, the two companies said in a statement Monday. .. However, the European Commission cautioned that the settlement wouldn't end its investigation into Visa's commercial practices." The AP continues, "Visa had refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network in Europe because Morgan Stanley runs a competing card service in the United States, Discover. Morgan Stanley complained to the European Union in 2000. … The two companies said they 'reached an amicable settlement, without any admission of liability.' Morgan Stanley has become a member of Visa in Europe. In return, it withdrew its complaint to European regulators and ended court proceedings in England. … After Morgan Stanley complained, European antitrust regulators formally charged Visa with blocking competitors from its network in August, 2004. It sent Visa a formal 'statement of objections,' saying Visa's rule barring competitors from using its network squelches competition in a growing segment of the credit-card industry and reduces choice for merchants. This case will continue despite Monday's news."

EU To Rule On Universal's Purchase Of BMG. The AP (11/7) reports, "EU regulators on Monday set a Dec. 8 deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion." The AP continues, "BMG — owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG — has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers. … Vivendi SA's Universal is the world's largest music company." The AP adds, 'Its purchase of BMG Music Publishing must be cleared by both EU and U.S. regulators. It is likely to face careful scrutiny in Europe after an EU court in July overturned the European Commission's go-ahead from a merger between the music units of Sony and Bertelsmann AG. … That deal — reducing the number of major record companies from five to four — must be re-examined and analysts warned it could raise the stakes for similar mergers. The Commission has already said it had to watch the music sector closely to check that antitrust rules are not being broken. .. EMI suspended $4.6 billion takeover talks with U.S. rival Warner Music Group after the court ruling since it cast doubt on whether an EMI-Warner deal would receive regulatory approval."

NTP Files Patent Suit Against Palm Over Wireless Email. The Wall Street Journal (11/7) reports, "NTP Inc., which successfully sued the maker of BlackBerry devices for infringement of wireless email patents, said it is suing Palm Inc., maker of the Treo smartphone." The Journal continues, "The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, alleges that Palm's products and services have improperly used NTP's wireless email technology. The suit asks the court to bar Palm from "continuing to infringe on NTP's patents" and seeks monetary damages for the alleged past infringements." The Journal adds, "In March, BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. agreed to pay NTP $612.5 million to settle a four-year patent dispute. Though it never conceded wrongdoing, RIM acknowledged that customers had delayed placing new orders due to the threat of a court-ordered shutdown of the BlackBerry system in the U.S. .. The Palm complaint also centers on products and services that integrate email systems with wireless communications, including the Treo, Palm VII, Palm i700 and Tungsten products. At issue are seven patents, dating from 1995 to 2001, according to the lawsuit. Five of the patents were part of NTP's lawsuit against RIM."

Former Swift Transportation CEO Makes $2.2 Billion Bid For Company. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, C6, Keeton) reports, "Jerry Moyes, the former top executive and largest shareholder of Swift Transportation Co., has offered to buy the Phoenix trucking company for $2.2 billion. … Swift, a long-haul trucking carrier, said that Mr. Moyes offered $29 a share, a 21% premium to Friday's trading price of $24.05. The company said its board will review the offer." The Journal continues, "Swift shares rose $5.79, or 24%, to $29.84 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, an indication that some investors anticipate a higher offer. In a letter to the company, Mr. Moyes said he would consider increasing the offer if an examination of Swift's books and records showed that the shares are worth more than $29. … In the third quarter, trucking companies reported that they hadn't seen the usual seasonal upturn in business, with retailers preparing for the holiday season. A slowing economy would hurt the trucking business."

McKesson To Buy Per-Se For $1.1 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B2, Urbanowicz) reports, "McKesson Corp. agreed to buy Per-Se Technologies Inc., which sells administrative services to doctors and hospitals, for about $1.1 billion, expanding the drug-distribution giant's customer base and transaction-processing capabilities." The Journal continues, "McKesson also will assume Per-Se's debt outstanding under the deal. As of Sept. 30, Per-Se had long-term debt of $510.6 million." The Journal adds, "The buyer will pay $28 in cash for each Per-Se share outstanding, a 14.5% premium to the Alpharetta, Ga., company's Friday closing share price. Per-Se shares rose $3.09, or 13%, to $27.54 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. McKesson rose $1.17, or 2.4%, to 49.69 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. … McKesson Chief Executive John Hammergren said the acquisition will strengthen customer relationships in existing McKesson businesses while adding a pharmacy transaction business to the San Francisco company's portfolio." The Journal notes, "Hedge fund ValueAct Capital, which controls about 15.5% of Per-Se's voting common stock, and certain of its affiliates agreed to vote in favor of the transaction. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter. … After the deal, the scale of McKesson's transaction-processing services and associated offerings is expected to more than double to about 560 million transactions annually, representing an estimated $300 billion in billed charges."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Industry Officials, Union, Activists Cooperate On Chemical Exposure Rule. The Washington Post's Cindy Skrzycki, in her "The Regulators" column (11/7), reports, "An industry association, a labor union and a public health group recently settled a court case over a new standard for worker exposure to a cancer-causing chemical, hexavalent chromium. It was a rare example of agreement in worker-safety regulation. Under the Oct. 25 settlement, the Surface Finishing Industry Council, whose members use the chemical to coat metals, agreed to move faster to improve ventilation and make other engineering changes to reduce workers' exposure levels. In return, the United Steelworkers union and an ally agreed that workers would have to wear a respirator only for certain jobs, unless they requested one." However, "there is no sign that the single agreement will cure the paralysis that for years has crippled the process for setting 'permissible exposure limits' for chemicals in the workplace."

Plan For Public Park Roils Maine Community. The New York Times (11/7, Barringer) reports from Millinocket, ME, "Roxanne Quimby could be forgiven if she thought she was emulating the likes of Henry David Thoreau, Percival P. Baxter, John D. Rockefeller Jr. and other lovers of Maine's landscape when she started to buy bits of the vast northern woodlands near here to be the core of a new national park." The Times continues, "Who knew that when she began using some of the fortune she had earned from her organic personal-care business, Burt's Bees, to buy up woods to preserve, she would be greeted with 'Ban Roxanne' T-shirts? Or, that her efforts at preservation — banning snowmobiling, hunting and all-terrain vehicles on 50,000 of her acres — would be taken as an attack on the old-time values of the timberland?" The Times adds, "Who knew that even some conservation-minded groups would be reluctant to support the decade-old vision of a national park that had inspired Ms. Quimby? … Still, one might have guessed, looking at the streets of this town of 4,700 people, where hunter's blaze orange is the fall fashion statement of choice during this month's deer hunting season." The Times notes, "Millinocket residents fear that turning timberland into parkland will further cut timber jobs, strip them of their accustomed hunting grounds and prevent the development of resorts and snowmobile parks they see as one way out of the downward economic spiral. … Other environmental groups, while sympathetic to the idea of a national park, see it as an unwelcome distraction from their fight to block a proposed 420,000-acre resort development that the Plum Creek Timber Company has unveiled for Moosehead Lake, just west of here."

Woman Vies To Be First Female Navajo Leader. The Washington Post/AP (11/7, A03, Fonseca) reports from Window Rock, AZ, "One candidate in Tuesday's Navajo Nation presidential election promises accountability and staunch protection of tribal land. The other vows to build on the reservation's economic progress in the past four years. … But in the race between incumbent Joe Shirley Jr. and challenger Lynda Lovejoy, the overriding issue is sex." The AP continues, "A win would make Lovejoy the first female leader on the largest Indian reservation in the United States, which extends into New Mexico, Arizona and Utah. … 'She is a woman, and that is going to be an issue no matter what her stance on policy,' said Dale Mason, an associate professor of political science at the University of New Mexico at Gallup. 'She represents something entirely new.'" The AP adds, "Lovejoy, a former New Mexico state lawmaker and current member of the Public Regulation Commission, hopes to unseat Shirley, 58, a former tribal council delegate who has been leading the tribe for four years. … 'I can't control people making their decision to vote for me because I'm a woman,' she said. 'I certainly appreciate and welcome that. Any vote is important to winning this ticket on November 7.' … Shirley, who has focused on economic development in his campaign for reelection, acknowledges some people will vote based on sex, but he says he is hopeful that most won't. … Some traditional Navajos believe that women and men have distinct roles in society -- women as caretakers of the home and of children, and men as providers and leaders, said Tommy Begay, a Navajo and University of Arizona doctoral student who is studying the evolution of cultures. … Although Navajo is a matriarchal society, traditional Navajos will probably stick to the belief that only men should serve as president, Begay said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit SAC Named FBI Criminal Division Deputy Assistant Director. The Detroit News (11/7, Shepardson) reports, "The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a top job overseeing criminal investigations nationwide. Michigan native Daniel D. Roberts…will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington. … 'I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge,' Roberts said, calling the job 'a natural fit.'" The News notes, "Last month, FBI director Robert Mueller asked Roberts to take the new job," as "the FBI is in the process of filling many jobs at FBI headquarters and reshuffling the top agents at the nation's 56 field offices. … Roberts said he was most proud of his office's handling of many special events without incident," and he "made it a priority to recruit FBI agents to the Detroit office, making the pitch that the area gets an unfair rap, and also got funding to boost the size of the office, which is the 11th largest U.S. FBI field office." The AP (11/7) also reports briefly on Roberts' appointment.

Five Charged In Florida Drug Investigation Spurred By Family's Slaying. The Palm Beach Post (11/7) reports a federal grand jury "has formally charged five people with conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine in a drug case spawned by an investigation into the killing of a family found shot to death last month on the side of Florida's Turnpike. Investigators say four of the West Palm Beach-area residents indicted in the federal drug case are connected to the Oct. 13 slaying of the Escobedo family on the side of the highway in Port St. Lucie - though no one has been charged in the homicides. The federal indictment was issued Friday by a grand jury in West Palm Beach and made public during a court hearing Monday morning in Fort Pierce."

Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers (11/7) reports all four people described as "persons of interest" in the Escobedo family killings "have been indicted on federal drug charges." Investigators "were led to the drug operation by apparent references to several of the defendants in ledgers found in the Escobedo home, which recorded payments next to names, according to court records. Agents who raided the West Palm Beach home found a powder and crack cocaine, Ecstasy pills and guns."

The AP (11/6) reports a federal magistrate "denied bond Monday for a man considered a person of interest in the killings of a family of four found along Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie. Ricardo Sanchez, 23, of suburban West Palm Beach, was arrested Oct. 26 on cocaine charges with four others. Police believe four of the five people arrested that same day are connected to the slayings of the family." The Gainesville Sun, Florida Times-Union, and Dallas Morning News are among the newspapers that used the AP story.

In California, Medical Marijuana Still Generating Conflicts 10 Years After Proposition 215. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/7, Mcdonald) writes, "The potential of Proposition 215, which conflicts squarely with federal laws that classify marijuana among the most dangerous drugs, has never been realized. Thousands of California patients have no legal access to medical marijuana. … Unscrupulous and profit-minded dispensary operators have taken advantage of the absence of uniform rules, opening storefronts anywhere they can and selling marijuana to unqualified patients." The Union-Tribune says some legal scholars "believe U.S. drug agents should enforce federal laws but also respect state rights. However, the Drug Enforcement Administration has recruited local agencies to join task forces that continue to raid dispensaries and cooperatives."

Purported Gang Member Faces Federal Drug Charges In Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (11/7, Satterfield) reports, "Jessie Rondale Bailey…had been off the parole hook for his role in the May 1996 slaying of Brittany Shenice Daniels only a few months when he started racking up new charges. But the stakes for Bailey got a sudden boost last week with his arrest on a federal indictment alleging four drug sales, including two involving more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. … In April, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Todd Lee and KPD officer Bruce Conkey began building a federal drug case against Bailey, records show. … He joins former East Side gang members Melvin 'Little Melvin' Davis and Robert D. Campbell as participants in the fatal drive-by who have wound up back in trouble."

In Arizona, Former Prosecutor Remorseful About Role In Drug-Related Case. The Arizona Daily Star (11/7) reports a former Pima County prosecutor who "was once engaged to former murder suspect Bradley Schwartz says no words are adequate to describe how 'remorseful, ashamed and embarrassed' she is about the events leading up to her possible disbarment. Last November, the State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez, 38, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct." The bar "alleges Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription drug fraud charges along with Schwartz, but she continued having a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to, and lied about it. … She further acknowledged that she lied to DEA agents about her relationship with Schwartz when they initially questioned her."

ATF Probing Detroit Fire. The Detroit News (11/7, Brand-Williams) reports, "The Detroit Fire Department is investigating a two-alarm fire that destroyed several businesses and apartments and produced more than a $1 million in damage near Lahser and Grand River on the city's northwest early Monday morning." The News conitnues, "The National Response Team from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and ATF special agents from the Detroit Field Division were called in to assist the Detroit Fire and Arson Squad in their investigation, according to the ATF. … 'We are involved because of the dollar amount of the fire. We don't look at this suspicious or not,' said Vera Fedorak, an ATF spokeswoman in Detroit. 'The Detroit Police Department asked us for assistance.'" The News adds, "The blaze was reported by a resident around 1 a.m. The building contained four businesses and several store fronts that were unoccupied. Six apartments on the second floor of the building were occupied. … There was no deaths reported in the blaze."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Nominate Paulson Advisor To Treasury Post. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B11, 2.03M) reports, "President Bush said he intends to nominate Anthony Ryan, a senior adviser to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, to serve as assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial markets." Ryan, "who was one of Mr. Paulson's first hires at Treasury, will have primary responsibility for managing Treasury's debt-market portfolio, such as the 30-year Treasury bond. The position has been vacant for a year since Timothy Bitsberger left to join mortgage giant Freddie Mac."

House Leadership Contests Already Underway. Roll Call (11/7, Davis, Yachnin) reports that while "control of the House won't be determined until tonight at the earliest, contested leadership elections already are brewing on both sides of the aisle." For the GOP, "much of the current leadership's fate rests on today's outcome, as the chances of retaining their current posts become more vulnerable with each seat lost. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) are guaranteed a challenge, as are Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.)." House Democrats "remain committed to holding their Caucus elections on Nov. 16, but House Republicans are increasingly likely to postpone their scheduled Nov. 15 elections even if they hold on to House control." If Republicans "defy expectations and retain the majority, Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) has reiterated in recent weeks that he intends to run again for an unprecedented fifth term for the top job." But "long before the Foley story broke, an increasing number of House Republicans were doubtful that Hastert, who suffers from health problems including diabetes, would serve out a full Congress. Boehner is a likely candidate, but the Ohioan is seen as unlikely to mount a challenge to Hastert, rather waiting for him to exit the House on his own terms." If for "no other reason than that he took over mid-Congress, Boehner is the most likely current Republican to stay in leadership in the 110th Congress." Should Democrats "win control of the chamber, it is widely expected that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) would be elevated to the Speaker's office, which would make her the first woman to hold the post." A Democrat-run House "would bring a simmering fight for the Majority Leader's office to a boil leading to the scheduled Nov. 16 leadership elections." Although "conventional wisdom gives Hoyer, as the party's current No. 2 leader, a claim to the Majority Leader's post, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) surprised colleagues in June when he announced that he would also seek the office."

Congress To Take Up Appropriations Measures In Lame Duck Session. Roll Call (11/7, Pierce) reports regardless of "which party emerges victorious today, the current Republican majority still must find a way to fund the government, at least through the winter holidays, as well as finish other year-end business during the lame-duck session, which begins next week but is destined to last well into December." In order "to give themselves some breathing room after what is expected to be a bruising Election Day for the GOP, one of the first orders of business in both chambers next week is likely to be the passage of a continuing resolution that would allow Congress to punt the issue of fiscal 2007 appropriations until the first full week in December." GOP leaders "plan to make at least a passing attempt to complete the remaining nine spending bills as stand-alone measures, rather than cobbling them together into a massive omnibus appropriations measure — a necessity if Congress wanted to finish up within one week." But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "finally acknowledged last week that Congress will have to extend its lame-duck session into December after taking a two-week break for Thanksgiving. That gives Congress more time to take up at least a few more of those appropriations bills in regular order."

Federal Board Rules Preference For Veterans Supersedes Expedited Hiring Programs. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr (11/7), in his "Federal Diary" column, reports, "A federal board has reaffirmed the government's obligation to show a preference for military veterans in hiring, even when federal agencies use a special program designed to quickly fill jobs with applicants who have a high grade-point average. The decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board, which hears appeals in federal personnel disputes, is a setback for the Outstanding Scholar program, which permits agencies to bypass regular civil service hiring procedures, and for the Office of Personnel Management, which had petitioned the board to reconsider its rulings from last year. … Kerry B. McTigue , general counsel at the OPM, said government lawyers are studying last month's decision and whether to file a federal court appeal. The American Legion…welcomed the board's decision."

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan Says Economy Poised For Rebound. The Washington Post (11/7, D2, Henderson, 748K) reports, "Former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan said yesterday that home sales and prices may continue to slide for some time, but the broader US economy appears poised for a rebound. 'It looks as though the worst is behind us' in terms of the effect of the housing slump on economic growth, he told financial advisers at a conference in Washington organized by Schwab Institutional, a division of Charles Schwab & Co." He added, "We're obviously going through a significant slowing period, which as best as I can judge is quite likely to be temporary."

Stocks Rise. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 12, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) took "a look at Wall Street on this day before the national election. The Dow was more than 119 points on [to close at 12,105.55] on today's trading. NASDAQ was also up more than 35 points [to close at 2,365.95]." USA Today (11/7, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "The Dow's resurgence may be signaling that its recent slump was just a normal pause after a heady three-month rally that saw it crack its old record set in January 2000, top 12,000 for the first time and close at an all-time high of 12,163.66 on Oct. 26." The Wall Street Journal (11/7, C1, 2.03M) notes "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.1%, or 15.48 points, to 1379.78, ending a three-day pullback up 10.5% on the year."

The Washington Post/AP (11/7, D3) runs a similar report on the stock numbers. The Financial Times (11/7, Guerrera, Simon, Blitz) reports, "A takeover wave worth more than $15bn swept through global markets on Monday, boosting stock indices as big deals by investors such as Bill Gates and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts eased fears of a slowdown in merger activity. The flurry of activity – dubbed 'Takeover Monday' by analysts – was led by a $3.7bn bid by Mr Gates and Prince Alwaleed, the billionaire Saudi investor, for Four Seasons Hotels, the Canadian chain." USA Today (11/7, Krantz, 2.27M) said "Monday looked like the day of the deal again, for this week at least, as a wave of mergers and acquisitions swept Wall Street, enveloping half a dozen U.S. companies."

Fed Official Says Income Gap Could Undermine US Democracy. USA Today (11/7, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "US income inequality has risen to such a level that 'there are signs that (it) is intensifying resistance to globalization, impairing social cohesion, and could, ultimately, undermine American democracy,' San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank President Janet Yellen said Monday." In "language rare for a central bank official," Yellen "suggested that high priority be given to improving education, tax credits and other aspects of the social safety net, despite the cost in dollars and possible impact on economic efficiency, according to the text of her lecture at the University of California, Irvine."

Florida Gubernatorial Candidate Snubs Bush On Campaign's Last Day. The AP (11/7, Espo) reports, "On the eve of midterm elections, Democrats criticized Republicans as stewards of a stale status quo while President Bush declared, 'we're closing strong' in a final drive to preserve GOP control of Congress." Bush "campaigned on Monday from Florida to Arkansas and Texas." But "the day brought one more reminder of his poor standing in the polls when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped the presidential rally in Pensacola, Fla., to make a speech of his own hundreds of miles away." Bush "made no mention of the evident snub in public, but not so his aides. 'Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 people' expected for the president's speech, said Karl Rove, the White House's top political strategist." The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Gerstenzang, 918K) notes Rove's "snippy remark," and adds he "overestimated the size of the Pensacola crowd by several thousand."

Crist's "evident snub" focused much of the nation media attention when it came to the President's campaign swing. As the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (11/7, Hollis, 265K) reports, the "irritation shown by the White House…over Crist's snub of the president in Pensacola…captured the media attention. Crist's spokesman said Sunday the candidate was skipping a rally there because he needed to spend his final day of campaigning elsewhere in the state, including vote-rich South Florida."

All three networks noted it, with the CBS Evening News (11/6, story 6, 1:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reporting Florida "neatly sums up the President's status. Low approval ratings mean he only visits heavily conservative areas like the Panhandle. But even there top GOP candidates don't want to be seen with Mr. Bush."

ABC World News (11/6, story 2, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Bush saying, "I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida." ABC then added, "One person missing at the rally was Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for Florida governor. He was campaigning elsewhere. And it was Crist who invited the President to Florida." NBC Nightly News (11/6, lead story, 3:30, Gregory, 9.87M) also noted the story, adding "many Republicans want distance from the President and his message."

Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume) reported, "In the conservative panhandle of Florida the day before election day was a Bush family affair." It "was the last time Gov. Jeb Bush would introduce his brother, the president, who urged the crowd to get out the vote for Jeb's replacement." President Bush: "Tomorrow you get to vote for a new governor. I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida." Fox continued, "While Charlie Crist signs dotted the crowd Crist was a no-show. He was campaigning in Jacksonville with Sen. John McCain. His campaign said it already had strong support in the panhandle and time would be better spent elsewhere."

MSNBC's Hardball (11/6, lead story, Matthews) also reported President Bush "was stood up today by" Crist. According to MSNBC, "The White House thought Charlie Crist would introduce the president at that rally but decided at the last minute not to show up." MSNBC added, "The president himself seemed to be above it all. … He urged the crowd…to vote for" Crist. President Bush "also asked people to vote for Katherine Harris. She was in the audience, not on the stage."

The AP (11/7, Loven) reports, "The closer the election came to the finish line, the more President Bush's aides battled the perception he was doing his party as much harm as good and was unwanted in many districts." Along similar lines, the Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (11/7) writes, "The Republican Party was saddled with an unpopular president who led the nation into an unnecessary and unwinnable war, mocked traditional American notions of justice and privacy, reasserted the powers of an imperial presidency, and generally showed himself willing to disregard objective facts if they were not to his liking. That wasn't much for Republican incumbents to work with." Noting Crist's absence from the event, AFP (11/7, Knox) says Bush "suffered one final campaign trail indignity."

The Palm Beach Post (11/7, Lipman, Poole, Crowley, Date) reports "the state's top Republican candidates were conspicuously absent from the presidential rally, which drew about 7,500 people." The only statewide candidate to attend the event featuring the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush "was U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. But Harris, who trails far behind in the polls in her bid to unseat Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, did not appear on stage with them. … Republicans Bill McCollum, who is seeking to succeed Crist as attorney general, and incumbent Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson were campaigning along the Interstate 4 corridor. Tom Lee, the GOP candidate for chief financial officer, also was not in Pensacola."

The Washington Times (11/7, Curl, 88K) reports that "at events in Montana, Nevada, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, Mr. Bush urged supporters to get out the vote." The Times describes Crist's absence from the event as "an odd twist."

The Washington Post (11/7, A1, Baker, 748K) also notes Crist's "snub," and adds, "So it goes these days. Bush shrugged it off and delivered a robust speech, firing up a crowd of Republicans and defiantly predicting victory. Any doubt he may harbor, he kept to himself. Any feelings of regret are locked tight inside. The rest of the world may see an unpopular president in the midst of an unpopular war. But Bush soldiers on. He does not publicly stew as other presidents have. He powers through event after event as if he were still the leader the country rallied behind after Sept. 11, 2001."

The Houston Chronicle (11/7, Mason, Scharrer, 535K) notes that in Texas, Gov. Rick Perry got "a personal boost from President Bush and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn blitzing the state with Bush's former press secretary and the president's former Medicare chief." In "his last event of the campaign season, Bush touched down in Dallas for a rally with Perry, telling an estimated 10,000 people at Reunion Arena that 'You elected us to get things done.' 'Let me put it to you this way,' Bush told the cheering crowd. 'Everything I learned, I learned here in Texas.'"

The Chicago Tribune (11/7, Silva, 623K) reports, "On Monday, the last day of his final political campaign that could effect his presidency, Bush brandished the unrelenting optimism which he has carried to his own personal battle for his party's control of Congress for months." Bush also "carried the added burden of his own unpopularity as president, with the war in Iraq having taken a toll on the president after nearly four years of combat. "

Under the headline "A Last Hurrah Of Sorts For Bush-Rove Partnership," the New York Times (11/7, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports "Bush and his political partner, Karl Rove, ended it where they started it: in this sliver of Northwest Florida that arguably gave them their 2000 victory. Like then, the two have utilized a symbiotic relationship in which, friends say, Mr. Rove, the president's chief political adviser, is both mastermind and supplicant, and Mr. Bush is both leader and follower. While several members of the team that got Mr. Bush to the White House in 2000 are gone, Mr. Rove remains." The Times adds, "Asked Monday about plans for a possible Democratic-controlled Congress, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, repeated his standard refusal to discuss the topic, then added, 'Here's the thing that you do need to know, which is that the president plans for a very active final two years of his presidency.'" He added, "So the president is going to be very aggressive, and he's not going to play small ball."

Meanwhile, the AP (11/7, Hunt) says that "running out of time and influence, President Bush faces a rough road in the twilight of his presidency regardless of who controls Congress. … Republicans are in a sour mood, scarred by corruption scandals, held in low esteem by voters and divided over issues from deficit spending to immigration reform. Many GOP candidates shunned Bush in their campaigns, fearing he would hurt rather than help them. With the end of the midterm elections and the opening of the 2008 presidential race, Republicans as well as Democrats will be telling the country how they would do things differently from Bush."

Giuliani Credits Bush's Campaigning For GOP "Momentum." Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (11/6) said he believes Republican candidates are starting to gain "momentum" in the polls because "the president's campaigning has helped a lot -- going out there and making the case for remaining on offense against terrorism. I think people are seeing an economy that is doing really well and they realize a lot of that had to do with the action that the president took in lowering taxes."

Analysts Expect Democrats To Take House, Perhaps Senate. The consensus of media commentators on the eve of the election is that Democrats will take the House and may possibly gain control of the Senate as well, although that possibility appears to have lost some steam in the last few days. The New York Times (11/7, Broder, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports even Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, yesterday "introduced a cautionary note in contrast with confident predictions by Mr. Bush, Mr. Rove and Vice President Dick Cheney that Republicans would retain majorities in the House and Senate. Asked about his party's prospects in the House, Mr. Mehlman said that although he saw signs of new hope that Republicans could retain control, 'I believe it's going to be very close; I think it remains an uphill climb.'" He "sounded more confident about the Senate." The Times adds, "Independent analysts predict Democratic gains of 20 and 40 seats in the House, giving the party control for the first time since 1994. An analysis accompanying a Gallup Poll released over the weekend said that based on calculations from Congressional elections from 1946 to 2002, the Democrats were poised to gain 11 to 58 seats, with a gain of 35 the most likely outcome."

In a similar report, the Los Angeles Times (11/7, A1, Brownstein, 918K) says "most analysts on both sides agreed it would be extremely difficult for Republicans to prevent Democrats from securing the 15-seat gain they need to capture a majority in the House. " In the Senate, "Democrats face a tougher climb." They need a gain of six seats to reach a majority, and that will require them to capture at least four of the five most closely contested Republican-held seats -- in Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri -- without losing any seats they already hold." The AP (11/7, Raum) notes "nearly every Democratic senator seeking re-election seems assured of another term, polls suggest."

USA Today (11/7, Nichols, 2.27M) reports Republican leaders "cited narrowing polls in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island and Maryland as signs of an 11th-hour surge." Turnout "should increase from 39.7% in 2002 and may exceed the most recent midterm high of 42.1% in 1982, according to Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate. Gans does not expect this year's turnout to top the all-time benchmark of 47% in 1970."

As NBC Nightly News (11/6, lead story, 3:30, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, some recent polls have shown Republicans making some progress on the generic poll. GOP leaders, while "bracing for losses…nevertheless they seized on some of that new polling…arguing that there is a tightening in the race and to argue that the Republican faithful are indeed coming home." NBC added that "for Republicans, it's almost all defense and they're fending off Democrats in solidly red territory," where Republican struggling to attract independent voters. Charlie Cook, political analyst, was shown saying, "If independents vote breaking 2-1 Democratic, that's how you get into 30, 35-seat loss for Republicans in the house, maybe even higher."

The CBS Evening News (11/6, lead story, 1:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) commented on the new polls and said it is "clear the spread is shrinking and things are moving. Having said that, the Republicans are still behind, they are running with a President who has a very low approval rating and all the polls show Americans believe the country is headed in the wrong direction. So it's going to be hard for the Republicans to close this gap entirely."

On NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 6, 3:05, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Democrats "think the most fertile ground" for them is "the Midwest and the East and this is how they plan to do it. Indiana -- they believe they can win three seats. Ohio, three seats. Pennsylvania, four seats. New York, three seats. Connecticut, two seats. If they can win 15 seats in just those five states, they have captured control of the House. And they still have 20 other seats all across the country." In the Senate, "there's a battleground in seven Republican states…and two Democratic states." Democrats "must hold New Jersey and Maryland. Then, they need to win six of the seven -- Pennsylvania, Ohio, Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Missouri, Tennessee. If they lose Tennessee, they have to win six out of six on the Republican side. If they lose New Jersey or Maryland, then they have to win all seven of the red states or they do not recapture control of the Senate. This is the equivalent of the winning the Senate of the inside straight."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Feldmann, 58K) reports a "last-minute tightening in the polls of Senate contests from Montana to Rhode Island to Maryland has thrown some doubt into the calculations of pundits who had come to see a Democratic takeover as possible." While many analysts "can see a clear path to a Democratic net gain of five seats…which would bring the partisan balance sheet to a 50-50 tie," the "last-minute volatility both in the nationwide polls gauging voter preferences and in individual races leaves the outcome even more in doubt." Voters "in Rhode Island and Montana who once appeared set to throw out their two Republican senators Lincoln Chafee and Conrad Burns may be having second thoughts, judging by the tightening of polls there." In his column in The Hill (11/7), Dick Morris says, "While the Republican Party leadership in the House seems doomed to move into a well deserved minority, the GOP shows increasing signs of being able to hang on to the Senate, although perhaps by the thinnest of margins."

The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, 2.03M), however, says that although "Republican prospects seem slightly brighter in the Senate…enough of these races are now toss-ups to put the Democrats within striking distance. Judging from the polls, the over-under betting on Democratic pickups of Senate seats hovers at around five."

On ABC World News (11/6, story 3, 2:00, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "There's no question the Republican base is getting back in the game. And they're starting to cut into the Democrats' lead among independents. Democrats' polls confirm this tightening, as well. They also point out that margins like we just saw could translate for a big night for them. In 1994, when Republicans took over, their margin was 52-46. They won 52 seats." Gibson: "Let's talk about the Senate. The question is, can the Democrats pick up six seats?" Stephanopoulos: "Looking very tough. The consensus in both parties is it's an uphill fight right now. Democrats starting to feel a little better about the state of Missouri. But Republicans are feeling better about the states of Michigan, which hadn't been on the map at all up until today, and Maryland, which is a Democratic stronghold. Most interesting, both Democrats and Republicans agree that Lincoln Chafee, the Republican in Rhode Island, is coming on very strong. He is ahead right now." Stephanopoulos added, "Presidential approval rating is the best predictor of midterms. Look back at these ratings. 1966, Lyndon Johnson, 44%. Lost 47 seats. Ronald Reagan in 1982, 42%, lost 26 seats. Bill Clinton in 1994, 46%, lost 52 seats. George W. Bush is below all of them in approval rating. That is clearly a danger zone."

Stuart Rothenberg, in a Roll Call column titled "Down To The Wire: Expect A Big Night For Democrats" (11/7), writes that "there is little uncertainty about the fight for the House, except for questions about exactly which Republican incumbents will be lucky enough to survive. … Republican chances for retaining the House have moved from small to smaller, and public and private polling now suggests a solid Democratic win." He adds that "even the most optimistic Republican insiders I can find seem to think a loss of 18 or 19 seats is inevitable, while others counter that a loss of more than 30 is more likely. Most GOP insiders would be ecstatic if the party held its losses to two dozen or less."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume), noted that "there's no poll [generic House ballot] that is now closer than four points. Fox News is now showing it's back up to 13. I think the Democrats will win the house." According to Kristol the Democrats are likely to pick-up 32-40 seats. Kristol predicted the Senate will be 50-50, or "possibly 51-49 Democratic." Kristol added, "I think [Sen. Jon] Kyl could lose and "if he loses it's a blow-out on election night, obviously."

The Weekly Standard's Fred Barnes, also on Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume), said, "I think [the GOP] will lose the House but hold the Senate."

Roll Call (11/7, Whittington) also says "there is little question that Democrats are well-positioned to win at least the 15 seats needed to take the House majority," even if "the magnitude of their victory rests largely on their ability to win a number of what were once second-, third- and even fourth-tier contests." In the Senate, "late shifts in a handful of competitive races has put the Democrats' final math somewhat in flux after a monthlong intense focus on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia as the states expected to decide control of the chamber."

The Washington Post (11/7, A1, VandeHei, Balz, 748K) reports Republican "operatives…said there is mounting evidence that fears about the nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea, coupled with more generalized doubts about Democratic competence and fortitude on national security, have provided GOP candidates with much-needed momentum in the final days. GOP tracking polls, these strategists said, have shown a slight but steady uptick since Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), in what he called a botched joke, suggested that uneducated people end up fighting in Iraq -- a comment that infuriated top Democrats despite the 2004 presidential nominee's repeated apologies and explanations." The Washington Times (11/7, Lambro, 88K) addresses similar GOP predictions under the headline "Kerry Gaffe Loses Independents For His Party."

The Washington Times (11/7, Hurt, 88K), in another story titled "Polls Give GOP A Lift On Election Eve," says "Republicans on Capitol Hill…were guardedly optimistic that this year's much-predicted Democratic 'tidal wave' will fail to materialize. Still, Republicans await the results more anxiously than Democrats."

ABC World News (11/6, lead story, 3:05, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Republicans say they've spent $30 million on getting out the vote, fliers and phone banks, three million voter contacts just on Saturday. Democrats say they spent $40 million with 3.5 million contacts on Saturday." NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 5, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) noted "both parties are now aggressively pursuing a technique called microtargeting. They collect massive amounts of information about potential voters. Everything from where you live to what you drive to what you read."

The Financial Times (11/7, Luce, Negus) reports "Republican strategists said their volunteers had made direct contact with 27m American voters during the election campaign – far more than the Democrats. 'We have made more voter contacts in 2006 than we did in 2004, which is remarkable given that this is a mid-term election, not a presidential election,' said Dana Perino, a White House spokesperson." However, electoral analysts "said the superiority of the Republican fundraising and 'micro-targeting' machines would be insufficient to breach the wide Democratic lead, which was still averaging 11 percentage points if all the polls of the past few days were taken into account."

The AP (11/7, Kuhnhenn) reports "national committees for the Republicans and Democrats have spent about $225 million for or against candidates, concentrating their resources in 10 Senate races and 66 House contests that could determine who controls Congress.' The data "is based on a review of independent spending reports filed with the Federal Election Commission as of Monday. Republicans spent about $81 million in 53 congressional districts, mostly on television advertising opposing Democratic challengers. Democrats spent $64 million in 56 congressional districts, most of them represented by a Republican."

The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "This time around, Democrats have played the money game more assertively than in any previous midterm election. Party leaders have mined donors for extra cash.

They set explicit fund-raising targets for new candidates to win the party's backing. And they also raised donation targets for veteran politicians who want to become committee chairmen should Democrats win a majority." The Journal adds, "The result: Fund raising by the Democratic congressional committees is running 30% ahead of the same period two years ago, according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan group that tracks political money. The Democratic party committees for the first time entered the final weeks of a campaign with nearly as much money in the bank as their Republican counterparts." That "has allowed Democrats to attack earlier, even to the point of backing conservative Republicans in primary races they thought would be more beatable in the general election."

Democrats Fear "Overheated" Expectations May Demoralize Party Even In Victory. The New York Times (11/7, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "In most midterm elections, an out-of-power party picking up, say, 14 seats in the House and five seats in the Senate could call it a pretty good night." But "for Democrats in 2006, that showing would mean coming up one seat shy of taking control of both the Senate and the House. And it would probably be branded a loss — in the case of the House, a big one." The Times adds, "For a combination of reasons -- increasingly bullish prognostications by independent handicappers, galloping optimism by Democratic leaders and bloggers, and polls that promise a Democratic blowout -- expectations for the party have soared into the stratosphere. Democrats are widely expected to take the House, and by a significant margin, and perhaps the Senate as well, while capturing a majority of governorships and legislatures." These expectations "may well be overheated. Polls over the weekend suggested that the contest was tightening, and some prognosticators on Monday were scaling back their predictions, if ever so slightly. … Some Democrats worry that those forecasts, accurate or not, may be setting the stage for a demoralizing election night, and one with lasting ramifications, sapping the party's spirit and energy heading into the 2008 presidential election cycle."

Republicans Keep Senate In Student Election, But Lose House. The Wall Street Journal Online (11/7, Malik) reports, "Nearly one million votes cast by elementary and high school students in a nationwide mock election backed a Republican Senate but turned power over to the Democrats in the House of Representatives." The ballots for "the Youth Leadership Initiative's Internet mock election, which ended Thursday night, were tailored to local elections and referenda. Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center of Politics, started the program in 1998 at three local schools." In the "mock election, Democrats gained seats in Pennsylvania, Montana, Tennessee and Mississippi. But Republicans carried Florida, Minnesota and Washington for a 54-seat majority." Republican George Allen "may have retained his Senate seat in Virginia, but his 44.74% win against Democratic rival Jim Webb's 44.59% shows how his campaign missteps became an issue. Hilary Clinton retained New York for the Democrats by a wide margin." In the House races, "the student polls were brutal in Ohio, Florida, New York and North Carolina. Democrats came out ahead with 218 seats compared with 202 for Republicans and 15 for other candidates."

Democrats Hope To Win Senior Citizen Votes. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, Lovely, 2.03M) reports Democratic strategists "looking for bellwethers are closely watching a group of voters that has attracted relatively little attention in the blitz of this year's campaign: senior citizens." Democrats "decisively lost the vote of older Americans to President Bush in the 2004 election, which party leaders see as a key reason they failed to unseat the president. Exit polls indicate Mr. Bush prevailed among those ages 60 and over by a margin of 54% to 46%." Democrats "think they can recapture those voters this year, which would be a crucial step toward taking one or both houses of Congress."

Illegal Immigration Fails To Become GOP Midterm Silver Bullet. In the Wall Street Journal's "Campaign Journal" column (11/7), Jackie Calmes says congressional Republicans "seized on the issue many hoped would be a silver bullet to get through the midterm elections, and without the losses that a president's party traditionally suffers. By attacking illegal immigration, Republicans could look tough on border security and please their conservative constituents and many independents. In the process, they could force votes in Congress -- say, on cutting off benefits for illegals' children, or making English the official U.S. language -- that would divide the Democrats and their Hispanic allies, and, ideally, trap some Democratic lawmakers into votes that could be turned into 30-second attack ads for television by November 2006." But it "hasn't exactly turned out that way." The issue "of dealing with illegal immigrants divided the Bush-era Republican Party at least as badly, and more embarrassingly so given that it holds all the power in Washington."

Kinsley Critiques Democrats' Plan For Iraq. The Washington Post's Michael Kinsley (11/7) writes, "Apparently and unfortunately, President Bush is right that the Democrats have no 'plan for victory.' … For national security in general, the Democrats' plan is so according-to-type that you cringe with embarrassment: It's mostly about new cash benefits for veterans. Regarding Iraq specifically, the Democrats' plan has two parts. First, they want Iraqis to take on 'primary responsibility for securing and governing their country.' Then they want 'responsible redeployment' (great euphemism) of American forces."

Liberals' Triumph Seen As Likely To Be Short-Lived. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/7, A12, 2.03M) Arthur C. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University, writes, "This midterm election, in the view of many optimistic liberals, will be a forceful repudiation of the inevitability of American conservatism. A victory after so many years of losses will mark the beginning of the end to the country's nightmarish reactionary drift. … But will it really be the dawn of a new day for the American left? After a cold look at the evidence, liberals might decide to take the champagne off the ice. The victory, assuming there is one, will hardly be glorious, and long-term trends are still distinctly right wing."

Dionne Predicts GOP Infighting. The Washington Post's E. J. Dionne (11/7) writes, "The administration's approach to Iraq is an orphan -- only President Bush and his closest advisers claim it as their own. That is why we can know how Republicans and conservatives will spend the last two years of the Bush presidency. They will fault philosophical adversaries for what went wrong, purge various actors and ideas from the movement, and insist on contradictory forms of ideological purity."

O'Reilly Portrays Pelosi As "Standard-Bearer Of San Francisco Values." The subject of last night's "Talking Point Memo" on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (11/6) was "San Francisco Values vs. A Time of Terror." Host Bill O'Reilly noted, "There's no question that the nation's most liberal city doesn't reflect the traditional values of most Americans. The city's standard-bearer Nancy Pelosi is about to become one of the most powerful people in the country if all goes the Democrats way tomorrow. The ACLU is thrilled. George Soros is delirious. … But the rest of us are left with an unsettling feeling, yes, Iraq's a mess, but what's on the horizon isn't exactly a vision of comfort either."

Democrats Cry Foul Over NRCC Automated Negative Phone Banks. The New York Times (11/7, Drew, Hulse, 1.21M) reports automated phone calls criticizing Democrat Lois Murphy in the Pennsylvania 6th CD race "are part of a telephone blitz that the Republican Party has unleashed in several dozen races that are likely to determine control of the House in Tuesday's elections. And the repeat calls to the same homes have set off a new furor over campaign tactics, with the Democrats claiming the calls violate federal communications rules and are tantamount to harassment." Murphy and "other Democrats say they have been flooded with complaints from irritated voters who think that the calls are coming from the candidates themselves. Many of the voters had hung up before the message was over, and never heard that it was produced by the Republican Party." Democratic leaders "contend that the messages violate federal rules that require groups making automated calls to identify themselves at the outset. And the National Republican Congressional Committee, which has financed the calls, agreed on Sunday to quit making some of them in New Hampshire, where a state law limits who can receive computerized phone messages." NRCC spokesman Ed Patru "said the phone campaign complied with federal law and was 'drawing contrasts' between the candidates." But Democratic officials "say they fear the saturation calling is just a tactic to irritate voters and discourage them from going to the polls."

The Washington Post (11/7, A8, Babington, MacGillis, 748K) reports the "heavy volume of automated political phone calls has infuriated countless voters and triggered sharp complaints from Democrats, who say the Republican Party has crossed the line in bombarding households with recorded attacks on candidates in tight House races nationwide." Some voters, "sick of interrupted dinners and evenings, say they will punish the offending parties by opposing them in today's elections. But critics say Republicans crafted the messages to delude voters -- especially those who hang up quickly -- into thinking that Democrats placed the calls." Republicans "denied the allegation, noting that their party acknowledges its authorship at the recorded calls' end. After citizens' complaints in New Hampshire, however, the National Republican Congressional Committee agreed to end the calls to households on the federal do-not-call list, even though the law exempts political messages from such restrictions." Whether "'robo-calls' are positive or negative, mean-spirited or humorous, thousands of Americans are sick of them, according to campaign organizations that have been fielding complaints over the past two weeks." In a "conference call with reporters yesterday, the DCCC chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), compared the widespread robo-calling to a 2002 Republican effort in New Hampshire to jam Democratic phone lines to prevent the Democrats' get-out-the-vote effort."

Media Consortium Seeks To Keep Exit Polls Under Wraps. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, Schatz, 2.03M) reports, "Two-by-two, polling specialists from ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN, Fox News and the Associated Press will go into rooms in New York and Washington shortly before noon Tuesday. Their cellphones and BlackBerrys will be confiscated; proctors will monitor the doors; and for the next five hours, these experts will pore over exit-poll data from across the country." If "all goes well, only when they emerge from their cloisters will the legions of ravenous political bloggers have any chance of getting their hands on the earliest indication of which party will end up controlling Congress." The "extraordinary security is a result of mix-ups that prompted grumbling about the accuracy of exit polls after the 2004 presidential election: Bloggers posted data from early exit polls, incorrectly calling some states for Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry and indicating that he would unseat President Bush." This year, media executives "figure the secret will keep less than half an hour."

Election Outcome Expected To Be Known Early. The Washington Post (11/7, A6, Birnbaum, 748K) reports election observers "probably will not have to stay up too late to know which way the midterm elections are heading." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report said, "The key races in Congress are concentrated in the Eastern and Central time zones, so we ought to have a good sense of the trend relatively early in the evening." The Post adds that in the Senate, Democrats "would have to gain six seats to win a majority, and all but one of the most competitive races are in states in the East or Midwest: Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Ohio and Maryland. The single nail-biter farther west is in Montana." Most tossup House races "are also clustered in states east of the Mississippi River. By watching the fate of Republican candidates in Connecticut, New York, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, political enthusiasts will have a good idea whether Democrats will win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House, analysts say." But that "is, of course, if everything goes smoothly. And things rarely do. Uncertainties about electronic voting machines and hassles over identifying registered voters could make early predictions about the election precarious."

The New York Times (11/7, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports for an "early glimpse of how election night will unfold, strategists of both parties have their eyes fixed on Indiana. Yes, Indiana is home to three of the most competitive House races in the nation. But it is the 6 p.m. Eastern closing time for a majority of the state's polling places that is most intriguing to Republicans and Democrats."

Armitage Says Election Gives US Chance To Win Back Lost Allies. The Washington Post (11/7, A10, Goldfarb, 748K) reports former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, "who was an influential adviser to Colin L. Powell when Powell was secretary of state, has weighed in on today's midterm elections, saying they offer the United States a chance to win back lost allies around the world." In a speech in Canberra, Australia, Armitage said "he expects Republicans to lose control of the House and perhaps the Senate. In an election dominated by a war that has turned off many U.S. allies, Armitage said Americans are concerned that international support for U.S. policy has declined since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Gore Campaigns For O'Malley, Cardin In Maryland. The Washington Post/AP (11/6) reports former Vice President Al Gore "made an election-eve visit to Maryland Monday, joining Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley and Senate candidate Ben Cardin at a get-out-the-vote rally at a Montgomery County retirement community." Gore was "the only national heavyweight from either party to campaign in the state on a day when Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich wound up his campaign with a rally near his boyhood home in Baltimore County and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the party's Senate nominee, continued what his campaign described as an around-the-clock campaign tour that he had started on Sunday." Gore's "appearance at Leisure World attracted an overflow crowd of more than 300 to hear the former vice president and a host of Maryland Democratic officials, including O'Malley, Cardin attorney general candidate Doug Gansler and comptroller nominee Peter Franchot." Gore said "Congress has abdicated its responsibility to hold President Bush accountable for his failures, and a Democratic House and Senate are needed to ask the tough questions Republican leaders are not asking." He said Baltimore "under O'Malley has had 'the most competent, most cutting edge ... administration of any city in the country.'"

The Washington Times (11/7, Ward, Miller, 88K) reports Gore, "who lost the 2000 presidential election to President Bush after weeks of recounts in Florida, said Mr. Cardin's contest with Mr. Steele 'is going to be looked at all across the nation.'" Cardin said, "This is about more than a Senate seat in Maryland. It's about taking back our country." The Times adds O'Malley "called the Ehrlich administration a 'detour' in the state's progress."

Fox News' Special Report (11/6, lead story, Hume) opened its broadcast with an update on the Senate race in Maryland, reporting, "a flashback -- former Vice President Al Gore stumping for Ben Cardin…and indirectly acknowledging the Democrats could lose this seat and any chance of the senate majority. … Endorsed by self black church pastors, Michael Steele has pulled into a statistical dead heat in this Democratic state and the head of the Democrats' national campaign downplayed expectations today."

Allen, Webb Urge Supporters To Vote. The Washington Times (11/7, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat James H. Webb Jr. "urged Virginians to go to the polls, as they crisscrossed the state in their final full day of campaigning in a race that could determine control of the U.S. Senate." The "uncertainty of today's result was crystal clear yesterday, with the release of two competing polls -- one giving Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, an eight-point lead and the other showing Mr. Allen, a former governor and congressman, with a three-point lead." Webb "ended his 10-month underdog campaign at a rally with former President Bill Clinton and more than 2,000 supporters in Old Town Alexandria." Clinton said, "If you want America to take a different path, you to have to elect Jim Webb." The Times adds Clinton's visit "prompted ridicule from Republicans who remember he lost in Virginia in 1992 and 1996 and that his last-minute visit for Lt. Gov. Donald S. Beyer in 1997 did not help the Democrat win the governor's race."

FBI Examining Report Of Possible Voter Intimidation In Virginia. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (11/7, Schapiro) reports the FBI is "looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb. Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate." Jean R. Jensen, "secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office." Jensen said "she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County."

Lieberman Says He Won't Be Beholden To GOP If He Wins. The AP (11/7, Miga) reported that although Sen. Joe Lieberman "expects to win a lot of Republican votes Tuesday, the Connecticut lawmaker said he won't feel especially beholden to the GOP if he is elected to a fourth term." Lieberman said, "I'll owe everybody and that's the point." The AP adds Lieberman, "whose Senate career was at risk just three months ago after he lost to anti-war challenger Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary, led Lamont by 12 percentage points in a statewide poll released Monday." Lieberman is "running as an independent and has enjoyed support from the GOP, including praise from the White House and fundraising help from prominent Republicans such as New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg. But he said his comeback since the primary has convinced him that he needs to be a stronger independent voice."

Up To 40% Of Voters May Have Cast Ballots Early In Tennessee Senate Race. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 4, 0:30, Costello, 9.87M) reported the Tennessee Senate race "has been described as a slugfest over race relations, God and family roots. The Republican Bob Corker, the Democrat-Harold Ford, Jr. Both men moving around the state today. The secretary of state's office tells us 40% of the people in the state who are going to vote may already have voted. The question -- who did they vote for? The polls have Corker up anywhere from three to 12 points by Harold Ford's team believes it's much closer, maybe even a dead heat and this is much less about Iraq than Harold Ford. If elected he'd be the first African American Senator from the South since Reconstruction."

Wilson Ad Cites North Korea Nuclear Threat. The New York Times (11/7, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports that in

DOJ_NMG_0091382

New Mexico's 1st CD, "near the site of the first nuclear bomb test, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican in a neck-and-neck race for re-election, has broadcast an incendiary television commercial against her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid. In the spot, images of fire mutate momentarily into floating fragments of text before dissolving again into flames: 'North Korea conducts nuclear test. Reductions in military spending. The murder of any American anywhere on earth.'" As a "picture of the North Korean dictator, Kim Jong Il, gives way to an unflattering photo of Ms. Madrid, a narrator asks: 'Can we trust her? With so much at stake? Does she have the experience we need? In a world like this, is she the one who will keep our families safe? Patricia Madrid. Don't take the risk.'"

Number Of Women In Congress Expected To Increase. ABC World News (11/6, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are 67 women in the House and 14 in the Senate. Those numbers are likely to increase tomorrow night." ABC (Snow) added, "Remember 1992 was dubbed the year of the woman. But tomorrow night may rival that. The number of women in the Senate could grow. The number in the House could grow by double digits. And by most projections, would be the biggest incoming class of women ever on Capitol Hill. Lois Murphy, a mother of two young girls, ran against Republican Congressman Jim Gerlach two years ago and lost by just 6,400 votes. This, she believes, is her year." This "wealthy district in Philadelphia's Mainline suburbs could be part of what some analysts are calling a perfect storm for female candidates. There are 139 women running this time around." Voters "disgusted by the war in Iraq and sick of scandals are looking for new blood, for outsiders. … And women such as Gabrielle Giffords in Arizona, Christine Jennings in Florida or Kirsten Gillibrand in New York may fit the bill." Debbie Walsh, Center for American Women and Politics: "They don't even have to open their mouths. They are not the standard issue white man in a blue suit with a red tie." Snow: "Women are not part of the Washington old boy network, so they are viewed as more trustworthy when the climate is such as it is this year. Of the 46 women challenging male incumbents, only 11 are Republicans, 34 Democrats."

Humane Society Seen As Potential Electoral Force. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A1, Mullins, 2.03M) reports, "For the first time in its 50-year history, the Humane Society is trying to elect candidates to Congress who support its animal-welfare agenda. After a series of mergers with other animal-welfare groups, the Humane Society counts 10 million Americans as members, an average of 23,000 in each of the 435 House districts. That's more than twice the membership of the National Rifle Association, which is considered one of the most effective single-issue campaign organizations. More important, the Humane Society's motivating issue -- the promotion of animal welfare -- resonates with the white suburban women who could be the key block of voters who decide this election."

AARP Official Defends Group's Voter Guide Questionnaire. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), David Sloane, AARP's senior managing director of government relations writes, "Rather than fostering an environment for real solutions, your editorial is an example ("AARP's Tax Trap," Review & Outlook, Nov. 1) of exactly what's wrong with the current debate over Social Security. The AARP Voters' Guide asks candidates to respond to two questions on this issue. The first is whether they would support or oppose using Social Security to fund private accounts. … Our opposition to this is simple: It adds unnecessary risk and trillions of dollars of debt to future generations." Slone adds, "Our second question goes to the heart of the matter: Would the candidates support a balanced Social Security plan to continue guaranteed benefits for future generations? The fact is, there are only two ways to address the solvency problem -- adding more resources to the program or adjusting future benefits (or some combination of both). … Our research shows the American public wants a balanced, bipartisan solution, and understands that changes will be needed in order to keep our promises."

Study Finds Americans Have Little Confidence In Leaders. The Washington Post (11/7, A19, Williamson, 748K) reports, "A new study shows that Americans have lost faith in the people who lead their federal, state and local governments, and in businesses, churches and schools. … 'America is in trouble,' reads the introduction to the 2006 National Leadership Index, sponsored by U.S. News & World Report and the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. According to the report, nearly three-quarters of Americans think that the nation faces a 'leadership crisis.' … The only leaders who earn more than a smidgen of Americans' confidence, the researchers say, are those in the military and medical fields. (Confidence in the media didn't slip, but it was in the sewer already.)"

Problems Surfacing With Electronic Voting Equipment. The CBS Evening News (11/6, story 3, Keteyian, 7.66M) reported, "Early voting has been going on in 15 states, an early test of the electronic voting equipment to be used by nearly 90% of the country tomorrow. But problems are beginning to surface." In Tennessee, "the site of a very tight Senate race, machines froze up in one county after 10,000 early voters, far more than expected showed up. The problem easily solved said a local official when more machines were activated. In Chicago's Cook County, a handful of 32,000 early voters claim machines switched their votes from Democrat to Republican. County officials later cited voter confusion and error. Similar events took place in parts of Texas and South Carolina. And in New Mexico, the state's computerized voter registration database crashed during the last hours of early voting this weekend, forcing those in line to write out a backup paper ballot or come back tomorrow. Well, both parties have armies of lawyers fanned out across the country, Katie, ready to file court challenges based on voting irregularities as they arise."

LATimes Says States Lack Safeguards For New Electronic Voting Machines. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, 918K) says in an editorial, "New voting machines, like new computers, are generally faster than old ones. But as every computer user knows, reliability is often more important than speed. And a lot depends on who's using the machine and how." After the "debacle with punch-card ballots in Florida six years ago, many counties across the country traded in their clunky old voting machines for high-tech models — many of which enable people to vote just by touching names on a video screen. The switch, "however, has drawn a new set of complaints. Some poll workers and computer scientists predict an election day plagued by long waits, glitches and miscounted votes. A more promising possibility is that, with the right equipment and procedures in place, electronic voting machines will deliver an unusually accurate and speedy count. Unfortunately, the experience this election day is sure to fall somewhere in between. A number of states lack the safeguards necessary to address the machines' vulnerabilities to glitches and tampering. And even in states with those safeguards, such as California, the integrity of the results will depend on voters taking extra steps to make sure everything works as it should."

WPost Says Concern Over Voting Machines Often Exaggerated. The Washington Post (11/7, 748K) editorializes, "Theories, many fanciful, abound about the ease of hacking into voting machines. There has been no evidence of that occurring, and the layers of scrutiny and security in force on Election Day cast doubt on whether experiments hatched in the privacy of a lab could be carried out in public. We support a verifiable paper trail to add a layer of safety and bolster public confidence. But there's a thin line between raising reasonable questions and persuading voters that there's no point in turning out."

Lynne Cheney Says Mainstream Media Lacks Political Diversity. Vice President Cheney's wife Lynne, during an appearance on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (11/6), commented, "We used to be told, and we have been told this time and again, that the political leanings of reporters didn't matter because they sought objectivity and tried to be fair and balanced. But statistics show this doesn't work. We have gone through a period, and we have seen this in the 2004 cycle, where the suggestion was made that you can't be fair and balanced. This was someone from ABC, you can't be fair and balanced because the Republicans deserved to be treated harshly. There is a real problem with a lack of diversity in news rooms as far as political opinions go."

Study Finds Network Iraq Stories Were Overwhelmingly Negative. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/7, Pierce) reports that James Q. Wilson, in City Journal, writes, "'Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30, 2005, nearly 1,400 stories appeared on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening news. More than half focused on the costs and problems of the war, four times as many as those that discussed the successes. About 40 percent of the stories reported terrorist attacks; scarcely any reported the triumphs of American soldiers and Marines. The few positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts."

Tierney Says Study Shows Media Outlet Ideological Slant. The New York Times' John Tierney (11/7) contends that "most journalists do try to be objective, but as a group they, too, can become polarized by spending most of their time talking to fellow journalists and experts with similar views. One of the cleverest demonstrations of this effect was a study published last year in Harvard's Quarterly Journal of Economics. The researchers, Tim Groseclose and Jeffrey Milyo, devised a scale for measuring the slant of news reports by keeping track of which think tanks — liberal or conservative — were quoted most often. The researchers found that The Washington Times and Brit Hume's evening newscast on Fox fell on the conservative side of the scale, while all the other news media outlets they studied fell on the liberal side. The surprising result — to liberals, at least — was that Fox was closer to the ideological center than the Big Three evening newscasts as well as all the major newspapers and newsweeklies."

Hillary Clinton Spends Heavily In Possible Prelude To 2008. The New York Times (11/7, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "has spent more money in the midterm election cycle than any other politician running for office this year, campaign finance records show, investing more than twice as much as most candidates in tight races across the country." Clinton "spent $29.5 million through the middle of October, according to the Federal Election Commission, suggesting that she may have her sights on a future national campaign. While much of the amount is devoted to television advertising, it is the bills for catering, flowers and photography that elevated her tally far above other Senate candidates'." Sen. Rick Santorum "spent $21.5 million through the same time period, records show," but "his spending report comprises bills like $30.33 at Papa John's pizza, $59.50 at Panera Bread and $74.34 at the Olive Garden." Clinton's campaign "reported sending a $6,585 check to Flutterbyes for flowers in Las Vegas, $5,397.50 to Le Petit Gourmet Catering in Glendale, Colo., and $80,000 to Tavern on the Green in Manhattan." Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner "said only a handful of Senate candidates had ever spent more. The spending patterns of the Clinton campaign demonstrated 'an extraordinary burn rate,' he said, which was particularly striking considering she did not seem to have a serious challenger in John Spencer, her Republican rival."

Cohen Says Clinton Is Boring. In his Washington Post column (11/7), Richard Cohen says, "In both theory and great expectations, today is the beginning of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. By nightfall she will have won lopsided reelection to the U.S. Senate, with plenty of money left over to start a presidential effort. She enjoys the sort of name recognition a president might envy and has the unalloyed good wishes of Democratic activists who have been waiting all these dark and awful years for a Clinton Restoration. After all, if the Bushes could do it -- one mediocre, the other incompetent -- then why not the brilliant and dazzling Clintons? The answer may be Hillary herself. She can bore a grateful nation. Such, anyway, was the effect of her recent appearance at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York." Given "who she is and, importantly, what she is -- smart, disciplined and, when she wants, charming -- there are those who say that this campaign is hers to lose. Last week she took a first step toward that goal."

Several Potential Candidates Hope To Parlay 2006 Campaign Stops Into 2008 Support. The Washington Post (11/7, A6, Murray, 748K) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, "who has barnstormed the country on behalf of Democratic gubernatorial and congressional candidates, is one of the A-list political celebrities of the 2006 campaign season. Other big draws: former president Bill Clinton, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani." The "headliners bring glitz to otherwise ho-hum rallies and help dazzle donors out of millions of dollars. They earn the gratitude of future officeholders and get to know thousands of voters." That gratitude is "all very useful, given that these non-candidates may run for president in two years -- or, as with Clinton, the non-candidate is married to a 2008 hopeful, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Giuliani's itinerary in the closing days included Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and South Carolina. All four states have Republican candidates on the ballot this year and will host crucial early primaries in 2008."

Libertarian Businessman Finds Success With Ballot Initiatives. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, Cooper, 2.03M) reports that while it "may turn out to be a bad year for Republicans," it may not be "for some of the conservative causes they support, thanks in part to a New York real-estate investor who has directed millions of dollars toward ballot initiatives to expand private-property rights, cut state budget growth, and impose term limits on judges." The "millionaire behind many ballot measures this year is Howard Rich, a publicity-shy, libertarian-leaning businessman who has become the go-to man for supporters of conservative ballot initiatives. The group Mr. Rich chairs, Americans for Limited Government, as well as a handful of other organizations that he fully controls or bankrolls, have put more than $15 million this election season into ballot campaigns in 14 states, public records show." Rich and "his supporters have sustained a number of setbacks, as many of his initiatives were kept from ballots because of vague wording or signature-gathering irregularities. But in nine states where the measures have survived, recent polling shows some chance of victory today."

Abortion Debate In South Dakota Regarded As "Remarkably Civil." In an op-ed for USA Today (11/7, 2.27M) Phillips Foundation fellow Laura Vanderkam writes, "South Dakota isn't usually a battleground state, but this fall, one of the country's most important political fights has been waged here. … In March, Gov. Mike Rounds signed a law that would ban almost all abortions within the state. Opponents countered by collecting enough signatures to put the issue on today's ballot as 'Referred Law 6.' The referendum's outcome doesn't matter. If the ban passes, it will be blocked in court. … What matters is that South Dakota's referendum represents one of the few times since 1973, when the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide, that voters have gotten to debate the question directly at the polls. And yes, debate is the right word. … South Dakotans have simply discovered that when you have to persuade your neighbors to join your cause — not judges in Washington — both sides become remarkably civil."

NYTimes Bemoans Proliferation Of Popular Initiatives. The New York Times (11/7, 1.21M) editorializes, "Ever since anti-taxation zealots in California rediscovered the populist frisson of the ballot initiative a generation ago, American politics has gone off on a binge of ballot proposals. Today is one of the busiest, with 81 citizen initiatives before voters in more than 20 states. Pity the poor voter who has to wade through a list of sometimes contradictory, sometimes misleading proposals, doing work that should be the responsibility of elected officials. … Scattershot initiative is no way to run a democracy; rebuke is no substitute for effective representation."

WSJournal Questions Spitzer's Ties To Casino Developer. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes that in a debate New York Attorney General Elliot Spitzer "was asked his position on bringing out-of-state Indian tribes to New York to open casinos." Spitzer said, "I don't believe out-of-state tribes should be here. And they won't be here under my administration." The Journal adds, "After the debate, however, someone must have tapped Mr. Spitzer on the shoulder and reminded him that one of his biggest campaign donors is Richard Fields, a casino developer who represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe that claims ancestral roots in the state and is seeking approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region. And so a few days later, according to the Albany Times Union, 'Darren Dopp, the AG's spokesman, said Spitzer isn't including the Stockbridge Munsee Band of Mohicans, the Oneida Tribe of Wisconsin or the Seneca-Cayuga Tribe of Oklahoma among the out-of-state tribes that won't be allowed to develop here.' Which leaves us wondering who is included. Companies operated by Mr. Fields have donated some $200,000 to the campaign of Mr. Spitzer, who also used the developer's Gulfstream jet (at a steep discount) to travel to fund-raisers until he was criticized for the practice."

Wisconsin Democrats Accused Of Creating "Phony" Campaign Finance Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "Watching television this election cycle, you may have noticed that 'campaign finance reform' hasn't made political ads any cleaner. You may also have surmised that money counts as much as ever; its sources and middlemen have merely been reshuffled. What 'reform' has done, however, is make it easier for incumbents to keep power, and a case study is the Wisconsin Governor's race. The challenger is GOP Congressman Mark Green, who has criticized Democratic incumbent Jim Doyle over his vetoes against tax relief, and has also kicked off a debate on education and tort reform. Or at least those were the issues until Mr. Doyle's allies used the campaign-finance laws to change the subject and create a phony scandal."

Effects Of Negative Advertising Examined. The Washington Post's David Broder (11/7) writes, "I know that the political consultants are convinced that 'going negative' is the only way to move the vote and win an election. But at some point you wish that the grown-ups in this country -- those who don't see elections as a profit-making business -- would remind these talented character assassins of the damage they are doing to the system of representative government that has served this nation so well."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/7, 1.21M) Barry Schwartz, a professor of psychology at Swarthmore College, writes, "Another national election season has come to an end — the sorriest, sleaziest, most disheartening and embarrassing in memory. The best one can hope for is a candidate who is a complete cipher. How has American electoral politics come to this? … The effort by each side to coat the opposition in slime has made many of us cynical, giving us the sense that our task is to reject the worst, not select the best. Nobody's any good, we think, but some are worse than others. Let's keep those candidates out of office. Our job becomes one of denying, not awarding, office."

Hamas-Fatah Talks Fail To Reach Unity Government. The New York Times (11/7, Myre, 1.21M) reports Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "failed Monday in their efforts to finalize a deal on a national unity government but planned to try again on Tuesday, aides said. … Mr. Abbas, who leads the secular Fatah movement, and Mr. Haniya, who leads the militant Islamic faction Hamas, seemed close to an agreement on a new Palestinian government that would be made up of professionals and technocrats not directly linked to either faction. The new government would seek to end the Palestinians' international isolation and win a restoration of Western assistance cut after Hamas came to power in the spring." Nabil Aburdeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, said, "There are issues to be discussed tomorrow and maybe the day after. We agreed on one thing: a national government of professionals will be coming." Meanwhile, Mustafa Barghouti said earlier on Monday that the sides had already reached an agreement "in principle."

Israeli Forces Begin Withdrawal From Gaza Town. The AP (11/7) reports that Israeli forces "pulled out of the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun before daybreak Tuesday, the military said, completing a weeklong sweep that killed more than 50 Palestinians. … The sweep came in from harsh international criticism because of the death toll and destruction. Israel said most of the dead were militants, but some were women and children. An Israeli soldier was also killed. On Monday, the sixth day of the sweep, at least seven Palestinians were killed, including a female suicide bomber."

Iran Seeks To Woo International Oil Companies. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, Jones, 2.03M) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is backing changes to foreign energy contracts and retaining moderates in key roles in a bid to woo crucial foreign investors, senior industry and Iranian government officials say. But it remains to be seen whether the new Iranian leadership is ready to give foreign players the kind of stable and lucrative contracts they are seeking." Iran's "standoff with the U.S. and its allies over Iran's nuclear program and Mr. Ahmadinejad's anti-Western rhetoric have intensified nervousness among foreign firms about investing there." Iran "needs roughly $50 billion in foreign investment during the next decade to reach energy-production targets to avoid losing market share to other members of [OPEC]. Oil companies face a delicate balancing act: While they want to avoid U.S. ire, they are pressured by Iranian officials to attest to a friendly Iranian investment climate."

OPEC President Says Further Output Cuts May Be Necessary. The Washington Post/AP (11/7, D06, Elfehaid) reports that oil prices rose by nearly $1 Monday after Nigerian oil minister and OPEC president Edmund Daukoru "said the oil cartel may need to cut its output further and as armed protesters shut down one of his country's oil facilities." Daukoru told reporters, "The market is clearly oversupplied, clearly oversupplied." The AP says, "Regarding OPEC's decision last month to cut production effective Nov. 1, he said the effects of the reduced output have yet to be seen but would be soon. Daukoru told reporters that when OPEC meets in December members will discuss production, 'but it looks as if some further mopping up will be necessary.'"

US Appears To Be Shifting Stance On ICC. Under the headline "A Shift In The Debate On International Court," the Washington Post (11/7, A16, Boustany, 748K) reports, "When then-Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton nullified the US signature on the International Criminal Court treaty one month into President Bush's first term, he declared it the happiest moment in his years of service." At the time, "The bipartisan concern then was that American service members deployed overseas risked exposure to a foreign tribunal," but now, "as the court prepares to begin public hearings on its first case, the debate among senior US military officials seems to be shifting away from staunch opposition, and a fresh assessment of the court seems to be underway." According to the Post, the "new attitude has been prompted in part by the court's record since it began operations three years ago; Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo, an Argentine, has dismissed hundreds of petitions for cases against the United States" due to "lack of evidence, lack of jurisdiction, or because of the United States' ability to conduct its own investigations and trials."

Panel Calls For Streamlining UN Programs. The AP (11/7, Lederer) reports that a "high-level panel" has "called for streamlining UN programs to fight poverty, provide humanitarian aid and protect the environment, saying competition among agencies often duplicates efforts and fails to deliver results," according to a final draft of its report. The draft, obtained Monday by The AP, said that while the UN "is an indispensable force," it has outgrown its post-World War II structure and "is not as effective as it could be." The panel established by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan found that "too often, authority and management responsibility is dispersed among individuals and across organizations, thus limiting accountability for performance and results," and "better cooperation between organizations has been hindered by competition for funding, by mission creep and by outdated business practices." It will be up to Ban Ki-Moon, who takes over as secretary-general on Jan. 1, "to decide whether to implement the panel's recommendations."

Selection Of US Nominee To UN Food Program Seen As Blow To Reform. The Financial Times (11/7, Nations) reports US Undersecretary of State Josette Sheeran "appears almost certain to be named as head of the UN World Food Programme on Tuesday, in a decision diplomats fear marks an early blow to reform promises by Ban Ki-moon, the incoming secretary-general. A UN official said that James Morris, the current head of the WFP, told senior staff at the weekend of the decision to appoint the US official candidate to a post traditionally viewed as a US fiefdom. The announcement, some diplomats believe, would be an indication that fledgling efforts to make appointments on technical merit have foundered. … According to a number of diplomats and officials, there had been early indications that another candidate—Tony Banbury, WFP's regional director for Asia and a former White House employee—had led on merit. While an American, he was not Washington's choice. But late last week it emerged that, following high-level US lobbying and consultations between [UN Secretary General Kofi] Annan and Mr Ban, the decision was made to go with the US government's official nominee."

The Washington Times (11/7, A1, Pisik, 88K) says Sheeran was chosen "from a short list, which was never formally announced but was said by Secretariat officials to have included WFP Asia director Tony Banbury, an American with ties to the Clinton White House; Swiss development minister Walter Fust; and Robert Fowler, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations. But the appointment of Miss Sheeran, the Bush administration's nominee, had been expected" because Washington "contributes about one-third of the WFP's $2.9 billion budget and often applies pressure to ensure its nominees are successful."

In Diplomatic Defeat For US, Ortega Set To Claim Victory In Nicaragua. The results of Sunday's presidential election in Nicaragua received prominent coverage on the front page of many of the nation's largest dailies, as well as coverage on two of the three network news broadcasts where the anticipated victory of former president Daniel Ortega was overwhelmingly seen as a diplomatic defeat for the US. ABC World News (11/6, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Daniel Ortega was the Marxist president in the 1980s. He was in a deadly civil war before voters swept him from office. But tonight, it appears he's returning to power. The winner of Nicaragua's presidential election, Ortega, claims he is no longer a revolutionary. But if elected, it would be a defeat for Washington, which opposed him."

The CBS Evening News (11/6, story 8, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Another old Washington nemesis the making a comeback. Remember Daniel Ortega? He was President of Nicaragua's Sandinista government in the 1980s and led the fight against the US backed rebels. Tonight he's apparently won an election to get his old job back. Ortega says he's no longer a Marxist, but don't expect congratulations from the White House. One of Ortega's big supporters is Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez."

In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/7, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports, "With 62 percent of precincts reporting, Ortega was comfortably leading the field of five presidential contenders with 39 percent of the vote, virtually ensuring him a first-round win under Nicaragua's electoral rules." The Post says Ortega's return to Nicaragua's presidency "would also constitute an embarrassing setback for the Bush administration. American officials have recently made thinly veiled threats that the United States would impose economic sanctions and other punitive measures if Ortega was reelected, arguing that Ortega has not changed despite his embrace of Catholicism, pronouncements in favor of a market economy and efforts to cast himself as the candidate of 'reconciliation.' US officials appeared motivated in part by concerns that Ortega would be an eager partner in pushing an anti-American alliance with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. Ortega's return is particularly galling to many in the Bush administration who devoted their careers to getting rid of him in the 1980s."

Also in a front page article, the New York Times (11/7, A1, McKinley, Replogle, 1.21M) says "an Ortega win in a five-way race would be a defeat for the Bush administration, which strongly opposed his election and worked hard to unite a fractious opposition against him with little success. The White House has said it would withdraw aid from an Ortega government." The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A6, de Cordoba, 2.03M) notes that Washington "actively campaigned against Mr. Ortega, in a kind of echo of the battles of the 1980s, when a US-backed rebel force known as the Contras battled Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government. The US ambassador staged a public campaign against Mr. Ortega and senior US officials said aid and investment could be sharply cut and the country would come to ruin if Mr. Ortega triumphed. Political analysts are sure to debate whether the US campaign backfired."

Under the headline "Ortega's Likely Return Seen As A Blow To US Policy," the Financial Times (11/7, Thomson) calls Ortega's likely victory "a blow for US foreign policy in central America," noting that "ever since Mr Ortega lost power to the centre-right Violeta de Chamorro in 1990, Washington has maneuvered to avoid his re-election. During this year's election campaign, Paul Trivelli, the US ambassador in Managua, has spoken out frequently to warn Nicaraguans of the perceived dangers of a Sandinista government. Recently Mr Trivelli also warned of Mr Ortega's growing friendship with Hugo Chávez, the oil-rich and anti-US Venezuelan president. In a recent interview with the Financial Times, Mr Trivelli even warned that an Ortega-led government would provoke significant changes to the currently healthy bilateral relationship." The Ambassador was quoted as saying, "The whole gamut of the relationship that I talked about between the US and Nicaragua would definitely be re-examined -- and not only by the executive or the State Department or the White House but by the US Congress." The AP (11/7, Carl), Los Angeles Times (11/7, Tobar, 918K) and USA Today (11/7, Llana, 2.27M) run similar reports.

Most Nations Decline In Corruption Ratings. The AP (11/7, Rising) reports, "Nearly three-quarters of 163 countries ranked in a new survey suffer from a perception of serious corruption, while in nearly half it is seen as rampant," according to Transparency International's 2006 Corruption Perceptions Index. The watchdog "gives the worst scores to many of the world's poorest countries, including almost all African nations, indicating a strong correlation between corruption and poverty. The stragglers also included several so-called 'failed states,' including Iraq, which dropped from place 137 last year to second-last as the situation there continues to deteriorate."

US Corruption Ranking Drops. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (11/7, Williamson) reports the US has suffered a "significant worsening" in its perceived levels of corruption "following a series of business scandals and increasing worries over political party funding," the index found. Huguette Labelle, head of the Berlin-based group, "said the reasons could include the greater awareness of corruption after the Enron and Worldcom business scandals, and growing concern in the US that private and business donations to politicians was having a corrupting influence on political affairs."

Rash Of Kidnappings Causes Alarm In Sri Lanka. In a front page article, the New York Times (11/7, A1, Sengupta, 1.21M) reports that a "rash of mysterious abductions has come to haunt" Sri Lanka amidst its "newly revived ethnic conflict." The Times says the kidnappings "contain eerie echoes of the horrors of a generation ago, when this island nation achieved notoriety for tens of thousands of disappearances." A "breakaway Tamil rebel faction" is "widely accused of being allied with the government and…of having a hand in the abductions." The government "denies having any link to the group, called the Karuna faction," but "despite the official denials, the abductions have spread a cloud over the administration of President Mahinda Rajapakse, including a recommendation by the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, to dispatch foreign monitors to investigate rights abuses here."

Stephens Urges US Action On Syrian Threats To Lebanon. Wall Street Journal (11/7, A13,

DOJ_NMG_0091389

2.03M) columnist Bret Stephens writes, "The White House issued a remarkable statement last Wednesday warning of 'mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government.'" At the same time, he notes that the "forthcoming report of former Secretary of State James Baker's Iraq Study Group…is rumored to urge the Bush administration to re-engage Damascus diplomatically. In recent days [Syrian President Bashar] Assad has been talking a blue streak about his willingness to make peace with Israel, a signal that he might be willing to play ball on that front and maybe in Iraq if only the Administration lets him have his way in Lebanon." Stephens says that "saving Lebanon will require focus, nerve and imagination, qualities hitherto absent from [Secretary Condoleezza] Rice's tenure at State. Maybe if her boss loses his majority in Congress, he'll be less inclined to let the remainder of his legacy go down the drain with it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DC Circuit To Consider Detainee Challenges. The New York Times (11/7, Lewis) reports, "The Bush administration's successful effort to have Congress eliminate the right of Guantánamo prisoners to challenge their detentions before federal judges is now moving toward what may be an epic battle in the courts. … And while lawsuits on the topic are spread across the judiciary, the principal battleground, legal experts say, is the federal appeals court in Washington. That court has been considering for three years whether the hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have the right of habeas corpus — that is, the ability to ask a federal judge to review the reasons for their detention. … But the law passed by Congress last month eliminating the habeas right supersedes almost all of the arguments that have gone before and is now the focus of the legal confrontation, government and civil liberties lawyers agree. In a ruling last June, the Supreme Court had said that an earlier measure did not eliminate habeas lawsuits that were already in the courts. However, in October, the administration used more explicit language, saying the new law retroactively blocked federal courts from entertaining habeas lawsuits by Guantánamo detainees." The Times adds, "The three-judge appeals court panel will have to decide whether the pending lawsuits brought by the 430 or so remaining detainees at Guantánamo should be thrown out, as the Bush administration has argued, or whether the new law is unconstitutional, as civil liberties groups have contended. … Whatever resolution is reached by the three appellate judges — David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, both appointees of Republican presidents, and Judith W. Rogers, appointed by a Democrat — it will almost certainly end up before the Supreme Court. A decision could come from the appeals court before the end of the year."

Liquid Restrictions Go Into Effect At EU Airports. The AP (11/6) reported rules went into effect across the European Union Monday limiting "passengers to carrying 100 milliliters (a fifth of a pint) of liquid per container on board planes. … All liquids — not only water and soft drinks but also soups, creams, lotions, oils, perfumes, sprays, gels, toothpaste and shaving cream — are subject to security checks before passengers board their planes. The containers must fit into a clear re-sealable plastic bag to be presented at security checkpoints, officials said." EU spokesman Ferran Tarradellas Espuny said over the weekend that EU airports must apply the regulation "to protect civil aviation against the threat of homemade liquid explosives."

Shaaban Held At Colorado's Supermax Prison. The AP (11/7) reports, "An Indiana truck driver convicted of plotting to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein is incarcerated at a federal super-maximum-security prison in Colorado under an order approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a report Monday said." The AP continues, "Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, of Greenfield, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on his conversations, restrict his access to news reports and prohibit anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him, The Indianapolis Star reported." The AP adds, "Shaaban is being held under an order known as a special administrative measure, which is meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security. … William Dazey Jr., a public defender who assisted Shaaban at his trial in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis earlier trial this year, said the order was unusual. … 'I have not seen evidence that would support the notion (Shaaban) is a threat to the United States,' Dazey said." The AP notes, "Among the other convicts held under similar conditions at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex about 90 miles south of Denver are Zacarias Moussaoui, the alleged '20th hijacker' in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and Richard Reid, who tried in December 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe on a Paris-to-Miami flight."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, DHS Working To Thwart Terror Recruiting In US Prisons. In a front-page story, USA Today (11/7, Hall, 2.27M) reports the FBI and DHS are "working with prisons in dozens of states to improve intelligence gathering and monitoring of inmates in a stepped-up campaign to curb homegrown terrorism behind bars. … Chief among the concerns is that radical Muslim clerics could have access to prisoners and coerce them with terrorist literature. 'It's a concern because we know that violent extremist groups will target people in prisons,' said Donald Van Duyn, the FBI's counterterrorism director." USA notes, "The intensified surveillance follows the recent arrests of people alleged to be home-grown terrorism suspects in London and Canada," and "Homeland Security officials…are worried that similar plots could be hatched in U.S. prisons. 'Prisons can be a breeding ground,' says Charles Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer."

British-Based Al Qaeda Agent Planned Attacks On US Targets. USA Today/AP (11/7, 10A, Stringer) reports, "An al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain planned to bomb the New York Stock Exchange and plotted a series of attacks on London, one to blow up a London subway train as it passed below the River Thames, prosecutors said at a sentencing hearing Monday. Dhiren Barot, 34, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic." Barot "and seven alleged accomplices spent more than four years making detailed plans to attack a host of financial industry targets in the USA." Prosecutor Edmund Lawson "said the group considered using a radioactive 'dirty bomb' and igniting a gasoline tanker to ram it into a high-profile British target. Lawson showed clips of a reconnaissance video shot in 2001 during a visit to New York by Barot. The shaky footage — shown on screens in the courthouse — zoomed in on the World Trade Center as an unseen man mimicked the sound of an explosion. Prosecutors said Barot did not have prior knowledge of the Sept. 11 terror attacks." The New York Times (11/7, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "The potential targets included…the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund in Washington…Citigroup in Manhattan and the Prudential building in Newark, prosecutors have said." The Washington Times/AP (11/7, Stringer) reports Barot "was born a Hindu in India, but was brought to Britain as a toddler. He converted to Islam when he was about 20, Mr. Lawson said."

FBI, ICE Agents Field Questions From NYC Muslim Youth. NY1 New York City (11/6) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast yesterday, "Muslim students put FBI and immigration officials on the hot seat Sunday at a taping in Queens of a well known Pakistani talk show," hosed by Hamid Mir. "NY1 Criminal Justice reporter Solana Pyne was there as a panel answered questions about everything from FBI training to the success of the war on terror. … 'Are FBI agents or other government officials trained, or getting trained to learn more about Islam?' asked one student in attendance. … 'FBI Agents can't all look like me,' said FBI special agent, Andrew Arena. 'They can't all be white guys. We have got to diversify and that's very, very important. We train our agents from day one in the academy to understand the Muslim faith.'" NY1 noted, "In the last few years, FBI and immigration officials have held several meetings with members of the city's Muslim communities," but "the event Sunday evening was unusual, not only because it included Muslim leaders from across the country, but also because it was the first with Muslim teens and young adults. … Hundreds of students attended the event, and as to how successful it was, well, it depends on who was asked."

Holiday Travelers Urged To Review TSA Rules. The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Marks, 58K) reports, "Planes are expected to be fuller, prices higher, and security lines longer than ever" this holiday season. In addition to the fact that "major airlines have cut back on the number of planes flying" in order to increase profits, "there are those vaunted Transportation Security Administration security checks - the other major reason experts are urging travelers to get to the airport as early as possible." Holiday travelers who usually don't fly "may be confused about what the TSA will and will not allow on board." The Monitor gives a brief description of the agency's rules and adds that they are detailed at www.tsa.gov, "a must-see for anyone who hasn't flown in recent months. 'To make it more understandable to people we've launched a campaign called 3-1-1,' says Ellen Howe, a TSA spokeswoman. 'It's a reminder of three ounces or less, one quart-sized bag, one bag per traveler, and that bag needs to be pulled out of your carry-on and placed into the bin.'"

USA Today (11/7, Adams, 2.27M) reports that if Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson International, the USA's busiest airport, "is any sign, it could be a tough season when the volume of travelers soars later this month for Thanksgiving. Willie Williams, federal security director at Hartsfield-Jackson, says screening there is running as much as 30% slower than before the liquids ban. … Airline officials say lines have increased at almost every sizable airport. But at certain airports, high volumes of less-experienced leisure travelers, combined with the physical layout, give rise to extraordinary problems." Despite the TSA's national education campaign, Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas McCarran, says he thinks "'this holiday season will be problematic.' Airports nationally 'will be getting a lot of people who haven't traveled since all this happened, and they won't have a clue.'"

Understanding Of Security Rules Said To Place Passengers In Specific Categories. USA Today (11/7, Yu, 2.27M) reports from Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson International, where passengers "fall into distinct categories" based on their understanding of carry-on restrictions. "Some understand in detail what the government now requires to clear security checkpoints under rules changes implemented in August and revised in September. Others? Not so much." USA Today goes on to describe three categories: The Initiated, The Uninitiated and The Big Picture People, those who have a "general notion of the rules," but are less clear on specifics. The article frequently notes the TSA's efforts to make passengers aware of carry-on rules, but concludes by quoting David Vernon, a "Big Picture" person, who says the "whole liquid thing is annoying. I didn't even notice the signs. And (even if I did), I probably wouldn't have read it."

WAR NEWS:

Khalilzad To Resign Iraq Post In Coming Months. The AP (11/7, Gearan) reports, "Zalmay Khalilzad, the plainspoken dealmaker and Republican insider who has won praise and criticism for attempts to broker Sunni political participation in Iraq's fragile government, is likely to quit his post as US ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior Bush administration official said Monday." Khalilzad "has been a public face of Bush administration attempts to project both willingness to change strategy or tactics in an unpopular war and solidarity with the increasingly fractious Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki." Khalilzad's departure "has been rumored for months, but he has not turned in his resignation, the State Department official said." The official "spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes. Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year, but is more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said."

The Financial Times (11/7, Negus), at the end of an interview with Khalizad, report US officials "said the envoy would probably return to an academic or private sector job in the US. His replacement may be Ryan Crocker, who is ambassador to Pakistan."

Newspapers For US Military Personnel Urge Rumsfeld To Resign. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 7, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Four newspapers produced by the Gannett newspaper chain for US military personnel are running an editorial saying Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld must go. It's time for him to resign, the editorial says, because he has lost credibility with top military officers. The paper's editor denies the timing is at all political but the White House is calling this piece, shabby, inaccurate and grandstanding."

Rumsfeld To Be Introduced By Commentator Who Called For His Resignation. The Washington Times' "Inside the Beltway" (11/7, McCaslin) reports the American Spectator's Robert L. Bartley dinner's master of ceremonies "will no doubt be a bit uncomfortable when introducing the keynote speaker. That master of ceremonies would be myriad-hat wearer Ben Stein, and the keynote address will be delivered by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Inside the Beltway can't help but recall Mr. Stein, in his 'CBS Sunday Morning' commentary barely one week ago pointing out that the situation in Iraq has become so difficult that if he were still a White House speechwriter…this is what he would suggest President Bush announce today: … 'I have this morning accepted Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's resignation with sincere thanks for his service to the nation. Despite his flaws, he is a great American. He will be replaced by a truly heroic American, Senator John McCain of Arizona.'"

Iraqi Appeals Court To Rule On Saddam Death Sentence By Mid-January. The AP (11/7, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on Saddam Hussein's guilty verdict and death sentence by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said Monday, setting in motion a possible execution by mid-February. If the ruling is upheld, The Associated Press has learned that Iraq's three-man presidential council is pledged to allow Saddam's hanging to take place." The execution "must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision." The AP also reports, "The surge in violence expected immediately after Sunday's verdict did not happen. The Interior Ministry credited a round-the-clock curfew in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces."

All three networks ran stories on the aftermath of the verdict. CBS Evening News (11/6, story 7, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The former dictator could be hanged early next year and those who still support him are furious." CBS (Logan) added, "Once again, Iraqi streets echoed with the sound of his name. A cry of anger from Iraq's Sunnis who see in Saddam's guilty sentence their own loss of power and protection. In court Sunday, the defiant dictator tried his best to drown out the judgment. 'Go to hell, you and the court,' he yelled."

NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 8, 2:35, Engel, 9.87M) said that at the beginning of the trial "Saddam had an animal charisma that was frightening. He dominated the courtroom, taking notes, laughing, bullying witnesses, insulting the judges. … As he was sentenced to death Sunday, I saw his eyes again. Now flat, lifeless, defeated."

ABC World News (11/6, story 6, 2:10, McCarthy, 8.78M) said the verdict against Saddam "split Iraqis but was also a warning to other strongmen in the region." Salama Ahmed Salama, Egyptian columnist: "In the Arab world, never it hasn't had any tradition of holding their leaders to account."

Rice Touts Saddam Verdict As Evidence Rule Of Law Is Strong In Iraq. Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume) reported Secretary of State Rice "said the guilty verdict delivered to Saddam Hussein and the death sentence is evidence that the rule of law is strong in Iraq and that Saddam will be punished for his crimes." Fox added, "On the day after the sentence was announced more noisy demonstrations in Iraq but no surge of deadly violence that many had feared."

European Leaders, Rights Groups Criticize Sentence. The New York Times (11/7, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "European politicians on Monday spoke out against the death sentence for Saddam Hussein. Arab officials and commentators derided what they said was a flawed and politicized trial, while for the first time broadly acknowledging Mr. Hussein's crimes." Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, "speaking to reporters on Monday, said he opposed the death penalty for Mr. Hussein, joining several other European leaders and European Union officials who announced their opposition to the sentence. When pressed by reporters, Mr. Blair spoke of his longstanding opposition to capital punishment. He said he did not intend to protest the sentence, and condemned Mr. Hussein's brutality." The Times adds, "European leaders insisted that the viciousness of the actions of which Mr. Hussein was found guilty had not changed their view that state-sponsored killing was wrong. Some warned that executing Mr. Hussein would only worsen the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq." Amnesty International said "it 'deplored' Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as 'deeply flawed and unfair.'"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, 918K) editorializes, "Even critics of the US invasion that brought him down acknowledge that his rule was not just brutal but bestial. Holding him accountable for his crimes is a matter of simple (if rough) justice." But "it will be a 'milestone' for the rule of law in Iraq only if Sunnis can be convinced that the new order in their country isn't as unjust as the old one."

Attorney and law professor Alan Dershowitz writes in the Wall Street Journal (11/7, A12, 2.03M), "The Nuremberg trials it is not. But then again, Saddam Hussein is no Hitler or Goering." Dershowitz adds "perfect justice is an illusion," and Saddam, "this exemplar of perfect injustice," has been "subjected to imperfect justice. The result is satisfying, and should serve as an object lesson to the many dictators who continue to terrorize their people and others in the expectation that they will never be brought to justice.

Anne Applebaum writes in the Washington Post (11/7, 748K), "It is true that the execution of Hussein, if and when it occurs, could well have a positive effect on Iraqi politics. If nothing else, it will eliminate once and for all the Baathist dream of a Hussein-led revanche -- a dream that even Hussein himself appears to have cherished; witnesses say he was genuinely surprised by the verdict and was shaking afterward. But his death will also probably put an end to this truth-telling project, one that has been unique and unprecedented in the Arab world. For the first time, an Arab dictator was held accountable for crimes against his people." Applebaum concludes, "Thanks to American incompetence in Iraq, it may be the last time for a long time, too."

Baathists May Be Allowed To Return To Government Jobs. USA Today/AP (11/7) reports, "A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to die, the Iraqi government declared a major concession Monday to the Sunni Arabs who backed him. The action could result in thousands of purged members of Saddam's party being reinstated in their jobs. … The political concession was detailed by the government organization that had been charged with removing Saddam loyalists from state institutions. Under a draft law, the organization would amend its rules to enable former Baath Party members to regain their jobs." The Washington Times (11/7, 88K) runs a similar AP story.

The Washington Post (11/7, A17, Anderson, 748K) reports, "Ali al-Lami, executive director of the Supreme National Commission for de-Baathification, said in an interview that the commission had drafted a law for parliament that would give 1.5 million former Baathists who 'excommunicate' themselves from the party the option of returning to their former government jobs or drawing a pension for their past employment." Other estimates "have put the number of purged Baathists in the tens of thousands; the figures could not be reconciled."

57 Iraqis Charged With Prison Abuse. In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/7, Raghavan, 748K) reports, "-- Iraq's Interior Ministry has charged 57 employees, including high-ranking officers, with human rights crimes for their roles in the torture of hundreds of detainees once jailed in a notorious eastern Baghdad prison known as Site 4 ... The charges marked the first time the present Iraqi government has taken criminal action against members of its own security forces for operating torture chambers inside Interior Ministry prisons, said Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman." The charges come after previous stonewalling by Shiite officials who "have said such accusations are exaggerations, branding them attempts by Sunnis to discredit the Shiite-led government." The Post continues, "It remains to be seen whether [Interior Minister] Bolani, a Shiite and an engineer by training, can take on senior figures in his ministry who are suspected of links to Shiite militias. Many are left from the days of his predecessor, Bayan Jabr, who many Sunnis allege turned the ministry into his own Shiite fiefdom and a haven for the militias."

Third Marine Pleads Guilty In Iraq Murder Case. The New York Times (11/7, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports, "A marine corporal pleaded guilty on Monday in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi in April, the third person charged in the case to do so." Lance Cpl. Tyler Jackson "received reduced charges of aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice" by plea bargaining. Military law experts "say the number of deals in the Hamdaniya case and the rapid legal proceedings are somewhat unusual," with law professor and former Marine prosecutor Gary Solis saying, "At some point, a prosecutor has to prosecute." One defendant's lawyer, Jane Siegel, theorized that the command was interested in "expediting the process and saving ... a lot of money."

The AP (11/6, Watkins) reports, "Jackson, who has been in military prison since May, spoke only to confirm his identity and attorneys' names and say he understood his rights."

Balad "Massacre" Recalled. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Daragahi, 918K) reports in a 2,515-word front page article, "There were no heroes here. When gunmen murdered dozens of people in this once peaceful Shiite market city over two days last month, no one stepped in to stop the killing. Not U.S. forces, whose stated purposes in Iraq include preventing all-out civil war. Not the Iraqi security forces, who mostly turned a blind eye to the massacre. Not the people of Balad, who allowed decades of fear and hatred to overwhelm their better instincts." The Times reports the unfolding of the violence and how "the U.S. military monitored events from its base just outside Balad, where its role in policing conflicts has become increasingly marginal," stunning the locals. The Times speculates, "But perhaps U.S. soldiers — consciously or unconsciously — do make a grim calculation that benefits them. Sunni insurgents in the countryside attack American troops as well as Shiites. By contrast, Shiite gunmen often welcome Americans to their towns and primarily target young Sunni men suspected of being insurgents."

Pakistani Support For Islamists Seen As Fading. The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Montero, 58K) reports after the bombing of the suspected Pakistani madrassah, "hundreds of miles away, in the cosmopolitan cities of Karachi, Lahore, and Islamabad, relative silence has prevailed. The difference in response is telling, observers say. It underscores not only an important gap in understanding between the tribal areas and the rest of the country - a gulf that helps keep the area underdeveloped and prone to extremism - but an erosion of the Islamist parties' power on the national stage." Many of the religious parties "have slowly cozied up in recent months to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's military regime. Such compromises have ultimately undermined their claims to independent credentials, analysts point out. That's perhaps one reason why last week's calls for nationwide strikes were dismissed as pure political play."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

5th Circuit Panel Rejects Challenge To Lay Conviction Erasure. The Houston Chronicle (11/7, Hays) reports, "An appeals court panel has slapped down an Enron shareholder's challenge of a judge's decision to erase former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's criminal convictions." The Chronicle continues, "The three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused to order U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston to reverse his October ruling that cleared Lay's name because the ex-chairman died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal." The Chronicle adds, "The appeal panel's ruling, issued last week, reiterated what Lake said in his decision: Legal precedent says that 'when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed.' … That is how all such situations are to be addressed unless the law is changed by Congress, the U.S. Supreme Court or by the full 5th Circuit, the panel ruled." The Chronicle notes, "Russell P. Butler, the shareholder who challenged Lake's ruling, said he would appeal the panel's decision to the Supreme Court. … 'I think we have a good chance,' said Butler, who said he lost $8,000 when the disgraced company collapsed nearly five years ago."

Former Homestore Official Sentenced For Securities Fraud. Inman News (11/7, Roberts) reports, "Peter Tafeen, a former Homestore executive who pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud for his participation in a fraudulent advertising scheme, today was sentenced to serve 30 months in federal prison. … Tafeen was also sentenced to three years of supervised release following the prison sentence, and six months of the supervised release program must be served in home confinement." Inman continues, "Tafeen, who faced a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, served as executive vice president of business development at Homestore from 1997 to November 2001. Homestore, which has operated Realtor.com and other property-search Web sites, this year re-branded as Move Inc. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said, 'The sentence … was very fair and it reflected both Tafeen's involvement in the crime and his assistance in cooperating with the government during (Stuart) Wolff's trial.'" Inman adds, "Brian J. Hennigan, a lawyer for Tafeen who is a partner at Los Angeles law firm Irell & Manella LLP, said that Tafeen, who is currently out on bond, will report to prison Jan. 8. The judge, he said, has recommended that Tafeen serve his prison sentence in a Pensacola, Fla.-area prison near Tafeen's home. … As part of a plea agreement announced in March, Tafeen had agreed to testify against his former boss, Stuart Wolff, who was chief executive of Homestore during the accounting scandal. Tafeen had faced similar charges to Wolff before entering into the plea agreement, which came a few weeks before his trial was scheduled to begin."

US Had Tough Challenge In McKesson Prosecution. The California Recorder (11/7, Scheck) reports, "The securities fraud trial against the former CEO and general counsel of HBOC -- now McKesson Corp. -- was never an easy one for the government. … The government's central witnesses were snitches of questionable credibility -- so much so that prosecutors declined to bring one key witness to the stand. … And in an earlier bench trial of another executive, a judge found their testimony was not credible enough to convict. … So it wasn't terribly surprising Friday when a jury acquitted former CEO Charles McCall and ex-GC Jay Lapine of conspiring to commit securities fraud while deadlocking on six other counts." The Recorder adds, "That's not to say it didn't hit the lawyers involved like a sack of bricks: There were tears on both sides, most notably from Theodore Wells Jr., the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who represented McCall in the six-week trial. … 'I've been living in a hotel in San Francisco since August the 14th working, truly, 20-hour days,' Wells told a group of reporters outside the courtroom. 'The fact that I was emotional, given the circumstances, is entirely understandable.'" The Recorder notes, "Mark Topel of Topel & Goodman, who argued Lapine's case, was similarly relieved after the acquittal and U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins' subsequent declaration of a mistrial on the other counts. … Topel said he saw the case as one in which the people who admitted to the conspiracy -- a brace of lower-ranking executives who entered guilty pleas -- couldn't be trusted when it came to fingering higher-ups. … He pointed to prosecutors' decision to not take testimony from Jay Gilbertson, the company's CFO who in 2003 pleaded guilty to being involved in the fraud scheme which misstated billions of dollars in earnings. Gilbertson blamed it on Lapine and McCall, and was seen as potentially being the key witness before the trial started."

Federal Reserve Warns Traders About Illicit Bond Activity. The Washington Post (11/7, D01, Henderson) reports, "The Federal Reserve put traders on notice yesterday that it is scrutinizing activity in the bond market, highlighting recent concerns that some traders may have made illicit profits by manipulating securities prices." The Post continues, "Dino Kos, executive vice president of the markets group at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, led an hour-long discussion of such concerns yesterday with representatives of the bank's 22 primary dealers -- the banks and securities firms that trade Treasury securities with the central bank." The Post adds, "The Fed meets with its dealers periodically to discuss market issues, but this was the first session devoted to suspicions at the Treasury Department about possible manipulation of the market for government bills, notes and bonds, and for futures contracts and other financial contracts linked to the securities. … The government's concerns were detailed in a Sept. 27 speech by James Clouse, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for federal finance. He described ways in which traders could control the supply of highly sought Treasury securities, driving up their prices. Such practices enable traders to borrow money at low interest rates and then invest it at higher rates to earn a profit."

Virginia Set To Execute Man For Slaying Of Bank Guard. The AP (11/7, Gelineau) reports, "Attorneys for a man scheduled to be executed Thursday for the 1999 slaying of a bank security guard have appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court and say his life should be spared because a prosecutor withheld information about a key witness." The AP continues, "John Yancey Schmitt, 33, is set to die by injection at Greensville Correctional Center in Virginia for the fatal shooting of 39-year-old Earl Shelton Dunning during a bank robbery. … In their petition to the Supreme Court and in a clemency petition to Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, Schmitt's attorneys criticize prosecutor Warren Von Schuch's actions, which they say could have influenced the jury's decision to recommend a death sentence. In the clemency petition, they also argue the shooting of Dunning was accidental." The AP notes, "Von Schuch said there was no prosecutorial misconduct, and described the killing as cold-blooded and clearly premeditated. … 'The court found that we did nothing wrong,' Von Schuch said. 'This is simply defense attorneys misrepresenting the truth to the public.'"

Jeffs Supporters Continue Expansion Of South Dakota Compound. The AP (11/7) reports, "A compound reportedly occupied by members of polygamist leader Warren Jeffs' sect continues to expand southwest of Pringle, South Dakota, even though Jeffs is behind bars in southern Utah. … Private investigators have said they believed the Pringle compound was among places Jeffs had hidden while he was on the run, but state and federal authorities said they could not confirm that." Custer County Equalization Director Les Struble "said one or two lodges a year have been built on the gated compound. The lodges are each about 3,000 square feet, with large kitchens and living rooms, plus separate bedrooms and bathrooms."

FBI Says Texas Man Faces Federal Charges In Kidnap-For-Ransom. The El Paso Times (11/7, Fonce-Olivas) reports, "Noe Guadalupe Ochoa, 20, of Sunland Park is facing five separate charges stemming from the May 4 kidnapping at gunpoint of a 16-year-old El Paso boy, whose identity was withheld because he is minor, Federal Bureau of Investigations spokeswoman Agent Andrea Simmons said." The Times notes, "An FBI investigation revealed that the teenager was taken from outside his home and held for ransom in Juárez. The day after he disappeared he was rescued by FBI agents and the Chihuahua state police anti-kidnapping unit. The teenager was found unharmed and in a car in Juárez near the Paso del Norte Bridge, where a ransom was supposed to be delivered." KFOX-TV El Paso (11/6) reported on its Web site, "Ochoa now faces charges including kidnapping a minor, using a firearm in a crime of violence, and possession and conspiracy to distribute marijuana."

Montana Murder Among Unsolved Cases FBI Investigating For Duncan Link. The AP (11/7) reports, "The FBI is investigating whether convicted murderer and sex offender Joseph Edward Duncan III might be involved in the slaying of a Montana teenager found dead in North Dakota four years ago. 'We're a long way from saying he's a suspect, but it's certainly a case we're reviewing,' said Donald Robinson, an FBI supervisor in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho." Russell Turcotte "was 19 when he disappeared in July 2002," and Duncan "was living in Fargo when Turcotte disappeared." The AP notes, "Robinson said the FBI is putting together a timeline on Duncan's whereabouts dating back to the early 1990s. 'Every single day Mr. Duncan was out of custody, we're looking at where he was -- and we're looking at all sorts of unsolved crimes,' Robinson said."

Dallas Woman Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud. The AP (11/7) reports, "A Dallas woman who pleaded guilty to defrauding the Federal Emergency Management Agency of $80,000 through false claims for Hurricane Katrina benefits was sentenced Monday to nearly six years in prison. U.S. District Judge David C. Godbey sentenced Lakietha Diann Hall, 35, to 70 months in prison. She was ordered to pay $83,254 in restitution." The AP notes, "Hall was accused of leading a scam in which she submitted online claims for disaster and unemployment assistance on behalf of several of the other defendants, falsely stating that their primary homes were in areas devastated by Katrina and that the hurricane caused them to lose their jobs. All of Hall's co-defendants have pleaded guilty."

Connecticut Businessman Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges. The Hartford Courant (11/1, 195K) reported in "Local Briefing" that "the owner of an East Windsor mail consolidation business pleaded guilty Tuesday to mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said." Thomas J. Rueli, "who owned Total Logistics Services Inc., was charged with establishing a line of credit with a commercial lender of up to $12 million based on fraudulently inflated account data. He was also accused of paying bribes to another business owner and conspiring not to report the transactions to the IRS, O'Connor said in a statement."

Utah Man Snared In Nationwide Sting Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charge. The Deseret Morning News (11/7) reports, "A La Verkin man is facing a mandatory five-year prison sentence after admitting to downloading dozens of images of child pornography off the Internet." Terence D. William "appeared in U.S. District Court on Monday to enter a guilty plea to one count of receiving child pornography. William was arrested and charged last August as part of a nationwide sting on a Web site based out of Orlando, Fla., that sold images of child pornography. The federal investigation netted more than 125 people who allegedly subscribed to the Web site, including three Utah men." The Morning News notes that "William admitted to downloading between 10 and 150 images of children engaged in sexual acts."

Texas Prosecutor Under Probe For Soliciting Sex From Teen Kills Himself. The New York Times (11/7, Eaton) reports from Terrell, TX, "A prosecutor in this North Texas town killed himself Sunday as the police tried to arrest him on charges of soliciting sex over the Internet from a person he thought was a 13-year-old boy." The Times continues, "The prosecutor, Louis Conradt Jr., 56, had been caught in a sting operation set up by Dateline NBC, the television news magazine, and an Internet watchdog group called Perverted Justice. An NBC camera crew was outside the house to film the scene when the fatal shot was fired. … Mr. Conradt had refused to open the door when police officers arrived at his house, where he lived alone, said Sgt. Snow Robertson of the Police Department in Murphy, a nearby town where officers said Mr. Conradt intended to meet the boy he thought he had communicated with. … Officers eventually forced their way into the house, only to find that Mr. Conradt had shot himself in the head with a small-caliber semi-automatic handgun, Sergeant Robertson said. Mr. Conradt died later at Parkland Hospital in Dallas." The Times adds, "Police officers from Murphy had gone to the house with a tactical team and two officers from Terrell to serve a warrant for Mr. Conradt's arrest. One of the officers from Terrell knew Mr. Conradt from his work as a prosecutor, Sergeant Robertson said. … Mr. Conradt had been a district attorney in Kaufman County and was the chief felony assistant district attorney in Rockwall County at the time of his death. … The police planned to search his computer and his house, Sergeant Robertson said. … The sergeant's department had been working with Perverted Justice and NBC News in a sting operation singling out people who solicit sex from children."

Series Of Deaths In Wisconsin City Puzzles Authorities. The Washington Post (11/7, A03, Gutsche) reports from La Crosse, WI, "At night the Mississippi River here is black like pavement. Lights brighten the shoreline, where walkways end with a steep drop at the river's edge. There is no railing. Even to a familiar eye, the river looks like an empty parking lot. … This is where eight young men have apparently drowned in the past nine years, just blocks from the busy downtown bar district where many victims had been reported seen last. The latest victim was found in October." The Post continues, "Officials from the city and the three colleges and universities here -- as well as a group of vocal college students -- say the men became intoxicated and accidentally fell into the river. … Yet as the number of fatalities grows, so does the idea that a serial killer could be loose." The AP adds, "All of the victims were young, athletic, and either visiting La Crosse or attending college in the city. Toxicology results have indicated that almost all had high levels of alcohol in their systems when they died. … Still, the similarities among the apparent drowning victims have many concerned that the students are being stalked -- lured into the black waters by a female posing as a police officer or a man wielding a gun, locals say. … While the idea of a serial killer is gaining credence in some quarters of La Crosse, other residents say the explanation is merely a way to deflect attention from the criticism that city and college officials are not working hard enough to crack down on underage drinking or to secure the waterline from accidental drownings."

Cities Cracking Down On Jury Duty No-Shows. USA Today (11/7, Parker) reports, "The murder trial in the shootings that left five people dead at Pato's Place Bar was the biggest in the history of Tulare, Calif. However, when the judge in the case tried to pick a jury, only 160 of 500 people summoned to jury duty showed." USA continues, "The shortage of jury candidates delayed last year's trial of Donald and Timothy Young, brothers charged with capital murder. It also prompted court officials in Tulare, a city of 52,000 between Fresno and Bakersfield, to revamp the jury system in July." USA adds, "Tulare is among dozens of communities across the USA that are punishing no-show jury candidates. … 'We were down to a 50% response rate. That is simply not acceptable,' says Tulare County Superior Court Judge Lloyd Hicks. … Tulare jury candidates who fail to show are warned that they could be found in contempt of court. If they do not respond, a second letter is sent, warning that a warrant will be issued for their arrest, Hicks says. … No one keeps national figures on jury duty no-shows, but the American Judicature Society considers the problem an epidemic in some communities, especially large urban areas such as Miami, Houston and Atlanta, where no-show rates routinely top 50%, says David McCord, a society spokesman."

Abortion Clinics Seek Probe Of Bill O'Reilly's Access To Kansas Records. The AP (11/7, Hanna) reports, "Two abortion clinics asked the state's highest court Monday to investigate Attorney General Phill Kline and Fox television's Bill O'Reilly over O'Reilly's statements that he had information from Kansas abortion records." The clinics' attorneys "want the Kansas Supreme Court to seize records that Kline, an outspoken abortion opponent, obtained on 90 of the clinics' patients. Kline received edited versions of the records from a district judge on Oct. 24 after arguing he wanted to review the records for evidence of possible crimes including rape and illegal abortions." The attorneys "asked the court to appoint a special prosecutor to determine whether O'Reilly's information came from the records turned over to Kline."

House Democrat's Challenge To Budget Bill Dismissed. The AP (11/7) reports, "A federal judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit filed by U.S. House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion budget bill because the House and Senate did not approve identical versions." The AP continues, "House Democrats accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush in February. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, sued in April along with 10 other House members to prevent the law from being implemented." The AP adds, "The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1. … When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months. The lawsuit said the oversight amounted to an additional $2 billion in spending, and the plaintiffs claimed that because they never had the chance to vote on the version signed into law, the law was invalid." The AP notes, "The Department of Justice had sought the lawsuit's dismissal, claiming the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment and were not in 'any way personally affected or injured.'"

Supreme Court To Consider Partial Birth Abortion Case On Wednesday. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Savage, 918K) reports whether the partial birth procedure, "known medically as dilation and extraction or D&X, will be legal comes before the Supreme Court on Wednesday, the day after the midterm elections." With "two new Bush appointees on the court — one replacing a justice who supported abortion rights," abortion opponents "are optimistic that, for the first time, the court will uphold an outright ban on an abortion method. The campaign against the procedure has succeeded where other attacks on abortion failed." By "branding it gruesome and unnecessary," opponents "won broad support for a criminal ban, even from lawmakers who usually vote in support of abortion rights." A win for "abortion foes would chip away at the court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which held that women have a constitutional right to an abortion. Those fighting a ban argue that the disputed procedure is sometimes the safest method for aborting a fetus in midterm and, despite the attention it receives, is not commonly used."

CNN.com (11/7, Mears) reports, "The morning after the closely fought midterm elections, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear its first major abortion case in six years. … The hot-button issue has been debated for years among social and religious activists, voters and judges themselves." CNN continues, "At issue in Wednesday's arguments is the constitutionality of a federal law banning a specific late-term procedure its critics call 'partial-birth' abortion. … After Justice Samuel Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor this year, court watchers have been waiting for a pair of cases to signal whether the court is shifting to the right." CNN adds, "For a quarter of a century, O'Connor, the first woman on the high court, was a key swing vote upholding the basic right to abortion. The views of Alito, a more conservative jurist, could prove crucial in the new debate. So, too, could the views of moderate-conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, who takes O'Connor's place as the key swing vote. … Even with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts joining the bench in recent months, many legal scholars say the outcome is far from clear. … Three federal appeals courts have ruled against the government, saying the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 is unconstitutional because it does not provide a 'health exception' for pregnant women facing a medical emergency. … The federal law has never gone into effect, pending the outcome of nearly three years of legal appeals."

The National Law Journal (11/7, Coyle) reports, "In weighing the constitutionality of a federal law, the U.S. Supreme Court sometimes gives deference to congressional findings of fact. How will it view the critical finding at the heart of its latest abortion challenge?" The Journal continues, "The justices this week will hear arguments in two cases testing the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. Partial-birth abortion is a term used for an abortion procedure, intact dilation and extraction, infrequently used in second-trimester pregnancies. … Although the high court's abortion precedents and the future of a woman's right to choose abortion will dominate discussions, the cases also are very much about separation of powers and the roles of the legislative and judicial branches in making and interpreting laws, say scholars on both sides." The Journal notes, "In enacting the 2003 law, Congress made explicit findings in the statute that partial-birth abortion 'is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother.' A health exception to abortion restrictions has been central to the court's abortion jurisprudence since the landmark Roe v. Wade. The lack of such an exception was a key basis for a 5-4 majority's decision to strike down a Nebraska partial-birth abortion law, very similar to the federal law, just six years ago. Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914. … In the 2003 law, Congress criticizes Stenberg and the findings of the trial judge that gave rise to the Stenberg high court case. The federal lawmakers call for a 'high degree' of deference to their own findings, a call echoed by the Bush administration and its supporters in briefs defending the federal law. … But opponents contend that that type of deference is not due because Congress did not engage in neutral fact-finding. A fundamental right, requiring heightened court scrutiny and independent review of congressional findings, is at issue, and two district judges, in extensive trials in the two cases, made findings contrary to those of Congress."

DOJ To Monitor Polls In 22 States. The AP (11/7, Jordan) reports, "Federal poll watchers will be in 22 states Tuesday, safeguarding against fraud or discrimination in election districts marked by tight races, large numbers of minority voters and faulty ballot machines." The AP continues, "Justice Department monitors and observers are being assigned to Cuyahoga County, Ohio, which has been dogged by problems with computerized touch-screen voting machines. They will be in Bergen County, N.J., a must-win prize for both candidates in the state's Senate race. … And they will watching more than a dozen counties nationwide where polls are on American Indian reservations and in big cities dominated by black voters." The AP adds, "In all, the Justice Department is sending an estimated 850 poll watchers to 69 cities and counties — what officials on Monday called an unprecedented number, and twice as many during the 2002 congressional midterm elections. … The government has dispatched poll watchers to ensure fair elections since the 1965 Voting Rights Act was enacted. … Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, who heads the Justice Department's civil rights programs, told reporters last week that the election districts were selected in part because of close races there. … They include Fort Bend and Galveston counties in Texas, where Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is seeking to keep a GOP hold on the seat vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Texas Democrats have accused Sekula-Gibbs of twice entering early voting locations — which is prohibited by law — to introduce herself to voters and workers."

CNN.com (11/7, Frieden) reports, "After weeks of considering requests for a federal presence, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Civil Rights Division lawyers decided to send 850 poll watchers to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states." CNN continues, "The federal authorities are being sent to monitor a wide variety of specific issues. In New Orleans, Louisiana, however, the observers will be there primarily to provide support to a wobbly post-Katrina election system that could be overwhelmed by residency issues. … The federal force includes more than 500 trained observers from the Office of Personnel Management. They are going to places with troubled histories as certified by the Attorney General or the federal courts under provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1965. Those locations include polling places where allegations of racial, ethnic and language discrimination have surfaced in the past -- some as far back as the 1970s." CNN adds, "The Justice Department is also sending more than 350 monitors, including attorneys from its Civil Rights Division and U.S. Attorneys offices, to other hot spots where complaints have been registered or tensions have run high. … The Justice Department has declined official comment on why any of the locations were selected. … Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim said the anticipated closeness of races would be one factor in making the final decisions on where to send observers. But in the end, few of the jurisdictions receiving federal scrutiny will be in states with heated Senate races."

FBI Looks Into Alleged Virginia Voter Intimidation. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (11/7, Schapiro) reports, "The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb." The Times-Dispatch continues, "Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate." The Times-Dispatch adds, "Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department. … Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment." The Times-Dispatch notes, "Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County. .. .Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls."

Cross Burning Attempted At Louisiana Town Hall. The AP (11/7) reports, "Someone tried to set a cross on fire in the town hall parking lot of Grand Coteau, where the black mayor is in a runoff Tuesday against a white woman. Authorities said Monday that they had few leads, other than for a pickup truck seen leaving the parking lot without its lights on late Thursday, the night before the cross was planted." Grand Coteau Police Chief Jonty Coco "said the state police and the FBI had been informed. A preliminary investigation indicated the cross had been soaked with used motor oil, he said."

Alleged California Pimp Charged With Sex Trafficking. The AP (11/5) reported, "A California man suspected of being a pimp has been charged with sex trafficking." Jeremiah Crayton "is charged in Phoenix with two counts of Sex Trafficking of a Minor and two counts of Interstate Transportation of a Minor for Prostitution." US Attorney Paul Charlton "says they plan to aggressively prosecute those who trade in the pain and misery of children. The complaint alleges that in August of 2004, Crayton took a juvenile female, who he knew was under 18 from Phoenix to San Francisco, where he forced her to work as a prostitute."

New York City Plans To Make Gender Designation A Personal Choice. The New York Times (11/7, Cave) reports, "Separating anatomy from what it means to be a man or a woman, New York City is moving forward with a plan to let people alter the sex on their birth certificate even if they have not had sex-change surgery." The Times continues, "Under the rule being considered by the city's Board of Health, which is likely to be adopted soon, people born in the city would be able to change the documented sex on their birth certificates by providing affidavits from a doctor and a mental health professional laying out why their patients should be considered members of the opposite sex, and asserting that their proposed change would be permanent." The Times adds, "Applicants would have to have changed their name and shown that they had lived in their adopted gender for at least two years, but there would be no explicit medical requirements. .. . If approved, the new rule would put New York at the forefront of efforts to redefine gender. A handful of states do not require surgery for such birth certificate changes, but in some of those cases patients are still not allowed to make the change without showing a physiological shift to the opposite gender." The Times notes, "In New York, the proposed change comes after four years of discussion among health officials, an eight-member panel of transgender experts and vital records offices nationwide. It is an outgrowth of the transgender community's push to recognize that some people may not have money to get a sex-change operation, while others may not feel the need to undergo the procedure and are simply defining themselves as members of the opposite sex. While it may be a radical notion elsewhere, New York City has often tolerated such blurring of the lines of gender identity. … And the proposal reflects how the transgender movement has become politically potent beyond its small numbers, having roots in the muscular politics of the city's gay rights movement."

WSJournal Praises Michigan Anti-Affirmative Action Initiative. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "Today in Michigan, voters face a choice on Proposal 2, which would add the following language to the state constitution: 'The state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting.' One might think a law banning discrimination would be a triumph for civil rights. Instead, opponents have spent $3 million trying to defeat it, using some of the most low-down arguments of this low-down election year. … Polls in Michigan had the Civil Rights Initiative narrowly ahead in the final days, notwithstanding the 3-to-1 funding advantage of the opponents. If it prevails despite the distortions used by opponents, it will be a tribute to the faith among Michigan voters in equal opportunity."

DOJ Queries Merrill Lynch On Buyouts. Bloomberg (11/7, Cole) reports, "Merrill Lynch & Co., the world's third-largest securities firm, received a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an antitrust inquiry of the leveraged-buyout industry, a person familiar with the probe said." Bloomberg continues, "Justice officials have already sent letters seeking information to Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the inquiry isn't public. The Merrill letter was reported earlier today by the Wall Street Journal. … 'The DOJ is probably focusing on three to four deals initially, and if it finds any problems then it may widen the probe to include other firms and deals,' Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said today in a telephone interview. Boland said the probe may last more than a year." Bloomberg adds, "LBO firms have teamed up on $201 billion of acquisitions this year, compared with $31 billion in all of 2001, according to data compiled by London-based Private Equity Intelligence Ltd. In July, the industry's biggest deal was announced, the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc. by KKR, Bain Capital LLC, Merrill Lynch's private-equity unit and HCA co-founder Thomas F. Frist Jr. … Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill acquired Hertz Global Holdings Inc. last year from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion. The Park Ridge, New Jersey-based car-rental company said last month it planned to sell as much as $1.83 billion of shares in an initial public offering."

The AP (11/7) reports, "Regulators are looking into whether private equity firms, which are increasingly the driving force behind some of Wall Street's biggest buyout deals, have engaged in anticompetitive behavior." The AP continues, "The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said in a statement Monday it is weighing whether it provides adequate oversight of the private equity market." The AP adds, "Merrill's private equity business, Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, has been on a tear, with profits of more than $300 million last quarter. The operation was involved in the $21.3 billion leveraged buyout agreement of hospital chain HCA Inc. Kohlberg Kravis and Bain Capital LLC also took part in that deal. … The news comes as investors are cheering the premiums that private equity deals can bring; the private equity deals can also generate enormous fees on Wall Street. Monday brought a flurry of private equity news, with offers being made for Four Seasons Hotels Inc. and OSI Restaurant Partners Inc., which is the parent of such chains as Outback Steakhouse."

DOJ Requests Information On Smithfield-Premium Standard Deal. The AP (11/7) reports, "Smithfield Foods Inc. and Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's two largest hog producers, said Monday they received requests for additional information from federal regulators related to Smithfield's pending acquisition of Premium Standard." The AP continues, "The request by the Department of Justice's antitrust division extends the waiting period imposed by federal law until 30 days after the two companies have substantially complied with the request." The AP adds, 'Under terms of the deal announced in September, Smithfield Foods will buy Premium Standard for about $674 million in cash and stock. Smithfield will also assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt. .. Both companies said they intend to respond expeditiously to the request and to work toward a prompt closing, which they hope to achieve in the first quarter of 2007."

Ahold To Sell US Foodservice. The AP (11/7, Sterling) reports, "Supermarket chain operator Royal Ahold NV announced plans Monday to sell its U.S. Foodservice unit, which distributes bulk food to cafeterias, as part of a major strategic shift back to its roots in retailing." The AP continues, "As part of the plan, Ahold also said it would sell its Tops stores in New York and Pennsylvania, divest its retail operations in Poland and Slovakia, and sell its 49 percent stake in Portugal's Jeronimo Martins Retail. … 'The basic decision we've taken is to commit to retail, to go back to where we come from,' Chief Executive Anders Moberg told reporters. 'We will keep retail operations in markets in the United States and in Europe only where we can secure and maintain a No. 1 or No. 2 position.'" The AP adds, "Analysts said the moves were the logical next step for Ahold, which has gradually returned to firm financial footing by refinancing and selling assets after an accounting scandal centered around U.S. Foodservice pushed it to the edge of bankruptcy in 2003. … Ahold said last week that third-quarter sales at its Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice operation, which distributes food to cafeterias in hospitals, schools and prisons, increased by 5 percent to $4.5 billion. Analysts put its value at around $5 billion."

Morgan Stanley, Visa Settle European Network Access Dispute. The AP (11/7) reports, "Morgan Stanley and Visa International have agreed to settle a long-running dispute over business in Europe, the two companies said in a statement Monday. .. However, the European Commission cautioned that the settlement wouldn't end its investigation into Visa's commercial practices." The AP continues, "Visa had refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network in Europe because Morgan Stanley runs a competing card service in the United States, Discover. Morgan Stanley complained to the European Union in 2000. … The two companies said they 'reached an amicable settlement, without any admission of liability.' Morgan Stanley has become a member of Visa in Europe. In return, it withdrew its complaint to European regulators and ended court proceedings in England. … After Morgan Stanley complained, European antitrust regulators formally charged Visa with blocking competitors from its network in August, 2004. It sent Visa a formal 'statement of objections,' saying Visa's rule barring competitors from using its network squelches competition in a growing segment of the credit-card industry and reduces choice for merchants. This case will continue despite Monday's news."

EU To Rule On Universal's Purchase Of BMG. The AP (11/7) reports, "EU regulators on Monday set a Dec. 8 deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion." The AP continues, "BMG — owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG — has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers. … Vivendi SA's Universal is the world's largest music company." The AP adds, 'Its purchase of BMG Music Publishing must be cleared by both EU and U.S. regulators. It is likely to face careful scrutiny in Europe after an EU court in July overturned the European Commission's go-ahead from a merger between the music units of Sony and Bertelsmann AG. … That deal — reducing the number of major record companies from five to four — must be re-examined and analysts warned it could raise the stakes for similar mergers. The Commission has already said it had to watch the music sector closely to check that antitrust rules are not being broken. .. EMI suspended $4.6 billion takeover talks with U.S. rival Warner Music Group after the court ruling since it cast doubt on whether an EMI-Warner deal would receive regulatory approval."

NTP Files Patent Suit Against Palm Over Wireless Email. The Wall Street Journal (11/7) reports, "NTP Inc., which successfully sued the maker of BlackBerry devices for infringement of wireless email patents, said it is suing Palm Inc., maker of the Treo smartphone." The Journal continues, "The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, alleges that Palm's products and services have improperly used NTP's wireless email technology. The suit asks the court to bar Palm from "continuing to infringe on NTP's patents" and seeks monetary damages for the alleged past infringements." The Journal adds, "In March, BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. agreed to pay NTP $612.5 million to settle a four-year patent dispute. Though it never conceded wrongdoing, RIM acknowledged that customers had delayed placing new orders due to the threat of a court-ordered shutdown of the BlackBerry system in the U.S. .. The Palm complaint also centers on products and services that integrate email systems with wireless communications, including the Treo, Palm VII, Palm i700 and Tungsten products. At issue are seven patents, dating from 1995 to 2001, according to the lawsuit. Five of the patents were part of NTP's lawsuit against RIM."

Former Swift Transportation CEO Makes $2.2 Billion Bid For Company. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, C6, Keeton) reports, "Jerry Moyes, the former top executive and largest shareholder of Swift Transportation Co., has offered to buy the Phoenix trucking company for $2.2 billion. … Swift, a long-haul trucking carrier, said that Mr. Moyes offered $29 a share, a 21% premium to Friday's trading price of $24.05. The company said its board will review the offer." The Journal continues, "Swift shares rose $5.79, or 24%, to $29.84 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, an indication that some investors anticipate a higher offer. In a letter to the company, Mr. Moyes said he would consider increasing the offer if an examination of Swift's books and records showed that the shares are worth more than $29. … In the third quarter, trucking companies reported that they hadn't seen the usual seasonal upturn in business, with retailers preparing for the holiday season. A slowing economy would hurt the trucking business."

McKesson To Buy Per-Se For $1.1 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B2, Urbanowicz) reports, "McKesson Corp. agreed to buy Per-Se Technologies Inc., which sells administrative services to doctors and hospitals, for about $1.1 billion, expanding the drug-distribution giant's customer base and transaction-processing capabilities." The Journal continues, "McKesson also will assume Per-Se's debt outstanding under the deal. As of Sept. 30, Per-Se had long-term debt of $510.6 million." The Journal adds, "The buyer will pay $28 in cash for each Per-Se share outstanding, a 14.5% premium to the Alpharetta, Ga., company's Friday closing share price. Per-Se shares rose $3.09, or 13%, to $27.54 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. McKesson rose $1.17, or 2.4%, to 49.69 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. … McKesson Chief Executive John Hammergren said the acquisition will strengthen customer relationships in existing McKesson businesses while adding a pharmacy transaction business to the San Francisco company's portfolio." The Journal notes, "Hedge fund ValueAct Capital, which controls about 15.5% of Per-Se's voting common stock, and certain of its affiliates agreed to vote in favor of the transaction. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter. … After the deal, the scale of McKesson's transaction-processing services and associated offerings is expected to more than double to about 560 million transactions annually, representing an estimated $300 billion in billed charges."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Industry Officials, Union, Activists Cooperate On Chemical Exposure Rule. The Washington Post's Cindy Skrzycki, in her "The Regulators" column (11/7), reports, "An industry association, a labor union and a public health group recently settled a court case over a new standard for worker exposure to a cancer-causing chemical, hexavalent chromium. It was a rare example of agreement in worker-safety regulation. Under the Oct. 25 settlement, the Surface Finishing Industry Council, whose members use the chemical to coat metals, agreed to move faster to improve ventilation and make other engineering changes to reduce workers' exposure levels. In return, the United Steelworkers union and an ally agreed that workers would have to wear a respirator only for certain jobs, unless they requested one." However, "there is no sign that the single agreement will cure the paralysis that for years has crippled the process for setting 'permissible exposure limits' for chemicals in the workplace."

Plan For Public Park Roils Maine Community. The New York Times (11/7, Barringer) reports from Millinocket, ME, "Roxanne Quimby could be forgiven if she thought she was emulating the likes of Henry David Thoreau, Percival P. Baxter, John D. Rockefeller Jr. and other lovers of Maine's landscape when she started to buy bits of the vast northern woodlands near here to be the core of a new national park." The Times continues, "Who knew that when she began using some of the fortune she had earned from her organic personal-care business, Burt's Bees, to buy up woods to preserve, she would be greeted with 'Ban Roxanne' T-shirts? Or, that her efforts at preservation — banning snowmobiling, hunting and all-terrain vehicles on 50,000 of her acres — would be taken as an attack on the old-time values of the timberland?" The Times adds, "Who knew that even some conservation-minded groups would be reluctant to support the decade-old vision of a national park that had inspired Ms. Quimby? … Still, one might have guessed, looking at the streets of this town of 4,700 people, where hunter's blaze orange is the fall fashion statement of choice during this month's deer hunting season." The Times notes, "Millinocket residents fear that turning timberland into parkland will further cut timber jobs, strip them of their accustomed hunting grounds and prevent the development of resorts and snowmobile parks they see as one way out of the downward economic spiral. … Other environmental groups, while sympathetic to the idea of a national park, see it as an unwelcome distraction from their fight to block a proposed 420,000-acre resort development that the Plum Creek Timber Company has unveiled for Moosehead Lake, just west of here."

Woman Vies To Be First Female Navajo Leader. The Washington Post/AP (11/7, A03, Fonseca) reports from Window Rock, AZ, "One candidate in Tuesday's Navajo Nation presidential election promises accountability and staunch protection of tribal land. The other vows to build on the reservation's economic progress in the past four years. … But in the race between incumbent Joe Shirley Jr. and challenger Lynda Lovejoy, the overriding issue is sex." The AP continues, "A win would make Lovejoy the first female leader on the largest Indian reservation in the United States, which extends into New Mexico, Arizona and Utah. … 'She is a woman, and that is going to be an issue no matter what her stance on policy,' said Dale Mason, an associate professor of political science at the University of New Mexico at Gallup. 'She represents something entirely new.'" The AP adds, "Lovejoy, a former New Mexico state lawmaker and current member of the Public Regulation Commission, hopes to unseat Shirley, 58, a former tribal council delegate who has been leading the tribe for four years. … 'I can't control people making their decision to vote for me because I'm a woman,' she said. 'I certainly appreciate and welcome that. Any vote is important to winning this ticket on November 7.' … Shirley, who has focused on economic development in his campaign for reelection, acknowledges some people will vote based on sex, but he says he is hopeful that most won't. … Some traditional Navajos believe that women and men have distinct roles in society -- women as caretakers of the home and of children, and men as providers and leaders, said Tommy Begay, a Navajo and University of Arizona doctoral student who is studying the evolution of cultures. … Although Navajo is a matriarchal society, traditional Navajos will probably stick to the belief that only men should serve as president, Begay said."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit SAC Named FBI Criminal Division Deputy Assistant Director. The Detroit News (11/7, Shepardson) reports, "The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a top job overseeing criminal investigations nationwide. Michigan native Daniel D. Roberts…will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington. … 'I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge,' Roberts said, calling the job 'a natural fit.'" The News notes, "Last month, FBI director Robert Mueller asked Roberts to take the new job," as "the FBI is in the process of filling many jobs at FBI headquarters and reshuffling the top agents at the nation's 56 field offices. … Roberts said he was most proud of his office's handling of many special events without incident," and he "made it a priority to recruit FBI agents to the Detroit office, making the pitch that the area gets an unfair rap, and also got funding to boost the size of the office, which is the 11th largest U.S. FBI field office." The AP (11/7) also reports briefly on Roberts' appointment.

Five Charged In Florida Drug Investigation Spurred By Family's Slaying. The Palm Beach Post (11/7) reports a federal grand jury "has formally charged five people with conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine in a drug case spawned by an investigation into the killing of a family found shot to death last month on the side of Florida's Turnpike. Investigators say four of the West Palm Beach-area residents indicted in the federal drug case are connected to the Oct. 13 slaying of the Escobedo family on the side of the highway in Port St. Lucie - though no one has been charged in the homicides. The federal indictment was issued Friday by a grand jury in West Palm Beach and made public during a court hearing Monday morning in Fort Pierce."

Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers (11/7) reports all four people described as "persons of interest" in the Escobedo family killings "have been indicted on federal drug charges." Investigators "were led to the drug operation by apparent references to several of the defendants in ledgers found in the Escobedo home, which recorded payments next to names, according to court records. Agents who raided the West Palm Beach home found a powder and crack cocaine, Ecstasy pills and guns."

The AP (11/6) reports a federal magistrate "denied bond Monday for a man considered a person of interest in the killings of a family of four found along Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie. Ricardo Sanchez, 23, of suburban West Palm Beach, was arrested Oct. 26 on cocaine charges with four others. Police believe four of the five people arrested that same day are connected to the slayings of the family." The Gainesville Sun, Florida Times-Union, and Dallas Morning News are among the newspapers that used the AP story.

In California, Medical Marijuana Still Generating Conflicts 10 Years After Proposition 215. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/7, Mcdonald) writes, "The potential of Proposition 215, which conflicts squarely with federal laws that classify marijuana among the most dangerous drugs, has never been realized. Thousands of California patients have no legal access to medical marijuana. … Unscrupulous and profit-minded dispensary operators have taken advantage of the absence of uniform rules, opening storefronts anywhere they can and selling marijuana to unqualified patients." The Union-Tribune says some legal scholars "believe U.S. drug agents should enforce federal laws but also respect state rights. However, the Drug Enforcement Administration has recruited local agencies to join task forces that continue to raid dispensaries and cooperatives."

Purported Gang Member Faces Federal Drug Charges In Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (11/7, Satterfield) reports, "Jessie Rondale Bailey…had been off the parole hook for his role in the May 1996 slaying of Brittany Shenice Daniels only a few months when he started racking up new charges. But the stakes for Bailey got a sudden boost last week with his arrest on a federal indictment alleging four drug sales, including two involving more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. … In April, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Todd Lee and KPD officer Bruce Conkey began building a federal drug case against Bailey, records show. … He joins former East Side gang members Melvin 'Little Melvin' Davis and Robert D. Campbell as participants in the fatal drive-by who have wound up back in trouble."

In Arizona, Former Prosecutor Remorseful About Role In Drug-Related Case. The Arizona Daily Star (11/7) reports a former Pima County prosecutor who "was once engaged to former murder suspect Bradley Schwartz says no words are adequate to describe how 'remorseful, ashamed and embarrassed' she is about the events leading up to her possible disbarment. Last November, the State Bar of Arizona filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez, 38, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct." The bar "alleges Lopez not only was indicted in September 2002 on prescription drug fraud charges along with Schwartz, but she continued having a relationship with Schwartz despite being ordered not to, and lied about it. … She further acknowledged that she lied to DEA agents about her relationship with Schwartz when they initially questioned her."

ATF Probing Detroit Fire. The Detroit News (11/7, Brand-Williams) reports, "The Detroit Fire Department is investigating a two-alarm fire that destroyed several businesses and apartments and produced more than a $1 million in damage near Lahser and Grand River on the city's northwest early Monday morning." The News conitnues, "The National Response Team from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and ATF special agents from the Detroit Field Division were called in to assist the Detroit Fire and Arson Squad in their investigation, according to the ATF. … 'We are involved because of the dollar amount of the fire. We don't look at this suspicious or not,' said Vera Fedorak, an ATF spokeswoman in Detroit. 'The Detroit Police Department asked us for assistance.'" The News adds, "The blaze was reported by a resident around 1 a.m. The building contained four businesses and several store fronts that were unoccupied. Six apartments on the second floor of the building were occupied. … There was no deaths reported in the blaze."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Nominate Paulson Advisor To Treasury Post. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B11, 2.03M) reports, "President Bush said he intends to nominate Anthony Ryan, a senior adviser to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, to serve as assistant secretary of the Treasury for financial markets." Ryan, "who was one of Mr. Paulson's first hires at Treasury, will have primary responsibility for managing Treasury's debt-market portfolio, such as the 30-year Treasury bond. The position has been vacant for a year since Timothy Bitsberger left to join mortgage giant Freddie Mac."

House Leadership Contests Already Underway. Roll Call (11/7, Davis, Yachnin) reports that while "control of the House won't be determined until tonight at the earliest, contested leadership elections already are brewing on both sides of the aisle." For the GOP, "much of the current leadership's fate rests on today's outcome, as the chances of retaining their current posts become more vulnerable with each seat lost. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (Ohio) are guaranteed a challenge, as are Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.)." House Democrats "remain committed to holding their Caucus elections on Nov. 16, but House Republicans are increasingly likely to postpone their scheduled Nov. 15 elections even if they hold on to House control." If Republicans "defy expectations and retain the majority, Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) has reiterated in recent weeks that he intends to run again for an unprecedented fifth term for the top job." But "long before the Foley story broke, an increasing number of House Republicans were doubtful that Hastert, who suffers from health problems including diabetes, would serve out a full Congress. Boehner is a likely candidate, but the Ohioan is seen as unlikely to mount a challenge to Hastert, rather waiting for him to exit the House on his own terms." If for "no other reason than that he took over mid-Congress, Boehner is the most likely current Republican to stay in leadership in the 110th Congress." Should Democrats "win control of the chamber, it is widely expected that Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) would be elevated to the Speaker's office, which would make her the first woman to hold the post." A Democrat-run House "would bring a simmering fight for the Majority Leader's office to a boil leading to the scheduled Nov. 16 leadership elections." Although "conventional wisdom gives Hoyer, as the party's current No. 2 leader, a claim to the Majority Leader's post, Rep. John Murtha (Pa.) surprised colleagues in June when he announced that he would also seek the office."

Congress To Take Up Appropriations Measures In Lame Duck Session. Roll Call (11/7, Pierce) reports regardless of "which party emerges victorious today, the current Republican majority still must find a way to fund the government, at least through the winter holidays, as well as finish other year-end business during the lame-duck session, which begins next week but is destined to last well into December." In order "to give themselves some breathing room after what is expected to be a bruising Election Day for the GOP, one of the first orders of business in both chambers next week is likely to be the passage of a continuing resolution that would allow Congress to punt the issue of fiscal 2007 appropriations until the first full week in December." GOP leaders "plan to make at least a passing attempt to complete the remaining nine spending bills as stand-alone measures, rather than cobbling them together into a massive omnibus appropriations measure — a necessity if Congress wanted to finish up within one week." But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) "finally acknowledged last week that Congress will have to extend its lame-duck session into December after taking a two-week break for Thanksgiving. That gives Congress more time to take up at least a few more of those appropriations bills in regular order."

Federal Board Rules Preference For Veterans Supersedes Expedited Hiring Programs. The Washington Post's Stephen Barr (11/7), in his "Federal Diary" column, reports, "A federal board has reaffirmed the government's obligation to show a preference for military veterans in hiring, even when federal agencies use a special program designed to quickly fill jobs with applicants who have a high grade-point average. The decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board, which hears appeals in federal personnel disputes, is a setback for the Outstanding Scholar program, which permits agencies to bypass regular civil service hiring procedures, and for the Office of Personnel Management, which had petitioned the board to reconsider its rulings from last year. … Kerry B. McTigue , general counsel at the OPM, said government lawyers are studying last month's decision and whether to file a federal court appeal. The American Legion…welcomed the board's decision."

OTHER NEWS:

Greenspan Says Economy Poised For Rebound. The Washington Post (11/7, D2, Henderson, 748K) reports, "Former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan said yesterday that home sales and prices may continue to slide for some time, but the broader US economy appears poised for a rebound. 'It looks as though the worst is behind us' in terms of the effect of the housing slump on economic growth, he told financial advisers at a conference in Washington organized by Schwab Institutional, a division of Charles Schwab & Co." He added, "We're obviously going through a significant slowing period, which as best as I can judge is quite likely to be temporary."

Stocks Rise. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 12, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) took "a look at Wall Street on this day before the national election. The Dow was more than 119 points on [to close at 12,105.55] on today's trading. NASDAQ was also up more than 35 points [to close at 2,365.95]." USA Today (11/7, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "The Dow's resurgence may be signaling that its recent slump was just a normal pause after a heady three-month rally that saw it crack its old record set in January 2000, top 12,000 for the first time and close at an all-time high of 12,163.66 on Oct. 26." The Wall Street Journal (11/7, C1, 2.03M) notes "the broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 1.1%, or 15.48 points, to 1379.78, ending a three-day pullback up 10.5% on the year."

The Washington Post/AP (11/7, D3) runs a similar report on the stock numbers. The Financial Times (11/7, Guerrera, Simon, Blitz) reports, "A takeover wave worth more than $15bn swept through global markets on Monday, boosting stock indices as big deals by investors such as Bill Gates and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts eased fears of a slowdown in merger activity. The flurry of activity – dubbed 'Takeover Monday' by analysts – was led by a $3.7bn bid by Mr Gates and Prince Alwaleed, the billionaire Saudi investor, for Four Seasons Hotels, the Canadian chain." USA Today (11/7, Krantz, 2.27M) said "Monday looked like the day of the deal again, for this week at least, as a wave of mergers and acquisitions swept Wall Street, enveloping half a dozen U.S. companies."

Fed Official Says Income Gap Could Undermine US Democracy. USA Today (11/7, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports, "US income inequality has risen to such a level that 'there are signs that (it) is intensifying resistance to globalization, impairing social cohesion, and could, ultimately, undermine American democracy,' San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank President Janet Yellen said Monday." In "language rare for a central bank official," Yellen "suggested that high priority be given to improving education, tax credits and other aspects of the social safety net, despite the cost in dollars and possible impact on economic efficiency, according to the text of her lecture at the University of California, Irvine."

Florida Gubernatorial Candidate Snubs Bush On Campaign's Last Day. The AP (11/7, Espo) reports, "On the eve of midterm elections, Democrats criticized Republicans as stewards of a stale status quo while President Bush declared, 'we're closing strong' in a final drive to preserve GOP control of Congress." Bush "campaigned on Monday from Florida to Arkansas and Texas." But "the day brought one more reminder of his poor standing in the polls when Republican gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist skipped the presidential rally in Pensacola, Fla., to make a speech of his own hundreds of miles away." Bush "made no mention of the evident snub in public, but not so his aides. 'Let's see how many people show up in Palm Beach on 24 hours notice, versus 8,000 or 9,000 people' expected for the president's speech, said Karl Rove, the White House's top political strategist." The Los Angeles Times (11/7, Gerstenzang, 918K) notes Rove's "snippy remark," and adds he "overestimated the size of the Pensacola crowd by several thousand."

Crist's "evident snub" focused much of the nation media attention when it came to the President's campaign swing. As the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (11/7, Hollis, 265K) reports, the "irritation shown by the White House…over Crist's snub of the president in Pensacola…captured the media attention. Crist's spokesman said Sunday the candidate was skipping a rally there because he needed to spend his final day of campaigning elsewhere in the state, including vote-rich South Florida."

All three networks noted it, with the CBS Evening News (11/6, story 6, 1:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reporting Florida "neatly sums up the President's status. Low approval ratings mean he only visits heavily conservative areas like the Panhandle. But even there top GOP candidates don't want to be seen with Mr. Bush."

ABC World News (11/6, story 2, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Bush saying, "I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida." ABC then added, "One person missing at the rally was Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for Florida governor. He was campaigning elsewhere. And it was Crist who invited the President to Florida." NBC Nightly News (11/6, lead story, 3:30, Gregory, 9.87M) also noted the story, adding "many Republicans want distance from the President and his message."

Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume) reported, "In the conservative panhandle of Florida the day before election day was a Bush family affair." It "was the last time Gov. Jeb Bush would introduce his brother, the president, who urged the crowd to get out the vote for Jeb's replacement." President Bush: "Tomorrow you get to vote for a new governor. I strongly suggest you vote for Charlie Crist to be governor of the state of Florida." Fox continued, "While Charlie Crist signs dotted the crowd Crist was a no-show. He was campaigning in Jacksonville with Sen. John McCain. His campaign said it already had strong support in the panhandle and time would be better spent elsewhere."

MSNBC's Hardball (11/6, lead story, Matthews) also reported President Bush "was stood up today by" Crist. According to MSNBC, "The White House thought Charlie Crist would introduce the president at that rally but decided at the last minute not to show up." MSNBC added, "The president himself seemed to be above it all. … He urged the crowd…to vote for" Crist. President Bush "also asked people to vote for Katherine Harris. She was in the audience, not on the stage."

The AP (11/7, Loven) reports, "The closer the election came to the finish line, the more President Bush's aides battled the perception he was doing his party as much harm as good and was unwanted in many districts." Along similar lines, the Washington Post's Eugene Robinson (11/7) writes, "The Republican Party was saddled with an unpopular president who led the nation into an unnecessary and unwinnable war, mocked traditional American notions of justice and privacy, reasserted the powers of an imperial presidency, and generally showed himself willing to disregard objective facts if they were not to his liking. That wasn't much for Republican incumbents to work with." Noting Crist's absence from the event, AFP (11/7, Knox) says Bush "suffered one final campaign trail indignity."

The Palm Beach Post (11/7, Lipman, Poole, Crowley, Date) reports "the state's top Republican candidates were conspicuously absent from the presidential rally, which drew about 7,500 people." The only statewide candidate to attend the event featuring the president and his brother Gov. Jeb Bush "was U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris. But Harris, who trails far behind in the polls in her bid to unseat Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, did not appear on stage with them. … Republicans Bill McCollum, who is seeking to succeed Crist as attorney general, and incumbent Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson were campaigning along the Interstate 4 corridor. Tom Lee, the GOP candidate for chief financial officer, also was not in Pensacola."

The Washington Times (11/7, Curl, 88K) reports that "at events in Montana, Nevada, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Florida, Arkansas and Texas, Mr. Bush urged supporters to get out the vote." The Times describes Crist's absence from the event as "an odd twist."

The Washington Post (11/7, A1, Baker, 748K) also notes Crist's "snub," and adds, "So it goes these days. Bush shrugged it off and delivered a robust speech, firing up a crowd of Republicans and defiantly predicting victory. Any doubt he may harbor, he kept to himself. Any feelings of regret are locked tight inside. The rest of the world may see an unpopular president in the midst of an unpopular war. But Bush soldiers on. He does not publicly stew as other presidents have. He powers through event after event as if he were still the leader the country rallied behind after Sept. 11, 2001."

The Houston Chronicle (11/7, Mason, Scharrer, 535K) notes that in Texas, Gov. Rick Perry got "a personal boost from President Bush and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn blitzing the state with Bush's former press secretary and the president's former Medicare chief." In "his last event of the campaign season, Bush touched down in Dallas for a rally with Perry, telling an estimated 10,000 people at Reunion Arena that 'You elected us to get things done.' 'Let me put it to you this way,' Bush told the cheering crowd. 'Everything I learned, I learned here in Texas.'"

The Chicago Tribune (11/7, Silva, 623K) reports, "On Monday, the last day of his final political campaign that could effect his presidency, Bush brandished the unrelenting optimism which he has carried to his own personal battle for his party's control of Congress for months." Bush also "carried the added burden of his own unpopularity as president, with the war in Iraq having taken a toll on the president after nearly four years of combat. "

Under the headline "A Last Hurrah Of Sorts For Bush-Rove Partnership," the New York Times (11/7, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports "Bush and his political partner, Karl Rove, ended it where they started it: in this sliver of Northwest Florida that arguably gave them their 2000 victory. Like then, the two have utilized a symbiotic relationship in which, friends say, Mr. Rove, the president's chief political adviser, is both mastermind and supplicant, and Mr. Bush is both leader and follower. While several members of the team that got Mr. Bush to the White House in 2000 are gone, Mr. Rove remains." The Times adds, "Asked Monday about plans for a possible Democratic-controlled Congress, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, repeated his standard refusal to discuss the topic, then added, 'Here's the thing that you do need to know, which is that the president plans for a very active final two years of his presidency.'" He added, "So the president is going to be very aggressive, and he's not going to play small ball."

Meanwhile, the AP (11/7, Hunt) says that "running out of time and influence, President Bush faces a rough road in the twilight of his presidency regardless of who controls Congress. … Republicans are in a sour mood, scarred by corruption scandals, held in low esteem by voters and divided over issues from deficit spending to immigration reform. Many GOP candidates shunned Bush in their campaigns, fearing he would hurt rather than help them. With the end of the midterm elections and the opening of the 2008 presidential race, Republicans as well as Democrats will be telling the country how they would do things differently from Bush."

Giuliani Credits Bush's Campaigning For GOP "Momentum." Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (11/6) said he believes Republican candidates are starting to gain "momentum" in the polls because "the president's campaigning has helped a lot -- going out there and making the case for remaining on offense against terrorism. I think people are seeing an economy that is doing really well and they realize a lot of that had to do with the action that the president took in lowering taxes."

Analysts Expect Democrats To Take House, Perhaps Senate. The consensus of media commentators on the eve of the election is that Democrats will take the House and may possibly gain control of the Senate as well, although that possibility appears to have lost some steam in the last few days. The New York Times (11/7, Broder, Rutenberg, 1.21M) reports even Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, yesterday "introduced a cautionary note in contrast with confident predictions by Mr. Bush, Mr. Rove and Vice President Dick Cheney that Republicans would retain majorities in the House and Senate. Asked about his party's prospects in the House, Mr. Mehlman said that although he saw signs of new hope that Republicans could retain control, 'I believe it's going to be very close; I think it remains an uphill climb.'" He "sounded more confident about the Senate." The Times adds, "Independent analysts predict Democratic gains of 20 and 40 seats in the House, giving the party control for the first time since 1994. An analysis accompanying a Gallup Poll released over the weekend said that based on calculations from Congressional elections from 1946 to 2002, the Democrats were poised to gain 11 to 58 seats, with a gain of 35 the most likely outcome."

In a similar report, the Los Angeles Times (11/7, A1, Brownstein, 918K) says "most analysts on both sides agreed it would be extremely difficult for Republicans to prevent Democrats from securing the 15-seat gain they need to capture a majority in the House. " In the Senate, "Democrats face a tougher climb." They need a gain of six seats to reach a majority, and that will require them to capture at least four of the five most closely contested Republican-held seats -- in Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri -- without losing any seats they already hold." The AP (11/7, Raum) notes "nearly every Democratic senator seeking re-election seems assured of another term, polls suggest."

USA Today (11/7, Nichols, 2.27M) reports Republican leaders "cited narrowing polls in Senate races in Montana, Rhode Island and Maryland as signs of an 11th-hour surge." Turnout "should increase from 39.7% in 2002 and may exceed the most recent midterm high of 42.1% in 1982, according to Curtis Gans, director of American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate. Gans does not expect this year's turnout to top the all-time benchmark of 47% in 1970."

As NBC Nightly News (11/6, lead story, 3:30, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, some recent polls have shown Republicans making some progress on the generic poll. GOP leaders, while "bracing for losses…nevertheless they seized on some of that new polling…arguing that there is a tightening in the race and to argue that the Republican faithful are indeed coming home." NBC added that "for Republicans, it's almost all defense and they're fending off Democrats in solidly red territory," where Republican struggling to attract independent voters. Charlie Cook, political analyst, was shown saying, "If independents vote breaking 2-1 Democratic, that's how you get into 30, 35-seat loss for Republicans in the house, maybe even higher."

The CBS Evening News (11/6, lead story, 1:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) commented on the new polls and said it is "clear the spread is shrinking and things are moving. Having said that, the Republicans are still behind, they are running with a President who has a very low approval rating and all the polls show Americans believe the country is headed in the wrong direction. So it's going to be hard for the Republicans to close this gap entirely."

On NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 6, 3:05, 9.87M), Tim Russert said Democrats "think the most fertile ground" for them is "the Midwest and the East and this is how they plan to do it. Indiana -- they believe they can win three seats. Ohio, three seats. Pennsylvania, four seats. New York, three seats. Connecticut, two seats. If they can win 15 seats in just those five states, they have captured control of the House. And they still have 20 other seats all across the country." In the Senate, "there's a battleground in seven Republican states…and two Democratic states." Democrats "must hold New Jersey and Maryland. Then, they need to win six of the seven -- Pennsylvania, Ohio, Rhode Island, Montana, Virginia, Missouri, Tennessee. If they lose Tennessee, they have to win six out of six on the Republican side. If they lose New Jersey or Maryland, then they have to win all seven of the red states or they do not recapture control of the Senate. This is the equivalent of the winning the Senate of the inside straight."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/7, Feldmann, 58K) reports a "last-minute tightening in the polls of Senate contests from Montana to Rhode Island to Maryland has thrown some doubt into the calculations of pundits who had come to see a Democratic takeover as possible." While many analysts "can see a clear path to a Democratic net gain of five seats…which would bring the partisan balance sheet to a 50-50 tie," the "last-minute volatility both in the nationwide polls gauging voter preferences and in individual races leaves the outcome even more in doubt." Voters "in Rhode Island and Montana who once appeared set to throw out their two Republican senators Lincoln Chafee and Conrad Burns may be having second thoughts, judging by the tightening of polls there." In his column in The Hill (11/7), Dick Morris says, "While the Republican Party leadership in the House seems doomed to move into a well deserved minority, the GOP shows increasing signs of being able to hang on to the Senate, although perhaps by the thinnest of margins."

The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, 2.03M), however, says that although "Republican prospects seem slightly brighter in the Senate…enough of these races are now toss-ups to put the Democrats within striking distance. Judging from the polls, the over-under betting on Democratic pickups of Senate seats hovers at around five."

On ABC World News (11/6, story 3, 2:00, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "There's no question the Republican base is getting back in the game. And they're starting to cut into the Democrats' lead among independents. Democrats' polls confirm this tightening, as well. They also point out that margins like we just saw could translate for a big night for them. In 1994, when Republicans took over, their margin was 52-46. They won 52 seats." Gibson: "Let's talk about the Senate. The question is, can the Democrats pick up six seats?" Stephanopoulos: "Looking very tough. The consensus in both parties is it's an uphill fight right now. Democrats starting to feel a little better about the state of Missouri. But Republicans are feeling better about the states of Michigan, which hadn't been on the map at all up until today, and Maryland, which is a Democratic stronghold. Most interesting, both Democrats and Republicans agree that Lincoln Chafee, the Republican in Rhode Island, is coming on very strong. He is ahead right now." Stephanopoulos added, "Presidential approval rating is the best predictor of midterms. Look back at these ratings. 1966, Lyndon Johnson, 44%. Lost 47 seats. Ronald Reagan in 1982, 42%, lost 26 seats. Bill Clinton in 1994, 46%, lost 52 seats. George W. Bush is below all of them in approval rating. That is clearly a danger zone."

Stuart Rothenberg, in a Roll Call column titled "Down To The Wire: Expect A Big Night For Democrats" (11/7), writes that "there is little uncertainty about the fight for the House, except for questions about exactly which Republican incumbents will be lucky enough to survive. … Republican chances for retaining the House have moved from small to smaller, and public and private polling now suggests a solid Democratic win." He adds that "even the most optimistic Republican insiders I can find seem to think a loss of 18 or 19 seats is inevitable, while others counter that a loss of more than 30 is more likely. Most GOP insiders would be ecstatic if the party held its losses to two dozen or less."

The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume), noted that "there's no poll [generic House ballot] that is now closer than four points. Fox News is now showing it's back up to 13. I think the Democrats will win the house." According to Kristol the Democrats are likely to pick-up 32-40 seats. Kristol predicted the Senate will be 50-50, or "possibly 51-49 Democratic." Kristol added, "I think [Sen. Jon] Kyl could lose and "if he loses it's a blow-out on election night, obviously."

The Weekly Standard's Fred Barnes, also on Fox News' Special Report (11/6, Hume), said, "I think [the GOP] will lose the House but hold the Senate."

Roll Call (11/7, Whittington) also says "there is little question that Democrats are well-positioned to win at least the 15 seats needed to take the House majority," even if "the magnitude of their victory rests largely on their ability to win a number of what were once second-, third- and even fourth-tier contests." In the Senate, "late shifts in a handful of competitive races has put the Democrats' final math somewhat in flux after a monthlong intense focus on Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia as the states expected to decide control of the chamber."

The Washington Post (11/7, A1, VandeHei, Balz, 748K) reports Republican "operatives…said there is mounting evidence that fears about the nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea, coupled with more generalized doubts about Democratic competence and fortitude on national security, have provided GOP candidates with much-needed momentum in the final days. GOP tracking polls, these strategists said, have shown a slight but steady uptick since Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), in what he called a botched joke, suggested that uneducated people end up fighting in Iraq -- a comment that infuriated top Democrats despite the 2004 presidential nominee's repeated apologies and explanations." The Washington Times (11/7, Lambro, 88K) addresses similar GOP predictions under the headline "Kerry Gaffe Loses Independents For His Party."

The Washington Times (11/7, Hurt, 88K), in another story titled "Polls Give GOP A Lift On Election Eve," says "Republicans on Capitol Hill…were guardedly optimistic that this year's much-predicted Democratic 'tidal wave' will fail to materialize. Still, Republicans await the results more anxiously than Democrats."

ABC World News (11/6, lead story, 3:05, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Republicans say they've spent $30 million on getting out the vote, fliers and phone banks, three million voter contacts just on Saturday. Democrats say they spent $40 million with 3.5 million contacts on Saturday." NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 5, 2:35, Reid, 9.87M) noted "both parties are now aggressively pursuing a technique called microtargeting. They collect massive amounts of information about potential voters. Everything from where you live to what you drive to what you read."

The Financial Times (11/7, Luce, Negus) reports "Republican strategists said their volunteers had made direct contact with 27m American voters during the election campaign – far more than the Democrats. 'We have made more voter contacts in 2006 than we did in 2004, which is remarkable given that this is a mid-term election, not a presidential election,' said Dana Perino, a White House spokesperson." However, electoral analysts "said the superiority of the Republican fundraising and 'micro-targeting' machines would be insufficient to breach the wide Democratic lead, which was still averaging 11 percentage points if all the polls of the past few days were taken into account."

The AP (11/7, Kuhnhenn) reports "national committees for the Republicans and Democrats have spent about $225 million for or against candidates, concentrating their resources in 10 Senate races and 66 House contests that could determine who controls Congress.' The data "is based on a review of independent spending reports filed with the Federal Election Commission as of Monday. Republicans spent about $81 million in 53 congressional districts, mostly on television advertising opposing Democratic challengers. Democrats spent $64 million in 56 congressional districts, most of them represented by a Republican."

The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A1, Cummings, 2.03M) reports, "This time around, Democrats have played the money game more assertively than in any previous midterm election. Party leaders have mined donors for extra cash. They set explicit fund-raising targets for new candidates to win the party's backing. And they also raised donation targets for veteran politicians who want to become committee chairmen should Democrats win a majority." The Journal adds, "The result: Fund raising by the Democratic congressional committees is running 30% ahead of the same period two years ago, according to a study by the Campaign Finance Institute, a nonpartisan group that tracks political money. The Democratic party committees for the first time entered the final weeks of a campaign with nearly as much money in the bank as their Republican counterparts." That "has allowed Democrats to attack earlier, even to the point of backing conservative Republicans in primary races they thought would be more beatable in the general election."

Democrats Fear "Overheated" Expectations May Demoralize Party Even In Victory. The New York Times (11/7, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "In most midterm elections, an out-of-power party picking up, say, 14 seats in the House and five seats in the Senate could call it a pretty good night." But "for Democrats in 2006, that showing would mean coming up one seat shy of taking control of both the Senate and the House. And it would probably be branded a loss — in the case of the House, a big one." The Times adds, "For a combination of reasons -- increasingly bullish prognostications by independent handicappers, galloping optimism by Democratic leaders and bloggers, and polls that promise a Democratic blowout -- expectations for the party have soared into the stratosphere. Democrats are widely expected to take the House, and by a significant margin, and perhaps the Senate as well, while capturing a majority of governorships and legislatures." These expectations "may well be overheated. Polls over the weekend suggested that the contest was tightening, and some prognosticators on Monday were scaling back their predictions, if ever so slightly. … Some Democrats worry that those forecasts, accurate or not, may be setting the stage for a demoralizing election night, and one with lasting ramifications, sapping the party's spirit and energy heading into the 2008 presidential election cycle."

Republicans Keep Senate In Student Election, But Lose House. The Wall Street Journal Online (11/7, Malik) reports, "Nearly one million votes cast by elementary and high school students in a nationwide mock election backed a Republican Senate but turned power over to the Democrats in the House of Representatives." The ballots for "the Youth Leadership Initiative's Internet mock election, which ended Thursday night, were tailored to local elections and referenda. Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center of Politics, started the program in 1998 at three local schools." In the "mock election, Democrats gained seats in Pennsylvania, Montana, Tennessee and Mississippi. But Republicans carried Florida, Minnesota and Washington for a 54-seat majority." Republican George Allen "may have retained his Senate seat in Virginia, but his 44.74% win against Democratic rival Jim Webb's 44.59% shows how his campaign missteps became an issue. Hilary Clinton retained New York for the Democrats by a wide margin." In the House races, "the student polls were brutal in Ohio, Florida, New York and North Carolina. Democrats came out ahead with 218 seats compared with 202 for Republicans and 15 for other candidates."

Democrats Hope To Win Senior Citizen Votes. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, Lovely, 2.03M) reports Democratic strategists "looking for bellwethers are closely watching a group of voters that has attracted relatively little attention in the blitz of this year's campaign: senior citizens." Democrats "decisively lost the vote of older Americans to President Bush in the 2004 election, which party leaders see as a key reason they failed to unseat the president. Exit polls indicate Mr. Bush prevailed among those ages 60 and over by a margin of 54% to 46%." Democrats "think they can recapture those voters this year, which would be a crucial step toward taking one or both houses of Congress."

Illegal Immigration Fails To Become GOP Midterm Silver Bullet. In the Wall Street Journal's "Campaign Journal" column (11/7), Jackie Calmes says congressional Republicans "seized on the issue many hoped would be a silver bullet to get through the midterm elections, and without the losses that a president's party traditionally suffers. By attacking illegal immigration, Republicans could look tough on border security and please their conservative constituents and many independents. In the process, they could force votes in Congress -- say, on cutting off benefits for illegals' children, or making English the official U.S. language -- that would divide the Democrats and their Hispanic allies, and, ideally, trap some Democratic lawmakers into votes that could be turned into 30-second attack ads for television by November 2006." But it "hasn't exactly turned out that way." The issue "of dealing with illegal immigrants divided the Bush-era Republican Party at least as badly, and more embarrassingly so given that it holds all the power in Washington."

Kinsley Critiques Democrats' Plan For Iraq. The Washington Post's Michael Kinsley (11/7) writes, "Apparently and unfortunately, President Bush is right that the Democrats have no 'plan for victory.' … For national security in general, the Democrats' plan is so according-to-type that you cringe with embarrassment: It's mostly about new cash benefits for veterans. Regarding Iraq specifically, the Democrats' plan has two parts. First, they want Iraqis to take on 'primary responsibility for securing and governing their country.' Then they want 'responsible redeployment' (great euphemism) of American forces."

Liberals' Triumph Seen As Likely To Be Short-Lived. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (11/7, A12, 2.03M) Arthur C. Brooks, a professor at Syracuse University, writes, "This midterm election, in the view of many optimistic liberals, will be a forceful repudiation of the inevitability of American conservatism. A victory after so many years of losses will mark the beginning of the end to the country's nightmarish reactionary drift. … But will it really be the dawn of a new day for the American left? After a cold look at the evidence, liberals might decide to take the champagne off the ice. The victory, assuming there is one, will hardly be glorious, and long-term trends are still distinctly right wing."

Dionne Predicts GOP Infighting. The Washington Post's E. J. Dionne (11/7) writes, "The administration's approach to Iraq is an orphan -- only President Bush and his closest advisers claim it as their own. That is why we can know how Republicans and conservatives will spend the last two years of the Bush presidency. They will fault philosophical adversaries for what went wrong, purge various actors and ideas from the movement, and insist on contradictory forms of ideological purity."

O'Reilly Portrays Pelosi As "Standard-Bearer Of San Francisco Values." The subject of last night's "Talking Point Memo" on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (11/6) was "San Francisco Values vs. A Time of Terror." Host Bill O'Reilly noted, "There's no question that the nation's most liberal city doesn't reflect the traditional values of most Americans. The city's standard-bearer Nancy Pelosi is about to become one of the most powerful people in the country if all goes the Democrats way tomorrow. The ACLU is thrilled. George Soros is delirious. … But the rest of us are left with an unsettling feeling, yes, Iraq's a mess, but what's on the horizon isn't exactly a vision of comfort either."

Democrats Cry Foul Over NRCC Automated Negative Phone Banks. The New York Times (11/7, Drew, Hulse, 1.21M) reports automated phone calls criticizing Democrat Lois Murphy in the Pennsylvania 6th CD race "are part of a telephone blitz that the Republican Party has unleashed in several dozen races that are likely to determine control of the House in Tuesday's elections. And the repeat calls to the same homes have set off a new furor over campaign tactics, with the Democrats claiming the calls violate federal communications rules and are tantamount to harassment." Murphy and "other Democrats say they have been flooded with complaints from irritated voters who think that the calls are coming from the candidates themselves. Many of the voters had hung up before the message was over, and never heard that it was produced by the Republican Party." Democratic leaders "contend that the messages violate federal rules that require groups making automated calls to identify themselves at the outset. And the National Republican Congressional Committee, which has financed the calls, agreed on Sunday to quit making some of them in New Hampshire, where a state law limits who can receive computerized phone messages." NRCC spokesman Ed Patru "said the phone campaign complied with federal law and was 'drawing contrasts' between the candidates." But Democratic officials "say they fear the saturation calling is just a tactic to irritate voters and discourage them from going to the polls."

The Washington Post (11/7, A8, Babington, MacGillis, 748K) reports the "heavy volume of automated political phone calls has infuriated countless voters and triggered sharp complaints from Democrats, who say the Republican Party has crossed the line in bombarding households with recorded attacks on candidates in tight House races nationwide." Some voters, "sick of interrupted dinners and evenings, say they will punish the offending parties by opposing them in today's elections. But critics say Republicans crafted the messages to delude voters -- especially those who hang up quickly -- into thinking that Democrats placed the calls." Republicans "denied the allegation, noting that their party acknowledges its authorship at the recorded calls' end. After citizens' complaints in New Hampshire, however, the National Republican Congressional Committee agreed to end the calls to households on the federal do-not-call list, even though the law exempts political messages from such restrictions." Whether "'robo-calls' are positive or negative, mean-spirited or humorous, thousands of Americans are sick of them, according to campaign organizations that have been fielding complaints over the past two weeks." In a "conference call with reporters yesterday, the DCCC chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), compared the widespread robo-calling to a 2002 Republican effort in New Hampshire to jam Democratic phone lines to prevent the Democrats' get-out-the-vote effort."

Media Consortium Seeks To Keep Exit Polls Under Wraps. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, B1, Schatz, 2.03M) reports, "Two-by-two, polling specialists from ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN, Fox News and the Associated Press will go into rooms in New York and Washington shortly before noon Tuesday. Their cellphones and BlackBerrys will be confiscated; proctors will monitor the doors; and for the next five hours, these experts will pore over exit-poll data from across the country." If "all goes well, only when they emerge from their cloisters will the legions of ravenous political bloggers have any chance of getting their hands on the earliest indication of which party will end up controlling Congress." The "extraordinary security is a result of mix-ups that prompted grumbling about the accuracy of exit polls after the 2004 presidential election: Bloggers posted data from early exit polls, incorrectly calling some states for Massachusetts Democratic Sen. John Kerry and indicating that he would unseat President Bush." This year, media executives "figure the secret will keep less than half an hour."

Election Outcome Expected To Be Known Early. The Washington Post (11/7, A6, Birnbaum, 748K) reports election observers "probably will not have to stay up too late to know which way the midterm elections are heading." Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report said, "The key races in Congress are concentrated in the Eastern and Central time zones, so we ought to have a good sense of the trend relatively early in the evening." The Post adds that in the Senate, Democrats "would have to gain six seats to win a majority, and all but one of the most competitive races are in states in the East or Midwest: Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Ohio and Maryland. The single nail-biter farther west is in Montana." Most tossup House races "are also clustered in states east of the Mississippi River. By watching the fate of Republican candidates in Connecticut, New York, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Indiana and Ohio, political enthusiasts will have a good idea whether Democrats will win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House, analysts say." But that "is, of course, if everything goes smoothly. And things rarely do. Uncertainties about electronic voting machines and hassles over identifying registered voters could make early predictions about the election precarious."

The New York Times (11/7, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports for an "early glimpse of how election night will unfold, strategists of both parties have their eyes fixed on Indiana. Yes, Indiana is home to three of the most competitive House races in the nation. But it is the 6 p.m. Eastern closing time for a majority of the state's polling places that is most intriguing to Republicans and Democrats."

Armitage Says Election Gives US Chance To Win Back Lost Allies. The Washington Post (11/7, A10, Goldfarb, 748K) reports former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, "who was an influential adviser to Colin L. Powell when Powell was secretary of state, has weighed in on today's midterm elections, saying they offer the United States a chance to win back lost allies around the world." In a speech in Canberra, Australia, Armitage said "he expects Republicans to lose control of the House and perhaps the Senate. In an election dominated by a war that has turned off many U.S. allies, Armitage said Americans are concerned that international support for U.S. policy has declined since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Gore Campaigns For O'Malley, Cardin In Maryland. The Washington Post/AP (11/6) reports former Vice President Al Gore "made an election-eve visit to Maryland Monday, joining Democratic gubernatorial candidate Martin O'Malley and Senate candidate Ben Cardin at a get-out-the-vote rally at a Montgomery County retirement community." Gore was "the only national heavyweight from either party to campaign in the state on a day when Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich wound up his campaign with a rally near his boyhood home in Baltimore County and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, the party's Senate nominee, continued what his campaign described as an around-the-clock campaign tour that he had started on Sunday." Gore's "appearance at Leisure World attracted an overflow crowd of more than 300 to hear the former vice president and a host of Maryland Democratic officials, including O'Malley, Cardin attorney general candidate Doug Gansler and comptroller nominee Peter Franchot." Gore said "Congress has abdicated its responsibility to hold President Bush accountable for his failures, and a Democratic House and Senate are needed to ask the tough questions Republican leaders are not asking." He said Baltimore "under O'Malley has had 'the most competent, most cutting edge ... administration of any city in the country.'"

The Washington Times (11/7, Ward, Miller, 88K) reports Gore, "who lost the 2000 presidential election to President Bush after weeks of recounts in Florida, said Mr. Cardin's contest with Mr. Steele 'is going to be looked at all across the nation.'" Cardin said, "This is about more than a Senate seat in Maryland. It's about taking back our country." The Times adds O'Malley "called the Ehrlich administration a 'detour' in the state's progress."

Fox News' Special Report (11/6, lead story, Hume) opened its broadcast with an update on the Senate race in Maryland, reporting, "a flashback -- former Vice President Al Gore stumping for Ben Cardin…and indirectly acknowledging the Democrats could lose this seat and any chance of the senate majority. … Endorsed by self black church pastors, Michael Steele has pulled into a statistical dead heat in this Democratic state and the head of the Democrats' national campaign downplayed expectations today."

Allen, Webb Urge Supporters To Vote. The Washington Times (11/7, Bellantoni, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Republican Sen. George Allen and Democrat James H. Webb Jr. "urged Virginians to go to the polls, as they crisscrossed the state in their final full day of campaigning in a race that could determine control of the U.S. Senate." The "uncertainty of today's result was crystal clear yesterday, with the release of two competing polls -- one giving Mr. Webb, a Vietnam War veteran, an eight-point lead and the other showing Mr. Allen, a former governor and congressman, with a three-point lead." Webb "ended his 10-month underdog campaign at a rally with former President Bill Clinton and more than 2,000 supporters in Old Town Alexandria." Clinton said, "If you want America to take a different path, you to have to elect Jim Webb." The Times adds Clinton's visit "prompted ridicule from Republicans who remember he lost in Virginia in 1992 and 1996 and that his last-minute visit for Lt. Gov. Donald S. Beyer in 1997 did not help the Democrat win the governor's race."

FBI Examining Report Of Possible Voter Intimidation In Virginia. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (11/7, Schapiro) reports the FBI is "looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb. Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate." Jean R. Jensen, "secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office." Jensen said "she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County."

Lieberman Says He Won't Be Beholden To GOP If He Wins. The AP (11/7, Miga) reported that although Sen. Joe Lieberman "expects to win a lot of Republican votes Tuesday, the Connecticut lawmaker said he won't feel especially beholden to the GOP if he is elected to a fourth term." Lieberman said, "I'll owe everybody and that's the point." The AP adds Lieberman, "whose Senate career was at risk just three months ago after he lost to anti-war challenger Ned Lamont in the Democratic primary, led Lamont by 12 percentage points in a statewide poll released Monday." Lieberman is "running as an independent and has enjoyed support from the GOP, including praise from the White House and fundraising help from prominent Republicans such as New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg. But he said his comeback since the primary has convinced him that he needs to be a stronger independent voice."

Up To 40% Of Voters May Have Cast Ballots Early In Tennessee Senate Race. NBC Nightly News (11/6, story 4, 0:30, Costello, 9.87M) reported the Tennessee Senate race "has been described as a slugfest over race relations, God and family roots. The Republican Bob Corker, the Democrat-Harold Ford, Jr. Both men moving around the state today. The secretary of state's office tells us 40% of the people in the state who are going to vote may already have voted. The question -- who did they vote for? The polls have Corker up anywhere from three to 12 points by Harold Ford's team believes it's much closer, maybe even a dead heat and this is much less about Iraq than Harold Ford. If elected he'd be the first African American Senator from the South since Reconstruction."

Wilson Ad Cites North Korea Nuclear Threat. The New York Times (11/7, Kirkpatrick, 1.21M) reports that in New Mexico's 1st CD, "near the site of the first nuclear bomb test, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican in a neck-and-neck race for re-election, has broadcast an incendiary television commercial against her Democratic challenger, Patricia Madrid. In the spot, images of fire mutate momentarily into floating fragments of text before dissolving again into flames: 'North Korea conducts nuclear test.

Reductions in military spending. The murder of any American anywhere on earth.'" As a "picture of the North Korean dictator, Kim Jong Il, gives way to an unflattering photo of Ms. Madrid, a narrator asks: 'Can we trust her? With so much at stake? Does she have the experience we need? In a world like this, is she the one who will keep our families safe? Patricia Madrid. Don't take the risk.'"

Number Of Women In Congress Expected To Increase. ABC World News (11/6, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There are 67 women in the House and 14 in the Senate. Those numbers are likely to increase tomorrow night." ABC (Snow) added, "Remember 1992 was dubbed the year of the woman. But tomorrow night may rival that. The number of women in the Senate could grow. The number in the House could grow by double digits. And by most projections, would be the biggest incoming class of women ever on Capitol Hill. Lois Murphy, a mother of two young girls, ran against Republican Congressman Jim Gerlach two years ago and lost by just 6,400 votes. This, she believes, is her year." This "wealthy district in Philadelphia's Mainline suburbs could be part of what some analysts are calling a perfect storm for female candidates. There are 139 women running this time around." Voters "disgusted by the war in Iraq and sick of scandals are looking for new blood, for outsiders. … And women such as Gabrielle Giffords in Arizona, Christine Jennings in Florida or Kirsten Gillibrand in New York may fit the bill." Debbie Walsh, Center for American Women and Politics: "They don't even have to open their mouths. They are not the standard issue white man in a blue suit with a red tie." Snow: "Women are not part of the Washington old boy network, so they are viewed as more trustworthy when the climate is such as it is this year. Of the 46 women challenging male incumbents, only 11 are Republicans, 34 Democrats."

Humane Society Seen As Potential Electoral Force. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A1, Mullins, 2.03M) reports, "For the first time in its 50-year history, the Humane Society is trying to elect candidates to Congress who support its animal-welfare agenda. After a series of mergers with other animal-welfare groups, the Humane Society counts 10 million Americans as members, an average of 23,000 in each of the 435 House districts. That's more than twice the membership of the National Rifle Association, which is considered one of the most effective single-issue campaign organizations. More important, the Humane Society's motivating issue -- the promotion of animal welfare -- resonates with the white suburban women who could be the key block of voters who decide this election."

AARP Official Defends Group's Voter Guide Questionnaire. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), David Sloane, AARP's senior managing director of government relations writes, "Rather than fostering an environment for real solutions, your editorial is an example ("AARP's Tax Trap," Review & Outlook, Nov. 1) of exactly what's wrong with the current debate over Social Security. The AARP Voters' Guide asks candidates to respond to two questions on this issue. The first is whether they would support or oppose using Social Security to fund private accounts. … Our opposition to this is simple: It adds unnecessary risk and trillions of dollars of debt to future generations." Slone adds, "Our second question goes to the heart of the matter: Would the candidates support a balanced Social Security plan to continue guaranteed benefits for future generations? The fact is, there are only two ways to address the solvency problem -- adding more resources to the program or adjusting future benefits (or some combination of both). … Our research shows the American public wants a balanced, bipartisan solution, and understands that changes will be needed in order to keep our promises."

Study Finds Americans Have Little Confidence In Leaders. The Washington Post (11/7, A19, Williamson, 748K) reports, "A new study shows that Americans have lost faith in the people who lead their federal, state and local governments, and in businesses, churches and schools. … 'America is in trouble,' reads the introduction to the 2006 National Leadership Index, sponsored by U.S. News & World Report and the Center for Public Leadership at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. According to the report, nearly three-quarters of Americans think that the nation faces a 'leadership crisis.' … The only leaders who earn more than a smidgen of Americans' confidence, the researchers say, are those in the military and medical fields. (Confidence in the media didn't slip, but it was in the sewer already.)"

Problems Surfacing With Electronic Voting Equipment. The CBS Evening News (11/6, story 3, Keteyian, 7.66M) reported, "Early voting has been going on in 15 states, an early test of the electronic voting equipment to be used by nearly 90% of the country tomorrow. But problems are beginning to surface." In Tennessee, "the site of a very tight Senate race, machines froze up in one county after 10,000 early voters, far more than expected showed up. The problem easily solved said a local official when more machines were activated. In Chicago's Cook County, a handful of 32,000 early voters claim machines switched their votes from Democrat to Republican. County officials later cited voter confusion and error. Similar events took place in parts of Texas and South Carolina. And in New Mexico, the state's computerized voter registration database crashed during the last hours of early voting this weekend, forcing those in line to write out a backup paper ballot or come back tomorrow. Well, both parties have armies of lawyers fanned out across the country, Katie, ready to file court challenges based on voting irregularities as they arise."

LATimes Says States Lack Safeguards For New Electronic Voting Machines. The Los Angeles Times (11/7, 918K) says in an editorial, "New voting machines, like new computers, are generally faster than old ones. But as every computer user knows, reliability is often more important than speed. And a lot depends on who's using the machine and how." After the "debacle with punch-card ballots in Florida six years ago, many counties across the country traded in their clunky old voting machines for high-tech models — many of which enable people to vote just by touching names on a video screen. The switch, "however, has drawn a new set of complaints. Some poll workers and computer scientists predict an election day plagued by long waits, glitches and miscounted votes. A more promising possibility is that, with the right equipment and procedures in place, electronic voting machines will deliver an unusually accurate and speedy count. Unfortunately, the experience this election day is sure to fall somewhere in between. A number of states lack the safeguards necessary to address the machines' vulnerabilities to glitches and tampering. And even in states with those safeguards, such as California, the integrity of the results will depend on voters taking extra steps to make sure everything works as it should."

WPost Says Concern Over Voting Machines Often Exaggerated. The Washington Post (11/7, 748K) editorializes, "Theories, many fanciful, abound about the ease of hacking into voting machines. There has been no evidence of that occurring, and the layers of scrutiny and security in force on Election Day cast doubt on whether experiments hatched in the privacy of a lab could be carried out in public. We support a verifiable paper trail to add a layer of safety and bolster public confidence. But there's a thin line between raising reasonable questions and persuading voters that there's no point in turning out."

Lynne Cheney Says Mainstream Media Lacks Political Diversity. Vice President Cheney's wife Lynne, during an appearance on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (11/6), commented, "We used to be told, and we have been told this time and again, that the political leanings of reporters didn't matter because they sought objectivity and tried to be fair and balanced. But statistics show this doesn't work. We have gone through a period, and we have seen this in the 2004 cycle, where the suggestion was made that you can't be fair and balanced. This was someone from ABC, you can't be fair and balanced because the Republicans deserved to be treated harshly. There is a real problem with a lack of diversity in news rooms as far as political opinions go."

Study Finds Network Iraq Stories Were Overwhelmingly Negative. The Washington Times' "Inside Politics" column (11/7, Pierce) reports that James Q. Wilson, in City Journal, writes, "'Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30, 2005, nearly 1,400 stories appeared on the ABC, CBS and NBC evening news. More than half focused on the costs and problems of the war, four times as many as those that discussed the successes. About 40 percent of the stories reported terrorist attacks; scarcely any reported the triumphs of American soldiers and Marines. The few positive stories about progress in Iraq were just a small fraction of all the broadcasts."

Tierney Says Study Shows Media Outlet Ideological Slant. The New York Times' John Tierney (11/7) contends that "most journalists do try to be objective, but as a group they, too, can become polarized by spending most of their time talking to fellow journalists and experts with similar views. One of the cleverest demonstrations of this effect was a study published last year in Harvard's Quarterly Journal of Economics. The researchers, Tim Groseclose and Jeffrey Milyo, devised a scale for measuring the slant of news reports by keeping track of which think tanks — liberal or conservative — were quoted most often. The researchers found that The Washington Times and Brit Hume's evening newscast on Fox fell on the conservative side of the scale, while all the other news media outlets they studied fell on the liberal side. The surprising result — to liberals, at least — was that Fox was closer to the ideological center than the Big Three evening newscasts as well as all the major newspapers and newsweeklies."

Hillary Clinton Spends Heavily In Possible Prelude To 2008. The New York Times (11/7, Zeleny, 1.21M) reports Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton "has spent more money in the midterm election cycle than any other politician running for office this year, campaign finance records show, investing more than twice as much as most candidates in tight races across the country." Clinton "spent $29.5 million through the middle of October, according to the Federal Election Commission, suggesting that she may have her sights on a future national campaign. While much of the amount is devoted to television advertising, it is the bills for catering, flowers and photography that elevated her tally far above other Senate candidates'." Sen. Rick Santorum "spent $21.5 million through the same time period, records show," but "his spending report comprises bills like $30.33 at Papa John's pizza, $59.50 at Panera Bread and $74.34 at the Olive Garden." Clinton's campaign "reported sending a $6,585 check to Flutterbyes for flowers in Las Vegas, $5,397.50 to Le Petit Gourmet Catering in Glendale, Colo., and $80,000 to Tavern on the Green in Manhattan." Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael E. Toner "said only a handful of Senate candidates had ever spent more. The spending patterns of the Clinton campaign demonstrated 'an extraordinary burn rate,' he said, which was particularly striking considering she did not seem to have a serious challenger in John Spencer, her Republican rival."

Cohen Says Clinton Is Boring. In his Washington Post column (11/7), Richard Cohen says, "In both theory and great expectations, today is the beginning of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. By nightfall she will have won lopsided reelection to the U.S. Senate, with plenty of money left over to start a presidential effort. She enjoys the sort of name recognition a president might envy and has the unalloyed good wishes of Democratic activists who have been waiting all these dark and awful years for a Clinton Restoration. After all, if the Bushes could do it -- one mediocre, the other incompetent -- then why not the brilliant and dazzling Clintons? The answer may be Hillary herself. She can bore a grateful nation. Such, anyway, was the effect of her recent appearance at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York." Given "who she is and, importantly, what she is -- smart, disciplined and, when she wants, charming -- there are those who say that this campaign is hers to lose. Last week she took a first step toward that goal."

Several Potential Candidates Hope To Parlay 2006 Campaign Stops Into 2008 Support. The Washington Post (11/7, A6, Murray, 748K) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, "who has barnstormed the country on behalf of Democratic gubernatorial and congressional candidates, is one of the A-list political celebrities of the 2006 campaign season. Other big draws: former president Bill Clinton, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani." The "headliners bring glitz to otherwise ho-hum rallies and help dazzle donors out of millions of dollars. They earn the gratitude of future officeholders and get to know thousands of voters." That gratitude is "all very useful, given that these non-candidates may run for president in two years -- or, as with Clinton, the non-candidate is married to a 2008 hopeful, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Giuliani's itinerary in the closing days included Iowa, New Hampshire, Michigan and South Carolina. All four states have Republican candidates on the ballot this year and will host crucial early primaries in 2008."

Libertarian Businessman Finds Success With Ballot Initiatives. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, Cooper, 2.03M) reports that while it "may turn out to be a bad year for Republicans," it may not be "for some of the conservative causes they support, thanks in part to a New York real-estate investor who has directed millions of dollars toward ballot initiatives to expand private-property rights, cut state budget growth, and impose term limits on judges." The "millionaire behind many ballot measures this year is Howard Rich, a publicity-shy, libertarian-leaning businessman who has become the go-to man for supporters of conservative ballot initiatives. The group Mr. Rich chairs, Americans for Limited Government, as well as a handful of other organizations that he fully controls or bankrolls, have put more than $15 million this election season into ballot campaigns in 14 states, public records show." Rich and "his supporters have sustained a number of setbacks, as many of his initiatives were kept from ballots because of vague wording or signature-gathering irregularities. But in nine states where the measures have survived, recent polling shows some chance of victory today."

Abortion Debate In South Dakota Regarded As "Remarkably Civil." In an op-ed for USA Today (11/7, 2.27M) Phillips Foundation fellow Laura Vanderkam writes, "South Dakota isn't usually a battleground state, but this fall, one of the country's most important political fights has been waged here. … In March, Gov. Mike Rounds signed a law that would ban almost all abortions within the state. Opponents countered by collecting enough signatures to put the issue on today's ballot as 'Referred Law 6.' The referendum's outcome doesn't matter. If the ban passes, it will be blocked in court. … What matters is that South Dakota's referendum represents one of the few times since 1973, when the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide, that voters have gotten to debate the question directly at the polls. And yes, debate is the right word. … South Dakotans have simply discovered that when you have to persuade your neighbors to join your cause — not judges in Washington — both sides become remarkably civil."

NYTimes Bemoans Proliferation Of Popular Initiatives. The New York Times (11/7, 1.21M) editorializes, "Ever since anti-taxation zealots in California rediscovered the populist frisson of the ballot initiative a generation ago, American politics has gone off on a binge of ballot proposals. Today is one of the busiest, with 81 citizen initiatives before voters in more than 20 states. Pity the poor voter who has to wade through a list of sometimes contradictory, sometimes misleading proposals, doing work that should be the responsibility of elected officials. … Scattershot initiative is no way to run a democracy; rebuke is no substitute for effective representation."

WSJournal Questions Spitzer's Ties To Casino Developer. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes that in a debate New York Attorney General Elliot Spitzer "was asked his position on bringing out-of-state Indian tribes to New York to open casinos." Spitzer said, "I don't believe out-of-state tribes should be here. And they won't be here under my administration." The Journal adds, "After the debate, however, someone must have tapped Mr. Spitzer on the shoulder and reminded him that one of his biggest campaign donors is Richard Fields, a casino developer who represents a Wisconsin Indian tribe that claims ancestral roots in the state and is seeking approval to build a casino in New York's Catskills region. And so a few days later, according to the Albany Times Union, 'Darren Dopp, the AG's spokesman, said Spitzer isn't including the Stockbridge Munsee Band of Mohicans, the Oneida Tribe of Wisconsin or the Seneca-Cayuga Tribe of Oklahoma among the out-of-state tribes that won't be allowed to develop here.' Which leaves us wondering who is included. Companies operated by Mr. Fields have donated some $200,000 to the campaign of Mr. Spitzer, who also used the developer's Gulfstream jet (at a steep discount) to travel to fund-raisers until he was criticized for the practice."

Wisconsin Democrats Accused Of Creating "Phony" Campaign Finance Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, 2.03M), in an editorial, writes, "Watching television this election cycle, you may have noticed that 'campaign finance reform' hasn't made political ads any cleaner. You may also have surmised that money counts as much as ever; its sources and middlemen have merely been reshuffled. What 'reform' has done, however, is make it easier for incumbents to keep power, and a case study is the Wisconsin Governor's race. The challenger is GOP Congressman Mark Green, who has criticized Democratic incumbent Jim Doyle over his vetoes against tax relief, and has also kicked off a debate on education and tort reform. Or at least those were the issues until Mr. Doyle's allies used the campaign-finance laws to change the subject and create a phony scandal."

Effects Of Negative Advertising Examined. The Washington Post's David Broder (11/7) writes, "I know that the political consultants are convinced that 'going negative' is the only way to move the vote and win an election. But at some point you wish that the grown-ups in this country -- those who don't see elections as a profit-making business -- would remind these talented character assassins of the damage they are doing to the system of representative government that has served this nation so well."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (11/7, 1.21M) Barry Schwartz, a professor of psychology at Swarthmore College, writes, "Another national election season has come to an end — the sorriest, sleaziest, most disheartening and embarrassing in memory. The best one can hope for is a candidate who is a complete cipher. How has American electoral politics come to this? … The effort by each side to coat the opposition in slime has made many of us cynical, giving us the sense that our task is to reject the worst, not select the best. Nobody's any good, we think, but some are worse than others. Let's keep those candidates out of office. Our job becomes one of denying, not awarding, office."

Hamas-Fatah Talks Fail To Reach Unity Government. The New York Times (11/7, Myre, 1.21M) reports Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "failed Monday in their efforts to finalize a deal on a national unity government but planned to try again on Tuesday, aides said. … Mr. Abbas, who leads the secular Fatah movement, and Mr. Haniya, who leads the militant Islamic faction Hamas, seemed close to an agreement on a new Palestinian government that would be made up of professionals and technocrats not directly linked to either faction. The new government would seek to end the Palestinians' international isolation and win a restoration of Western assistance cut after Hamas came to power in the spring." Nabil Aburdeineh, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, said, "There are issues to be discussed tomorrow and maybe the day after. We agreed on one thing: a national government of professionals will be coming." Meanwhile, Mustafa Barghouti said earlier on Monday that the sides had already reached an agreement "in principle."

Israeli Forces Begin Withdrawal From Gaza Town. The AP (11/7) reports that Israeli forces "pulled out of the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun before daybreak Tuesday, the military said, completing a weeklong sweep that killed more than 50 Palestinians. … The sweep came in from harsh international criticism because of the death toll and destruction. Israel said most of the dead were militants, but some were women and children. An Israeli soldier was also killed. On Monday, the sixth day of the sweep, at least seven Palestinians were killed, including a female suicide bomber."

Iran Seeks To Woo International Oil Companies. The Wall Street Journal (11/7, Jones, 2.03M) reports, "Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is backing changes to foreign energy contracts and retaining moderates in key roles in a bid to woo crucial foreign investors, senior industry and Iranian government officials say. But it remains to be seen whether the new Iranian leadership is ready to give foreign players the kind of stable and lucrative contracts they are seeking." Iran's "standoff with the U.S. and its allies over Iran's nuclear program and Mr. Ahmadinejad's anti-Western rhetoric have intensified nervousness among foreign firms about investing there." Iran "needs roughly $50 billion in foreign investment during the next decade to reach energy-production targets to avoid losing market share to other members of [OPEC]. Oil companies face a delicate balancing act: While they want to avoid U.S. ire, they are pressured by Iranian officials to attest to a friendly Iranian investment climate."

OPEC President Says Further Output Cuts May Be Necessary. The Washington Post/AP (11/7, D06, Elfehaid) reports that oil prices rose by nearly $1 Monday after Nigerian oil minister and OPEC president Edmund Daukoru "said the oil cartel may need to cut its output further and as armed protesters shut down one of his country's oil facilities." Daukoru told reporters, "The market is clearly oversupplied, clearly oversupplied." The AP says, "Regarding OPEC's decision last month to cut production effective Nov. 1, he said the effects of the reduced output have yet to be seen but would be soon. Daukoru told reporters that when OPEC meets in December members will discuss production, 'but it looks as if some further mopping up will be necessary.'"

US Appears To Be Shifting Stance On ICC. Under the headline "A Shift In The Debate On International Court," the Washington Post (11/7, A16, Boustany, 748K) reports, "When then-Undersecretary of State John R. Bolton nullified the US signature on the International Criminal Court treaty one month into President Bush's first term, he declared it the happiest moment in his years of service." At the time, "The bipartisan concern then was that American service members deployed overseas risked exposure to a foreign tribunal," but now, "as the court prepares to begin public hearings on its first case, the debate among senior US military officials seems to be shifting away from staunch opposition, and a fresh assessment of the court seems to be underway." According to the Post, the "new attitude has been prompted in part by the court's record since it began operations three years ago; Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo, an Argentine, has dismissed hundreds of petitions for cases against the United States" due to "lack of evidence, lack of jurisdiction, or because of the United States' ability to conduct its own investigations and trials."

Panel Calls For Streamlining UN Programs. The AP (11/7, Lederer) reports that a "high-level panel" has "called for streamlining UN programs to fight poverty, provide humanitarian aid and protect the environment, saying competition among agencies often duplicates efforts and fails to deliver results," according to a final draft of its report. The draft, obtained Monday by The AP, said that while the UN "is an indispensable force," it has outgrown its post-World War II structure and "is not as effective as it could be." The panel established by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan found that "too often, authority and management responsibility is dispersed among individuals and across organizations, thus limiting accountability for performance and results," and "better cooperation between organizations has been hindered by competition for funding, by mission creep and by outdated business practices." It will be up to Ban Ki-Moon, who takes over as secretary-general on Jan. 1, "to decide whether to implement the panel's recommendations."

Selection Of US Nominee To UN Food Program Seen As Blow To Reform. The Financial Times (11/7, Nations) reports US Undersecretary of State Josette Sheeran "appears almost certain to be named as head of the UN World Food Programme on Tuesday, in a decision diplomats fear marks an early blow to reform promises by Ban Ki-moon, the incoming secretary-general. A UN official said that James Morris, the current head of the WFP, told senior staff at the weekend of the decision to appoint the US official candidate to a post traditionally viewed as a US fiefdom. The announcement, some diplomats believe, would be an indication that fledgling efforts to make appointments on technical merit have foundered. … According to a number of diplomats and officials, there had been early indications that another candidate—Tony Banbury, WFP's regional director for Asia and a former White House employee—had led on merit. While an American, he was not Washington's choice. But late last week it emerged that, following high-level US lobbying and consultations between [UN Secretary General Kofi] Annan and Mr Ban, the decision was made to go with the US government's official nominee."

The Washington Times (11/7, A1, Pisik, 88K) says Sheeran was chosen "from a short list, which was never formally announced but was said by Secretariat officials to have included WFP Asia director Tony Banbury, an American with ties to the Clinton White House; Swiss development minister Walter Fust; and Robert Fowler, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations. But the appointment of Miss Sheeran, the Bush administration's nominee, had been expected" because Washington "contributes about one-third of the WFP's $2.9 billion budget and often applies pressure to ensure its nominees are successful."

In Diplomatic Defeat For US, Ortega Set To Claim Victory In Nicaragua. The results of Sunday's presidential election in Nicaragua received prominent coverage on the front page of many of the nation's largest dailies, as well as coverage on two of the three network news broadcasts where the anticipated victory of former president Daniel Ortega was overwhelmingly seen as a diplomatic defeat for the US. ABC World News (11/6, story 7, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Daniel Ortega was the Marxist president in the 1980s. He was in a deadly civil war before voters swept him from office. But tonight, it appears he's returning to power. The winner of Nicaragua's presidential election, Ortega, claims he is no longer a revolutionary. But if elected, it would be a defeat for Washington, which opposed him."

The CBS Evening News (11/6, story 8, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Another old Washington nemesis the making a comeback. Remember Daniel Ortega? He was President of Nicaragua's Sandinista government in the 1980s and led the fight against the US backed rebels. Tonight he's apparently won an election to get his old job back. Ortega says he's no longer a Marxist, but don't expect congratulations from the White House. One of Ortega's big supporters is Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez."

In a front page article, the Washington Post (11/7, A1, Aizenman, 748K) reports, "With 62 percent of precincts reporting, Ortega was comfortably leading the field of five presidential contenders with 39 percent of the vote, virtually ensuring him a first-round win under Nicaragua's electoral rules." The Post says Ortega's return to Nicaragua's presidency "would also constitute an embarrassing setback for the Bush administration. American officials have recently made thinly veiled threats that the United States would impose economic sanctions and other punitive measures if Ortega was reelected, arguing that Ortega has not changed despite his embrace of Catholicism, pronouncements in favor of a market economy and efforts to cast himself as the candidate of 'reconciliation.' US officials appeared motivated in part by concerns that Ortega would be an eager partner in pushing an anti-American alliance with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. Ortega's return is particularly galling to many in the Bush administration who devoted their careers to getting rid of him in the 1980s."

Also in a front page article, the New York Times (11/7, A1, McKinley, Replogle, 1.21M) says "an Ortega win in a five-way race would be a defeat for the Bush administration, which strongly opposed his election and worked hard to unite a fractious opposition against him with little success. The White House has said it would withdraw aid from an Ortega government." The Wall Street Journal (11/7, A6, de Cordoba, 2.03M) notes that Washington "actively campaigned against Mr. Ortega, in a kind of echo of the battles of the 1980s, when a US-backed rebel force known as the Contras battled Mr. Ortega's Sandinista government. The US ambassador staged a public campaign against Mr. Ortega and senior US officials said aid and investment could be sharply cut and the country would come to ruin if Mr. Ortega triumphed. Political analysts are sure to debate whether the US campaign backfired."

Under the headline "Ortega's Likely Return Seen As A Blow To US Policy," the Financial Times (11/7, Thomson) calls Ortega's likely victory "a blow for US foreign policy in central America," noting that "ever since Mr Ortega lost power to the centre-right Violeta de Chamorro in 1990, Washington has maneuvered to avoid his re-election. During this year's election campaign, Paul Trivelli, the US ambassador in Managua, has spoken out frequently to warn Nicaraguans of the perceived dangers of a Sandinista government. Recently Mr Trivelli also warned of Mr Ortega's growing friendship with Hugo Chávez, the oil-rich and anti-US Venezuelan president. In a recent interview with the Financial Times, Mr Trivelli even warned that an Ortega-led government would provoke significant changes to the currently healthy bilateral relationship." The Ambassador was quoted as saying, "The whole gamut of the relationship that I talked about between the US and Nicaragua would definitely be re-examined -- and not only by the executive or the State Department or the White House but by the US Congress." The AP (11/7, Carl), Los Angeles Times (11/7, Tobar, 918K) and USA Today (11/7, Llana, 2.27M) run similar reports.

Most Nations Decline In Corruption Ratings. The AP (11/7, Rising) reports, "Nearly three-quarters of 163 countries ranked in a new survey suffer from a perception of serious corruption, while in nearly half it is seen as rampant," according to Transparency International's 2006 Corruption Perceptions Index. The watchdog "gives the worst scores to many of the world's poorest countries, including almost all African nations, indicating a strong correlation between corruption and poverty. The stragglers also included several so-called 'failed states,' including Iraq, which dropped from place 137 last year to second-last as the situation there continues to deteriorate."

US Corruption Ranking Drops. Meanwhile, the Financial Times (11/7, Williamson) reports the US has suffered a "significant worsening" in its perceived levels of corruption "following a series of business scandals and increasing worries over political party funding," the index found. Huguette Labelle, head of the Berlin-based group, "said the reasons could include the greater awareness of corruption after the Enron and Worldcom business scandals, and growing concern in the US that private and business donations to politicians was having a corrupting influence on political affairs."

Rash Of Kidnappings Causes Alarm In Sri Lanka. In a front page article, the New York Times (11/7, A1, Sengupta, 1.21M) reports that a "rash of mysterious abductions has come to haunt" Sri Lanka amidst its "newly revived ethnic conflict." The Times says the kidnappings "contain eerie echoes of the horrors of a generation ago, when this island nation achieved notoriety for tens of thousands of disappearances." A "breakaway Tamil rebel faction" is "widely accused of being allied with the government and…of having a hand in the abductions." The government "denies having any link to the group, called the Karuna faction," but "despite the official denials, the abductions have spread a cloud over the administration of President Mahinda Rajapakse, including a recommendation by the United Nations high commissioner for human rights,

Louise Arbour, to dispatch foreign monitors to investigate rights abuses here."

Stephens Urges US Action On Syrian Threats To Lebanon. Wall Street Journal (11/7, A13, 2.03M) columnist Bret Stephens writes, "The White House issued a remarkable statement last Wednesday warning of 'mounting evidence that the Syrian and Iranian governments, Hezbollah and their Lebanese allies are preparing to topple Lebanon's democratically elected government.'" At the same time, he notes that the "forthcoming report of former Secretary of State James Baker's Iraq Study Group…is rumored to urge the Bush administration to re-engage Damascus diplomatically. In recent days [Syrian President Bashar] Assad has been talking a blue streak about his willingness to make peace with Israel, a signal that he might be willing to play ball on that front and maybe in Iraq if only the Administration lets him have his way in Lebanon." Stephens says that "saving Lebanon will require focus, nerve and imagination, qualities hitherto absent from [Secretary Condoleezza] Rice's tenure at State. Maybe if her boss loses his majority in Congress, he'll be less inclined to let the remainder of his legacy go down the drain with it."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Appeals Court Weighs Prisoners' Right To Fight Detention (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091428

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6 — The Bush administration's successful effort to have Congress eliminate the right of Guantánamo prisoners to challenge their detentions before federal judges is now moving toward what may be an epic battle in the courts.

And while lawsuits on the topic are spread across the judiciary, the principal battleground, legal experts say, is the federal appeals court in Washington. That court has been considering for three years whether the hundreds of prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have the right of habeas corpus — that is, the ability to ask a federal judge to review the reasons for their detention.

But the law passed by Congress last month eliminating the habeas right supersedes almost all of the arguments that have gone before and is now the focus of the legal confrontation, government and civil liberties lawyers agree. In a ruling last June, the Supreme Court had said that an earlier measure did not eliminate habeas lawsuits that were already in the courts. However, in October, the administration used more explicit language, saying the new law retroactively blocked federal courts from entertaining habeas lawsuits by Guantánamo detainees.

The three-judge appeals court panel will have to decide whether the pending lawsuits brought by the 430 or so remaining detainees at Guantánamo should be thrown out, as the Bush administration has argued, or whether the new law is unconstitutional, as civil liberties groups have contended.

Whatever resolution is reached by the three appellate judges — David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph, both appointees of Republican presidents, and Judith W. Rogers, appointed by a Democrat — it will almost certainly end up before the Supreme Court. A decision could come from the appeals court before the end of the year.

Lawyers for the detainees said in a recent brief that despite the wording of the new law, Congress could not take away the right to bring such habeas corpus lawsuits because that would violate the Constitution.

Their brief notes that the Constitution provides that Congress may suspend the right only in cases of rebellion or invasion, as President Abraham Lincoln did during the Civil War. Congress may provide a substitute, but only one that is equivalent to a full-blown habeas action, the lawyers said in their brief.

Justice Department officials said they would argue that the law is constitutional when they issue their formal reply in a brief due next Monday.

David B. Rivkin Jr., a White House counsel in the administration of the first President Bush, said he believed the department would emphasize that the new law provided an adequate substitute method for a detainee to challenge his confinement.

A proceeding held for each prisoner at Guantánamo, called a Combatant Status Review Tribunal, is presumed to provide a legally sufficient justification for detention, under the new law. That proceeding, in which three military officers decide if a prisoner is rightfully deemed to be an unlawful enemy combatant, may be appealed directly to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Mr. Rivkin, an authority on national security law who supports the administration, said the law did not suspend habeas corpus but instead provided a new way for it to be exercised.

"The government is saying, 'Look, we're not denying anyone's chance to get habeas,' " he said. "We're just providing a different way."

Mr. Rivkin said the judges on the appeals court panel should be especially receptive to the idea that the process is fair because the law provides for that very court to hear any appeals from the military tribunals.

But the detainees' lawyers have argued that the law provides for only a limited review of the military tribunals by the appeals court. Under the new law, they said, the appeals court may not look behind the record of the military tribunal, and the judges, in effect, are required to accept all of the military's assertions.

Similar objections to the law are contained in a brief filed by seven former federal judges, who were appointed by both Democratic and Republican administrations. The judges say in their brief that the law has "one specific and fundamental flaw," namely that the military tribunals may accept evidence obtained by torture. The judges said the limited review for the appeals court in the new law "cannot remove the stain of torture because the court, at least according to the government, cannot alter or expand the record created by the military."

They said that "no habeas court would permit detentions based on evidence obtained in this manner."

New Rules Go Into Effect At EU Airports (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0091429

The AP, November 7, 2006

Passengers were allowed to take only small amounts of liquids on board airplanes Monday as strict new security measures on hand baggage went into effect across the European Union.

The new EU rules limit passengers to carrying 100 milliliters (a fifth of a pint) of liquid per container on board planes — part of regulations imposed after British police said in August that they had broken up a plot to bring down U.S.-bound flights with liquid-based explosives.

New restrictions on the size of carry-on luggage will be introduced in April.

All liquids — not only water and soft drinks but also soups, creams, lotions, oils, perfumes, sprays, gels, toothpaste and shaving cream — are subject to security checks before passengers board their planes.

The containers must fit into a clear re-sealable plastic bag to be presented at security checkpoints, officials said.

The new rules do not affect liquids packed in checked luggage, or drinks and perfumes bought at airport shops after passengers clear security.

Baby foods and medicines also are exempt but can be subject to inspection, officials said.

"All airports in the European Union must apply the new regulations to protect civil aviation against the threat of homemade liquid explosives," EU spokesman Ferran Tarradellas Espuny said over the weekend. "Liquids in hand luggage have to be put in a separate bag."

The rules went into effect Monday at all airports within the 25-nation EU and in Norway, Iceland and Switzerland.

Passengers also are required to remove coats and jackets at security checks, and remove laptop computers and other large electrical items from bags for inspection.

Starting April 17, new rules on cabin baggage will limit hand luggage to a maximum 56 by 45 by 25 centimeters (22 by 17 by 10 inches) — with exceptions for some items, such as musical instruments.

Accused Iraqi Agent Held At Federal Supermax Prison In Colorado (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - An Indiana truck driver convicted of plotting to sell U.S. secrets to Saddam Hussein is incarcerated at a federal super-maximum-security prison in Colorado under an order approved by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a report Monday said.

Justice Department officials have isolated Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 54, of Greenfield, under a policy that permits the FBI to eavesdrop on his conversations, restrict his access to news reports and prohibit anyone other than attorneys and family members from talking to him, The Indianapolis Star reported.

Shaaban is being held under an order known as a special administrative measure, which is meant to keep federal inmates from inciting violent attacks from prison or disclosing classified information that could harm national security.

William Dazey Jr., a public defender who assisted Shaaban at his trial in U.S. District Court in Indianapolis earlier trial this year, said the order was unusual.

"I have not seen evidence that would support the notion (Shaaban) is a threat to the United States," Dazey said.

Among the other convicts held under similar conditions at the Florence Federal Correctional Complex about 90 miles south of Denver are Zacarias Moussaoui, the alleged "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and Richard Reid, who tried in December 2001 to detonate plastic explosives in his shoe on a Paris-to-Miami flight.

At Shaaban's sentencing, Judge John Tinder recommended placing Shaaban in a federal prison at Terre Haute, closer to his wife and young son, who remain in Greenfield.

However, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sharon Jackson requested the restrictions, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales initialed the order.

Jackson is on special assignment with the Justice Department and was not available for comment Monday, said Mary Bippus, a spokeswoman for the agency in Indianapolis.

Shaaban was stripped of his U.S. citizenship after being found guilty in January of six federal charges, including illegally acting as an agent of the Iraqi government.

DOJ_NMG_0091430

He was sentenced to 13 years, four months in prison after a trial in which prosecutors portrayed him as a clever spy who had offered to sell the names of more than 60 clandestine CIA operatives to Iraqi intelligence officials for millions.

Under special administrative measures, the Justice Department must certify a substantial risk exists that an inmate's communications could result in death or serious bodily injury to others.

The regulation states the inmate must be notified of the restrictions and the justification. However, Shaaban received an order that redacted the justification.

Critics question the necessity and the psychological effects of limiting virtually all contact with the outside world for years at a time.

"A lot of this is show. It's playing to people's fears about terrorism," said Khurrum Wahid, an attorney with offices in New York and Miami who defends terror suspects.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Feds Target Terrorist Recruiting In Prisons (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal government is working with prisons in dozens of states to improve intelligence gathering and monitoring of inmates in a stepped-up campaign to curb homegrown terrorism behind bars.

The FBI and Homeland Security Department are urging prison officials to do more extensive background checks on workers and volunteers who meet with inmates. And members of Congress are looking at possible reforms in prison security as a way to combat the spread of extremist Islamic beliefs.

Chief among the concerns is that radical Muslim clerics could have access to prisoners and coerce them with terrorist literature.

“It's a concern because we know that violent extremist groups will target people in prisons,” said Donald Van Duyn, the FBI's counterterrorism director. “We're working to improve monitoring, improve training and increase awareness.”

The intensified surveillance follows the recent arrests of people alleged to be home-grown terrorism suspects in London and Canada, which have raised concerns that the United States may be vulnerable to terrorism at the hands of its own citizens. British authorities said in August that they broke up a conspiracy to blow up U.S.-bound airliners with liquid bombs, and Canadian officials charged 17 people in June with an al-Qaeda-inspired plot to possess 3 tons of bombmaking materials.

Homeland Security officials, who are sending investigators to prisons around the country to gather intelligence on inmate radicalization, are worried that similar plots could be hatched in U.S. prisons. “Prisons can be a breeding ground,” says Charles Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer.

Among the steps that the FBI and Homeland Security are urging prisons to take:

•Develop more informants and set up more intelligence units in state prison systems. The FBI is encouraging prison systems to set up their own intelligence units and to work with local agents to share information. The bureau won't say whether it has undercover agents in the nation's prisons.

•Train more prison staff to recognize signs that prisoners are turning to extremist propaganda, sharing radical views, and attempting to convert other inmates.

•Conduct background checks on volunteers and workers to ensure extremist Muslim clerics don't have access to prisoners.

“Our concern is not with prison inmates converting to Islam,” says Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee. “For many converts, this religion brings the direction and purpose their lives previously lacked.”

A case in California shows how some U.S. prisons have spawned converts to radical forms of Islam.

Members of an extremist group robbed a dozen Los Angeles gas stations in 2005 to raise money to finance terrorist attacks on the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0091431

The group's founder, Kevin James, is alleged by the FBI to have recruited members from prison. Four members of the group are awaiting trial on charges including conspiracy to levy war against the U.S. government.

"We have to wonder how many other such conspiracies are taking shape under the radar in other prisons," Collins says.

Prosecutors: Terrorists Plotted More Attacks On NYC, London (USAT/AP)

By David Stringer

USA Today, November 7, 2006

LONDON — An al-Qaeda operative captured in Britain planned to bomb the New York Stock Exchange and plotted a series of attacks on London, one to blow up a London subway train as it passed below the River Thames, prosecutors said at a sentencing hearing Monday.

Dhiren Barot, 34, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic. He could face a life sentence in Britain and is wanted in the USA and Yemen on separate terror-related charges.

The Muslim convert and seven alleged accomplices spent more than four years making detailed plans to attack a host of financial industry targets in the USA. They also allegedly plotted to detonate limousines packed with explosives in the underground garages of famous London hotels and train stations.

Prosecutor Edmund Lawson said the group considered using a radioactive "dirty bomb" and ramming a gasoline tanker into a high-profile British target.

Lawson showed clips of a reconnaissance video shot in 2001 during a visit to New York by Barot. The shaky footage — shown on screens in the courthouse — zoomed in on the World Trade Center as an unseen man mimicked the sound of an explosion. Prosecutors said Barot did not have prior knowledge of the Sept. 11 terror attacks that killed almost 3,000 people.

Lawson said that starting in 1995, Barot trained at terrorist camps in Pakistan, Kashmir, Malaysia and the Philippines — crisscrossing the globe to refine skills at bombmaking and with weapons and chemicals. Born in India and raised in Britain since 1972, Barot became the "organizer of major terrorist activity designed to strike at the very heart of both America and the United Kingdom," Lawson said.

In August 2000 and March 2001, Barot traveled to the USA, visiting an aunt in New Jersey, Lawson said.

Plans outlining details of the U.S. attacks were found on a computer after Barot's arrest in August 2004. The 80-minute New York reconnaissance footage was spliced into a videotape of Die Hard with a Vengeance, Lawson said. The video contained shots of entrances, exits and security barriers at the New York Stock Exchange and the Citigroup headquarters.

Prosecutors said Barot's targets included the World Bank headquarters and the International Monetary Fund, both in Washington, the Citigroup buildings in New York and the Prudential building in Newark, N.J.

Barot is wanted in the USA on charges of conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction. Under British law, domestic proceedings take precedence over an extradition. He also is wanted in Yemen in the kidnappings of Westerners in 1988.

Under the alias Issa al-Britani, Barot was named in the report of the U.S. commission that examined the Sept. 11 attacks, as an associate of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged planner. The report said Mohammed ordered al-Britani to identify bomb targets in New York.

British Court Hears Of Qaeda Plans For 'Black Day' (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 6 — A prosecutor told a court here on Monday that Dhiren Barot, the most senior operative of Al Qaeda known to have been captured here, had plotted "a memorable black day for the enemies of Islam" by killing "hundreds if not thousands of innocent people" in Britain and the United States.

Mr. Barot was arrested in Britain with seven others in August 2004, after a major security alert in the United States.

He pleaded guilty in October to a charge of conspiracy to murder.

The potential targets included the New York Stock Exchange, the headquarters of the International Monetary Fund in Washington and, in London, a subway train as it traveled under the Thames. Other supposed targets included Citigroup in Manhattan and the Prudential building in Newark, prosecutors have said.

DOJ_NMG_0091432

He could face life in prison when two days of pre-sentencing hearings conclude Tuesday. He is also wanted in the United States.

Mr. Barot, 34, who converted to Islam from Hinduism, was said to have worked on plans to use a radioactive so-called "dirty bomb" and limousines jammed with gas canisters to explode in underground parking garages.

Edmund Lawson, the prosecutor, said Mr. Barot had planned "to carry out massive explosions here and in the United States, the principal object being to kill hundreds, if not thousands, of innocent people without warning."

Details of the investigation were made public only after several news organizations sought a court ruling lifting restrictions on reporting. The prosecutor described him as a young man who converted to Islam in his early 20s, traveled to Pakistan for terrorist training in 1995 and then to the United States to assess potential targets for Al Qaeda in 2000 and 2001.

The planned operations in the United States were suspended after what Al Qaeda saw as the "success" of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the prosecution said. But, according to Mr. Lawson, notes, documents and computer evidence from Mr. Barot showed that he later made plans for attacks in Britain.

In a note, Mr. Lawson said, Mr. Barot referred to the idea of attacking a London subway train as it traveled under the Thames.

"Imagine the chaos that would be caused if a powerful explosion were to rip through here and actually rupture the river itself," Mr. Barot was said to have written. "That would cause pandemonium, what with the explosions, flooding, drowning etc. that would occur."

Mr. Lawson said Mr. Barot returned to Pakistan in early 2004, apparently to seek approval and financing for his plans. "There were plans for the detonation of a radiation dispersal device, more commonly known as a dirty bomb, the use of a petrol tanker to cause an explosion, and an attack on London's rail or Underground network," Mr. Lawson said.

Court Told Of Terrorist's Plans To Kill Thousands (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

LONDON -- One of the top al Qaeda operatives known to have been captured in Britain appeared in court amid heavy security yesterday for sentencing in a plot to bomb the New York Stock Exchange, the International Monetary Fund headquarters in Washington and to use a dirty bomb in London.

Dhiren Barot, 34, started plotting six years ago for a "memorable black day for the enemies of Islam," prosecutor Edmund Lawson said at the hearing, which was punctuated by a dramatic moment when prosecutors showed a March 2001 video shot while Barot was in New York. The camera zooms in to the World Trade Center and a man is then heard mimicking the sound of an explosion.

"This, we have to bear in mind, was five months before 9/11," Mr. Lawson said.

Flanked by two guards, Barot sat expressionless behind a glass partition as the proceedings began. He pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to commit mass murder in terrorist plots on both sides of the Atlantic. He faces a life sentence.

The criminal plot was to carry out massive explosions in Britain and in the United States, and was meant to kill "hundreds if not thousands of innocent people without warning," Mr. Lawson said.

Barot planned to cram three limousines with gas cylinders and explosives and detonate them in underground London parking garages, Mr. Lawson said. He also identified London hotels such as the Ritz and the Savoy, and railway stations such as London's Waterloo, Paddington and King's Cross as targets. Other attacks in Britain included using a dirty bomb, although experts question whether it would have been lethal.

Mr. Lawson, citing computer files recovered by police, said Barot planned to bomb a subway train as it traveled through a tunnel under the River Thames.

"If a powerful explosion were to rip through here and actually rupture the river itself, this would cause pandemonium ... explosions, flooding, drowning," Barot wrote in the computer documents found, according to Mr. Lawson.

Barot was born a Hindu in India, but was brought to Britain as a toddler. He converted to Islam when he was about 20, Mr. Lawson said.

DOJ_NMG_0091433

After leaving his job as an airline-ticket clerk in Britain, he went to Pakistan and attended a terrorist-training camp in the Pakistan-controlled area of Kashmir for at least four months, Mr. Lawson said.

Investigators confiscated Barot's notes that showed he gained extensive training in the use of weapons, chemicals and bomb design. In 1998, he traveled to Malaysia and in 1999 the Philippines, where he attended the Jemaah Islamiyah terrorist-training camp, Mr. Lawson said.

In August 2000 and March 2001, Barot went on two reconnaissance trips to the United States, Mr. Lawson said.

It was this 2001 trip to Manhattan when prosecutors said the video of the World Trade Center was shot.

"It is memorable for its macabre prophecy," said Mr. Lawson, who said he didn't think Barot had prior knowledge of the September 11 attacks.

Government Officials And Muslim Teens Meet At Taping Of Talk Show (NY1)

NY1, November 7, 2006

Muslim students put FBI and immigration officials on the hot seat Sunday at a taping in Queens of a well known Pakistani talk show. NY1 Criminal Justice reporter Solana Pyne was there as a panel answered questions about everything from FBI training to the success of the war on terror.

An unusual gathering even for a place as diverse as Queens, as a well known Pakistani talk show host taped a program to bring back home.

"There is an important question, what is the outcome of this war on terror after five years," asked talk-show host Hamid Mir.

A room full of students asked questions.

"Are FBI agents or other government officials trained, or getting trained to learn more about Islam?" asked one student in attendance.

Answering them was a member of parliament from the United Kingdom, a local imam, Muslim academics from both coasts, as well as the head of the New York office for Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency, and an FBI special agent.

"FBI Agents can't all look like me," said FBI special agent, Andrew Arena. "They can't all be white guys. We have got to diversify and that's very, very important. We train our agents from day one in the academy to understand the Muslim faith."

In the last few years, FBI and immigration officials have held several meetings with members of the city's Muslim communities, fielding both questions and complaints. But the event Sunday evening was unusual, not only because it included Muslim leaders from across the country, but also because it was the first with Muslim teens and young adults.

"There was some concern on the community's part, particularly after the bombings in the United Kingdom, that there were certain potential segments of the Muslim-American youth in the United States that might be disenfranchised," said Martin Ficke of the Federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency. "And of course they have more, you know, potential to be radicalized."

And the forum, held just two days before the U.S. elections, was a chance to let students have their voices heard by government officials. It was also a chance for government agencies to recruit.

"I've had a lot of people come up to me tonight and ask about job opportunities with the FBI," said Arena. "This is the future of the FBI."

Hundreds of students attended the event, and as to how successful it was, well, it depends on who was asked.

"The questions were repetitive and the panel was composed of all non-students, with the exception of one, who did not even receive a chance to speak," said Fatima Ashraf, a forum participant.

"I think this is how we are going to be able to show to America, and to the rest of the world, that we can also contribute good ideas that can help bridge the gaps," added Ali Nayyar, another forum participant.

But even those who wished the event had been organized differently said they hope there will continue to be more events that allow students to have their say.

Liquids Allowed On Flights, But Bring Patience, Too (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

DOJ_NMG_0091434

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

NEW YORK

Flying home this Thanksgiving? There are two things experts say are essential to bring: patience and a sense of humor.

Planes are expected to be fuller, prices higher, and security lines longer than ever.

The good news is that means some major airlines are finally turning a profit in the post-9/11 world. The bad news is passengers are paying for it with their time and comfort.

"It's a very strong travel season. We're looking at some of the highest load factors we've ever seen at one of the busiest times of the year," says Darryl Jenkins, an aviation expert in Marshall, Va. "Go to the airport early, and go with excessive amounts of humor."

Load factor is aviation jargon for the percentage of seats occupied by paying customers. Usually, 65 to 75 percent of seats are filled, so it wasn't unusual in the past to expect that center seat to be empty so you could spread out a bit and relax - but no more.

This summer load factors were 90 to 100 percent, and that's where they're expected to stay this holiday season. The reason is major airlines have cut back on the number of planes flying so they can increase the amount of money they make on each one that goes aloft.

A recent scientific poll for Expedia.com also found that of people who plan to travel by air this holiday, 80 percent plan to travel as much or more than last year. So, to that full center seat add winter coats and presents for your mother, and you'll be prepared for what to expect: discomfort and inflexibility. Experts say if you're late to the airport, unlike in the old days, don't expect to be able to hop on the next flight.

"If you think, 'Oh, there are 10 flights a day to New York, I'll just get on the next one,' the likelihood of that happening is much, much less now," says Chris McGinnis, editor of Expedia Travel Trendwatch, a quarterly report on the travel industry, based in San Francisco. "That can really botch a trip if it's only three days, so I would say always err on the side of being early and just hanging out at the airport."

Then, of course, there are those vaunted Transportation Security Administration security checks - the other major reason experts are urging travelers to get to the airport as early as possible. During the holidays a lot of people fly who usually don't. So many may be confused about what the TSA will and will not allow on board.

For instance, did you know that some liquids and gels are now allowed? But they have to be in three-ounce containers inside quart-sized sealable baggies, not gallon- or a sandwich-sized. All lighters are banned, but you can bring on four books of matches. TSA's website, at www.tsa.gov, details these rules and is a must-see for anyone who hasn't flown in recent months.

"To make it more understandable to people we've launched a campaign called 3-1-1," says Ellen Howe, a TSA spokeswoman. "It's a reminder of three ounces or less, one quart-sized bag, one bag per traveler, and that bag needs to be pulled out of your carry-on and placed into the bin."

But even with all of the efforts the TSA is making to ensure passengers are informed and its employees are abreast of the current requirements, experts across the board say there's still too much inconsistency.

"You go there one day and one thing is OK, and then the next day you're told that is no longer OK," says Mr. Jenkins. "That's the biggest problem we have with the airlines, is that nobody knows what's kosher."

Knowing what's kosher is crucial because just a few seconds of delay per passenger can add up to very long lines with delays stretching as many as two hours.

"A delay of 10 seconds per passenger, in fact, could back up the line to the point where people could start to miss their flights," says Mike Callinan, president of Productivity Apex Inc. in Orlando, Fla., which did an analysis for the Orlando International Airport.

Some analysts contend that those wait lines and the hassle of security could have been greatly reduced if the TSA had been more efficient in getting the Registered Traveler and Secure Flight programs up across the country. The Registered Traveler program is designed to speed frequent fliers through the screening process once they've volunteered biometric and background information and paid a fee to a government-approved private company. So far, only the airport in Orlando is operating a pilot program, although 13 others have applied to run such programs.

The other program, Secure Flight, is designed to simplify the manner in which passenger names are checked against the federal government's Terror Watch List. After spending hundreds of millions of dollars, the program has been scrapped and sent back to the drawing board because of privacy concerns.

The TSA's Ms. Howe defends the decision, saying, "We'd rather get it right than fast." And some travel experts agree. Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa., says the current screening system needs to be improved before any new layers are added.

"If you're going to put new processes on top of things that aren't yet operating at an efficient or proficient level, then you can actually complicate matters, and customer service can suffer more," he says.

Will Long Lines Be In The Bag This Thanksgiving? (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, November 7, 2006

ATLANTA — Many air travelers have been slow to catch on to the new rules of flying, and government and airline officials fear the confusion could snarl security lines at some of the USA's busiest airports Thanksgiving week.

At major airports such as Atlanta Hartsfield-Jackson, Washington Dulles, Las Vegas and others, many passengers arrive unaware of rules that have restricted what may be carried aboard a flight since the uncovering in London last August of an alleged terrorist bombing plot.

Despite strict rules barring large containers of liquids in carry-on bags, passengers are showing up with big containers of shampoo, toothpaste, aftershave, water, even liquor. Such errors force security screeners to instruct passengers, remove the banned items and make time-consuming hand searches of bags. The result: slower lines.

ADVICE: Not following baggie rules can bog down lines

If the Atlanta airport — the USA's busiest — is any sign, it could be a tough season when the volume of travelers soars later this month for Thanksgiving. Willie Williams, federal security director at Hartsfield-Jackson, says screening there is running as much as 30% slower than before the liquids ban.

Jack Smith, AirTran Airways' customer service chief, says the discount carrier is worried about the screening slowdown not only at its Atlanta hub but across its system.

"We're concerned, and we're doing everything we can to educate the customer," Smith says.

Airline officials say lines have increased at almost every sizable airport. But at certain airports, high volumes of less-experienced leisure travelers, combined with the physical layout, give rise to extraordinary problems. At the worst times at Hartsfield-Jackson — early morning on Monday and Saturday — security lines can snake back from the checkpoints through the terminal's atrium, down the hallways to the rapid transit station and back up the hallway to the luggage carousels.

Wait times on Columbus Day, a Monday, ran well over an hour after bad weather the day before forced AirTran and Delta Air Lines, the biggest carrier at Atlanta, to rebook some passengers. It wasn't that bad early last Saturday. Lines were long, but they moved relatively quickly. The longest wait to get through the checkpoint ran 19 minutes at 8 a.m.

Several travelers grumbled that they didn't know or forgot about the liquids restriction until the security agents reminded them at the start of the lines.

"I thought the ban was over," says Shane Hoff, a sales manager in Atlanta who had to throw away his shaving cream and deodorant in a large trash bin next to the agents' desks.

"I'm traveling with my wife's family. I'm going to smell all weekend," he said. "But it's not the end of the world."

Recent Mondays have also been tough.

"Atlanta Hartsfield on Monday morning looks like Disney World during spring break," says Atlanta-based business traveler Pat Everett, a hospital consultant.

Everett won't be traveling over the holidays. "I can't imagine what it's going to be like."

The holidays tend to see more infrequent fliers more likely to be unfamiliar with the rules. Airline officials worry that long security lines around Thanksgiving could cause passengers to miss their flights at a time when planes are too full to accommodate travelers left behind.

DOJ_NMG_0091436

Officials also worry that bad experiences by passengers, and publicity about long airport waits at the holidays, will discourage some people from flying in the future.

"We're concerned about the next 30 days or so," says Christopher White, spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration, which runs airport checkpoints nationwide. "We have all hands on deck."

In October, several big airports were showing much longer wait times than in July, before the liquids ban, according to TSA figures. But even the biggest crowds in October don't come close to what airports are bracing for at Thanksgiving. Fully 50% more passengers surge to the airport on the day before Thanksgiving than on a typical Wednesday. The Sunday after Thanksgiving sees 15% more passengers than a typical Sunday.

'They won't have a clue'

The growing lines have prompted the TSA to launch a national public education campaign in the media, on its website (www.tsa.gov) and at airports to help passengers obey the liquids rules.

Major airports such as Atlanta and Las Vegas McCarran are waging their own education campaigns with press conferences, videos shown in area hotels and staff inside the airport telling passengers what they can take aboard.

Despite the outreach, says Randy Walker, director of Las Vegas McCarran, "I think this holiday season will be problematic." Airports nationally "will be getting a lot of people who haven't traveled since all this happened, and they won't have a clue."

At Las Vegas airport last week, passenger Tracy Parkswas surprised by the plastic bag rule.

"I just don't understand the baggie," said Parks, a therapist from Kansas City, Mo. He and his friend, Brian Thompson, were stopped from carrying bottled water and cologne in their carry-on bags, and had to check them.

"Now that I know about the baggie, I will use the baggie," Parks said.

Walker says a passenger recently showed up at a checkpoint there carrying a bottle of whiskey. He told the screeners it was exempt from the rules, and insisted the screeners just wanted it for themselves. Eventually, the man relinquished it.

In New Orleans, TSA says, a passenger arrived at a checkpoint with a pint-size bottle of hot sauce. In Atlanta, a woman showed up with so many little bottles of liquor that they wouldn't all fit inside a one-quart zip-top bag.

When the screeners told her she couldn't take them all through the checkpoint, she drank three of the bottles and took the rest aboard.

According to the TSA, passengers are still showing up at checkpoints with full-size containers of toiletries inside their carry-on luggage. Other passengers don't have their little toiletries inside a zip-top bag, or they have a bag that's much bigger than a quart.

Still others are failing to remove the bag containing the toiletries from their carry-ons before X-ray screening. That forces the screeners to hand check the bag on the other side of the X-ray, slowing down the line.

Passengers "are doing it innocently," says Williams, the Atlanta security official. "They're not trying to sneak something through."

Large bottles of liquids, no matter how costly or important to the traveler, must be discarded before the checkpoint — or the suitcase must be checked.

The evolution of the liquid ban

The liquids crisis began Aug. 10. British authorities arrested more than 20 men in London believed to be plotting to blow up U.S.-bound trans-Atlantic jets using liquid explosives taken onto planes in carry-on luggage.

The TSA and its counterpart in Britain abruptly banned all liquids and gels from carry-ons. Only baby formula and prescription medicines were exempt.

The ban initially gridlocked airports and forced most passengers to check their luggage, because liquids were still allowed in checked luggage. The resulting surge in checked luggage overwhelmed some luggage systems, contributing to a 26% year-over-year spike in the rate of complaints about mishandled luggage in August.

Responding to appeals from airlines and business traveler groups, the TSA on Sept. 25 revised the rules to allow small quantities of toiletries through checkpoints. Now, passengers may bring typical travel items such as shampoo, toothpaste and makeup through security checkpoints, provided they're in 3-ounce or smaller containers that all fit inside a 1-quart clear plastic zip-top bag. Only one bag per passenger is allowed. TSA calls this the 3-1-1 rule. Most drugstores stock popular toiletries in small travel sizes.

A zip-top bag containing the toiletries must be removed from a carry-on suitcase and placed in a separate tray prior to screening.

Airport stores in Atlanta, Dallas/Fort Worth and elsewhere are selling zip-top plastic bags for 50 cents apiece. Bob Hope Airport in Burbank, Calif., is more generous: It's giving away 6,000 bags this season.

TSA officials say tests by the FBI found it's highly unlikely that terrorists could destroy a jet with a bomb made from such small amounts of fluids.

Passengers are also allowed to carry on water and toiletries in any quantity bought at airport shops beyond security checkpoints, including liquor and perfume bought at duty-free shops. Liquids are screened before being sold in secure airport areas.

Inexperienced screeners

Although the Atlanta airport is fully staffed, security lines have grown just as TSA at many airports is battling chronically high turnover rates among screeners. Despite a retention bonus program offered by the TSA, one in five security screeners left his or her job during the fiscal year that ended Sept. 30. That has caused staffing problems at some airports, and some screeners are new and inexperienced.

Business traveler Everett says a screener at Hartsfield recently forced him to give up an unmarked, 3-ounce plastic bottle containing his favorite aftershave, Old Spice. She told him the bottle had to have a manufacturer's label. Although that's not correct, Everett had to throw it out.

After that, Everett bought a travel-size container of mouthwash, poured out the mouthwash, and — at the risk of smelling minty — poured in Old Spice. "It sails through the checkpoint," he says.

TSA is pulling out all the stops to keep lines moving over the holidays. Williams says the Atlanta airport is fully staffed with screeners and will have all 22 checkpoint lanes open Thanksgiving week.

Twenty-two uniformed airport employees trained by TSA will be telling passengers what they can and cannot bring aboard before they get to the checkpoint. Sixteen-foot-long signs bearing the TSA's 3-1-1 rule are hanging in the terminal. Brochures are at curbside.

"I think that, over time, people will get it," says Williams, who has been Hartsfield's security director for five years.

Travelers really have no choice. "These regulations are not going away anytime soon," he says.

Not Following Baggie Rules Can Bog Down Lines (USAT)

By Roger Yu

USA Today, November 7, 2006

ATLANTA — It's Saturday morning at Hartsfield-Jackson International, typically one of the busiest times at the USA's busiest airport. What you see is a traveling public that is adjusting to the new rules of air travel.

Watching things unfold at the sprawling airport's single security checkpoint makes it clear that travelers, based on their experience and the degree to which they've done their homework, fall into distinct categories.

Some understand in detail what the government now requires to clear security checkpoints under rules changes implemented in August and revised in September. Others? Not so much.

The new rules now say liquid and gel items carried on board must be in containers that are three ounces or less. The bottles must fit in one 1-quart plastic zip-top bag, which must be placed in a security tray for X-ray during inspection. They call it the 3-1-1 rule.

STORY: Will long lines be in the bag this Thanksgiving?

Last Saturday, two lines of travelers led to the 22 inspection lanes that constitute the checkpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0091438

The average wait time on Saturday mornings is typically 20 to 25 minutes, says Christopher White, a spokesman for the Transportation Security Administration. But the line moved relatively quickly on this day. The longest wait time was 19 minutes. After 9 a.m., it was down to about 7 to 8 minutes.

At 8:30 a.m., three TSA agents stationed at two desks at the beginning of the lines loudly reminded passengers of the 3-1-1 rule for carry-ons.

Two large TSA banners reinforced the message. Many travelers didn't bother to look up and read them. An electronic sign about four feet tall next to the agents' desks also explained the rules.

The Initiated

Many travelers at the checkpoint came prepared.

Barbara Addaman and Debbie Bond, residents of Atlanta who were traveling to Pensacola, Fla., arrived at the airport shortly before 8 a.m. and waited about 15 minutes at security. "We checked everything, and we knew not to take liquid on board," Addaman says. "We live in Atlanta, and everything (about the airport) is publicized. If you live in an area with a small airport, maybe you're not as aware."

Michael and Linda Friedman, a couple from Atlanta on their way to Acapulco for vacation, stood in line to clear security carrying just their jackets and passports. Knowing the rules well, they also packed their liquid and gel items in their checked luggage. "We know what to do. We travel a lot," says Michael Friedman, a financial adviser.

Leah Streuber, a district manager in Atlanta for Weight Watchers, also knows the TSA rules, but she still got smacked by them because she arrived late for her flight.

Arriving at the security line, she didn't hesitate in walking up to the trash bin next to the security line and tossing in her shampoo and conditioner bottles.

She had planned on checking her luggage, so she didn't bring the smaller bottles required by TSA. Because she arrived late, she didn't have time to stop at the airline counter to check bags. "I'd have been more upset if I had missed my flight," she says.

The Uninitiated

Sonja Hicks, an accountant in Atlanta who was heading to Charlotte to visit friends, was disappointed to have to throw away her moisturizer and lotion. She said she knew about the rules, but simply forgot about them until a TSA agent reminded her at security.

"I wish they would provide the plastic bags," she says wistfully. But a plastic bag wouldn't have saved her — her bottles were larger than the allowable 3 ounces.

A candy store next to the security lines was selling 1-quart plastic bags for 50 cents each. D.J. Washington, an Atlanta-based career consultant for athletes, took advantage of it. On his way to catch a flight to Tulsa, he realized that he had packed his deodorant, toothpaste and cologne in his carry-on.

"I forgot about (the rules)," he says. "But an agent at the line told me about the store."

Shon Bourgoyne, who works at an accounting firm in Atlanta, says she thought the ban on liquids had been lifted. Before entering security, she and India White, one of her three traveling companions heading for a wedding in Chicago, gathered their small liquid items and stored them in a plastic bag they bought at the candy store.

Bourgoyne, her husband Pierre and Pierre's mother passed through security without a hitch, but were forced to wait after agents found large bottles of deodorant and body spray in White's carry-on.

An agent reminded White that she could either discard the items or go back to the airline counter to check her luggage. She chose the latter option, keeping the Bourgoynes waiting.

"I feel sorry for people traveling during the holidays, because the signs aren't very clear," Shon Bourgoyne says.

Bourgoyne says she wishes the airline counter agent had reminded them of the rules.

Airlines have TSA signs posted on their counters.

The Big Picture People

Some travelers had a general notion of the rules. The specifics tripped them up.

DOJ_NMG_0091439

Many stopped at the desks manned by TSA agents at the beginning of the line to clear up confusion: How about a lip gloss?

(Lipstick is OK outside the plastic bag. Gloss must be in the bag.)

Does my bottle exceed 3 ounces?

(Read the label.)

What if my plastic bag is not zip-top?

(No go.)

White, the TSA spokesman, says enforcement was actually easier when liquid and gel items were banned because of fewer gray areas. TSA banned liquids aboard flights on Aug. 10. It implemented its 3-1-1 rule on Sept. 26.

David Vernon, an IT consultant from Augusta, Ga., was downing his coffee in a mug quickly before entering the security line, knowing it was banned.

Holding an unopened 1-liter bottle of water that would clearly be banned, he wondered if he could stomach drinking that, as well.

He had bought the bottle earlier in the morning on his way to the airport, hoping to drink it on board. He thought there was a chance that the TSA would bend the rule for him. "This whole liquid thing is annoying. I didn't even notice the signs. And (even if I did), I probably wouldn't have read it," he says.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Envoy To Iraq Likely Quitting Post (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 7, 2006

Zalmay Khalilzad, the plainspoken dealmaker and Republican insider who has won praise and criticism for attempts to broker Sunni political participation in Iraq's fragile government, is likely to quit his post as U.S. ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior Bush administration official said Monday.

As the midterm elections approached in the United States, Khalilzad has been a public face of Bush administration attempts to project both willingness to change strategy or tactics in an unpopular war and solidarity with the increasingly fractious Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Khalilzad's departure has been rumored for months, but he has not turned in his resignation, the State Department official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes. Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year, but is more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said.

"He doesn't want to stay there forever and there are ongoing discussions about when he will finish his time, but there is no definite date," the official said.

Other U.S. officials have said Khalilzad will probably return to an academic or private sector job in the United States. His replacement in Baghdad may be Ryan Crocker, a senior career diplomat who is currently U.S. ambassador to Pakistan, those officials said. Crocker was a top U.S. representative in Baghdad for several months in 2003, shortly after the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

Khalilzad is an Afghan-born Sunni Muslim who was seen as a go-between among Iraq's political and sectarian factions when named to the Baghdad post in April 2005. Initially criticized by some Shiites for showing what they called favoritism to the Sunni minority, Khalilzad has more recently been a target of Sunni criticism that the United States is not doing enough to protect Sunnis from Shiite reprisals and death squads.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, during a Baghdad visit on Friday, told al-Maliki that Khalilzad would leave about the first of the year and replaced by Crocker, according to two top aides to the Iraqi leader. The aides spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to release information.

Negroponte was Khalilzad's predecessor as ambassador in Baghdad. Khalilzad had been the Bush administration's ambassador to Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. A White House favorite whom Bush calls by his nickname "Zal," Khalilzad worked in the Republican administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Al-Maliki snubbed Khalilzad two weeks ago, when the ambassador held a press conference to announce that Iraqi leaders had agreed to develop a timeline by the end of the year for progress in stabilizing the country, only to be contradicted by al-Maliki hours later.

Last week Khalilzad and U.S. military commanders agreed to lift a U.S. security cordon around a Shiite slum in Baghdad after meeting with al-Maliki. Sunnis claimed that al-Maliki asked to lift the cordon on orders from anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, an important base of al-Maliki's support.

Aides to the prime minister have said flatly that he hopes to expand his authority by playing on American voter discontent and White House reluctance to open a public fight just before the elections.

Iraqis Told Not To Worry Over US Elections (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, November 7, 2006

Washington has reassured Iraqi leaders that there is no reason to worry about dramatic changes in policy as a result of Tuesday's US elections, Zalmay Khalilzad, the US envoy to Iraq, has told the Financial Times.

Some of the Iraqis "are not as used to [American domestic politics], when things are being said in the heat of the political fight". Some of them took that "as an indication that policies will change dramatically", he said.

"The president has told them not to pay attention to that . . . the president will be the commander in chief and the architect of US foreign policy regardless of the outcome." President George W. Bush's Republican party is expecting a setback in the mid-term elections, in which US policy in Iraq has been a big factor in the Democrats' rising fortunes.

Mr Khalilzad played down reports of tension between the US embassy and the Iraqi government and said that he welcomed statements by Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, that he wanted more control over Iraqi security forces.

"There are some people who think that there's a struggle going on [with] Iraqis who want to have more authority, as if we were fighting over the wheel of a car, who's going to take charge of it," the ambassador said. "But in fact that is not the case. Our goal is Iraqi self-reliance, [so] we welcome someone such as Mr Maliki, the leader of Iraq, saying: 'Look, I want to take more responsibility for the security of my country, I want more forces, forces that are capable, forces that are under my control'."

Mr Khalilzad added that Iraqi politicians were working to resolve key issues that divided the big ethnic and sectarian blocs.

"They still have the issue of the hydrocarbon law, the issue of militias and insurgents . . . even if they need a new flag or not, when do you . . . have provincial elections?" He said Iraqi leaders had claimed there would be a plan to handle militias by the end of the year.

The ambassador also said that Iraqi leaders needed to move quickly to reach compromises to retain the support of the international community. "They have to recognise that the patience of the countries that can help them is wearing thin."

¦Mr Khalilzad is likely to quit his post as US ambassador in Baghdad in the coming months, a senior official in Mr Bush's administration said on Tuesday. His departure has been rumoured for months but he had yet to resign, the State Department official said. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because neither the White House nor Mr Khalilzad has announced any personnel changes.

Mr Khalilzad could leave as soon as the end of this year but was more likely to remain in his post through the spring, the official said.

"He doesn't want to stay there forever and there are ongoing discussions about when he will finish his time." US officials said the envoy would probably return to an academic or private sector job in the US. His replacement may be Ryan Crocker, who is ambassador to Pakistan.

Just kidding, Donald

Talk about an "A-list" headlining the American Spectator's Robert L. Bartley dinner (and dancing) Nov. 15 at the Mandarin Oriental hotel, although the evening's master of ceremonies will no doubt be a bit uncomfortable when introducing the keynote speaker.

That master of ceremonies would be myriad-hat wearer Ben Stein, and the keynote address will be delivered by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Inside the Beltway can't help but recall Mr. Stein, in his "CBS Sunday Morning" commentary barely one week ago pointing out that the situation in Iraq has become so difficult that if he were still a White House speechwriter, as he was under Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford, this is what he would suggest President Bush announce today:

"My fellow Americans, I have some sobering news. It is my duty above all to protect the nation and to protect the Constitution. I sincerely believed I was doing that when I ordered the invasion of Iraq. I still believe Saddam Hussein was the most dangerous man in the world. But it is clear to me now that things are not working out well in Iraq.

"Despite the incredible competence, bravery and sacrifice of our men and women on the ground there, Iraq is still a violent, largely out-of-control country. We may be making more terrorists than we destroy. The word 'quagmire' comes to mind.

"It is clear that changes must be made. I have this morning accepted Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's resignation with sincere thanks for his service to the nation. Despite his flaws, he is a great American. He will be replaced by a truly heroic American, Senator John McCain of Arizona."

Hats off to U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission chief Edward McGaffigan Jr., for becoming, as of Friday, the longest-serving person in his post -- 9 years, 11 months and 30 days under his belt.

Previous record holder: former NRC Commissioner Kenneth C. Rogers.

Mr. McGaffigan, first appointed to the regulatory body in 1996 by President Clinton, also is the first person to have been nominated (twice by Mr. Clinton) and confirmed to three terms on the panel. He begins his 10th year of service on Dec. 9.

Nevertheless, as Eliot B. Brenner, the NRC's director of public affairs, tells Inside the Beltway of Washington's all-too-familiar ways: "He had a 103-day break between his second and third terms while awaiting Senate confirmation of his nomination."

The commissioner, who grew up in Boston (an avid runner, he has completed six U.S. Marine Corps marathons and one JFK 50 Miler) and lives in Arlington with his two children (his wife of 18 years, Peggy, passed away in 2000), will be honored by his fellow commissioners and senior staffers at an event tomorrow at NRC headquarters.

Ben then

We opened this morning's column with an item about Ben Stein, whom younger generations know as a movie and TV actor and his "gets the red out" Visine commercials. Indeed, his speech in his film role as the teacher in "Ferris Bueller's Day Off" has been ranked as one of the 50 most famous scenes in American film.

But whereas Mr. Stein resides today in Beverly Hills, Calif., it's interesting to recall that he was born in Washington in 1944, grew up in Silver Spring and attended Montgomery Blair High School.

He was a Washington poverty lawyer in his early years, then a trial lawyer for the Federal Trade Commission, and an adjunct at American University, lecturing on politics and society. As we mentioned, he spent two years as a speechwriter for Presidents Nixon and Ford, although he has stressed he did not write the line "I am not a crook."

Iraq Court To Rule On Saddam Verdict (AP-Y)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, November 7, 2006

Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on Saddam Hussein's guilty verdict and death sentence by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said Monday, setting in motion a possible execution by mid-February.

If the ruling is upheld, The Associated Press has learned that Iraq's three-man presidential council is pledged to allow Saddam's hanging to take place. The execution must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision.

The surge in violence expected immediately after Sunday's verdict did not happen. The Interior Ministry credited a round-the-clock curfew in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces. Checkpoints were also closed along Iraq's borders with Jordan and Syria. Authorities were gradually lifting the restrictions, with pedestrians allowed back on the streets of Baghdad late Monday afternoon.

Around the country, jubilant Shiites celebrated the verdict, as Sunnis held defiant counter-demonstrations.

Saddam, who empowered the Sunni minority when he ruled Iraq, was sentenced by the Iraqi High Tribunal for ordering the executions of nearly 150 Shiites from the city of Dujail following a 1982 attempt on his life.

If the appeals court upholds the sentences, all three members of the Presidential Council — President Jalal Talabani and Vice Presidents Tariq al-Hashimi and Adil Abdul-Mahdi — must sign death warrants before executions can be carried out.

Talabani said Monday that although he opposes capital punishment, his signature is not needed to carry out Saddam's death sentence. Talabani, a Kurd, has permanently authorized Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite, to sign on his behalf. Abdul-Mahdi has said he would sign Saddam's death warrant, meaning two of three signatures were assured.

Al-Hashimi, the other vice president and a Sunni, gave his word that he also would sign a Saddam death sentence as part of the deal under which he got the job April 22, according to witnesses at the meeting, which was attended by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad.

"We wanted a written promise before the first meeting of the new parliament. But later and during a meeting in the presence of American and British ambassadors and other politicians, the promise became oral in which he vowed not to oppose important rules and laws — especially those related to Saddam," Deputy Parliament Speaker Khaled al-Attiyah told the AP.

Thus the approval of the death penalties handed down Sunday for Saddam, his half brother Barzan Ibrahim, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, chief of the Revolutionary Court, had been part of the pact under which al-Hashimi got one of two vice presidential posts.

If the nine-judge appeals panel upholds the death sentences, they could be ready for signing early next year, according to a schedule laid out Monday by chief prosecutor Jaafar Moussawi.

Moussawi said the Iraqi High Tribunal must send the entire case file to the appeals panel within 10 days, or by Nov. 15.

On the same day that the defense appeal is given to the High Tribunal — the deadline is Dec. 5 — that court is required to send it to the prosecutor general for study and preparation of counter-arguments.

The prosecutor has no time limit to answer the appeal, but Moussawi told AP he would submit his brief within days of receiving the defense appeal.

While the appellate court also has no deadline for its ruling, Moussawi said it would act quickly because it had no other cases under consideration.

"The appeals panel will take less than a month to make its decision," Moussawi said.

Many Oppose Death Penalty For Hussein (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

DOJ_NMG_0091443

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates Nov. 6 — European politicians on Monday spoke out against the death sentence for Saddam Hussein. Arab officials and commentators derided what they said was a flawed and politicized trial, while for the first time broadly acknowledging Mr. Hussein's crimes.

Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, speaking to reporters on Monday, said he opposed the death penalty for Mr. Hussein, joining several other European leaders and European Union officials who announced their opposition to the sentence. When pressed by reporters, Mr. Blair spoke of his longstanding opposition to capital punishment. He said he did not intend to protest the sentence, and condemned Mr. Hussein's brutality.

European leaders insisted that the viciousness of the actions of which Mr. Hussein was found guilty had not changed their view that state-sponsored killing was wrong. Some warned that executing Mr. Hussein would only worsen the sectarian bloodshed in Iraq.

The Associated Press quoted Terry Davis, secretary general of the Council of Europe's Parliamentary Assembly, as saying: "A country ravaged by violence and death does not need more violence, and especially not a state-orchestrated execution. Saddam Hussein is a criminal and should not be allowed to become a martyr."

Amnesty International said Sunday that it "deplored" Mr. Hussein's sentence, describing the proceedings as "deeply flawed and unfair."

In the Arab world, many dismissed the verdict as a product of an unfair trial, decrying the lack of control of the proceedings by the judges, the seeming contradictions in procedures and the generally politicized nature of the proceedings. Most of those who commented on the subject said the decision to impose the death penalty would not stem the wave of violence gripping Iraq.

"You'll hear a lot of moderates say it's great Saddam got what he deserves, but unfortunately it was through a trial that was regrettable," said Ayman Safadi, the editor of the Jordanian daily newspaper Al Ghad. "People see Saddam himself as irrelevant. This trial was not about Saddam; it was about Iraq itself."

Analysts said the timing of the verdict, just two days before the United States midterm elections, underscored the politically charged nature of the proceedings.

"His sentencing now is a deliberate attempt to boost the Republicans in the U.S.," said Imad Shueibi, president of the Data and Strategic Studies Center, a privately financed research organization in Damascus, Syria. "They're expecting big losses in the upcoming elections, and they figure maybe this sentence might give an illusion of some success. But of course only the naïve will believe that."

But for many, the trial missed an opportunity to send messages to other dictators and to teach valuable lessons.

"There's no way to celebrate," said Muhammed al-Ameer, the political editor at the Saudi daily newspaper Al Riyadh. "No one doubts that Saddam committed human rights abuses, but the trial was so flawed that it put things in question. It just keeps sounding like a step taken by the Republicans to help them."

Perhaps the most dramatic shift was in how many viewed Mr. Hussein. Previously, few in the region had been willing to address directly the issue of whether he might be guilty of crimes against his people, with many people lionizing the former dictator. Most of those interviewed on Sunday and Monday said they believed he was guilty, but they also said that the flaws in his trial offset his guilt.

"People used to see Saddam as a fearless, defiant leader, but then he appeared in handcuffs and his image was shattered," said Saleh Qallab, a columnist with the Jordanian government-backed newspaper Al Rai. "Nobody can sympathize with a weak figure; that change is not political, but psychological."

Makram Mohamed Ahmed, a columnist with the Egyptian government-backed Al Ahram newspaper, said, "He was a burden to his nation and a burden to the entire Arab world and he might have truly deserved this fate, if only the court's legitimacy was not in question."

Most of all, Mr. Ahmed said, the verdict has failed to send a message to other Arab leaders to loosen their grip and make needed changes. "I don't think any of the Arab leaders will come to think that this can happen again," he said. "The Bush's administration is losing its popularity and the Democrats may get a majority in the Congressional elections."

Iraq's Rough Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

IT WAS THE U.S. Supreme Court, not the Iraqi High Tribunal, that famously declared: "A defendant is entitled to a fair trial but not a perfect one." Still, that legal dictum is an apt description of the process by which the Iraqi court decided to sentence Saddam Hussein to death for the slaughter of 148 Iraqi Shiite villagers in 1982.

With customary exaggeration, President Bush went further, hailing Hussein's trial, which began in October 2005, as "a milestone in the Iraqi people's effort to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law." At the other extreme, some human rights groups are finding fault with the proceedings because of evidentiary shortcuts, alleged conflicts of interest and the politically motivated removal of several judges.

The conduct of Hussein's trial on this and other charges fell short of American norms (such as the right to a trial by jury) and also lacked the imprimatur of the International Criminal Court. As we have argued before, the legitimacy of the proceedings would have been enhanced if respected foreign jurists had joined their Iraqi counterparts on the bench. Some of these deficiencies may be rectified in the appeals process, which must be thorough and painstaking.

That said, the trial established that Hussein ordered the massacre of residents of the Shiite farming town of Dujayl as collective punishment for a failed assassination attempt. Like other examples of Hussein's brutality, the killings in Dujayl should not have gone unpunished. Whatever its flaws, the trial established Hussein's guilt in an open and adversarial proceeding (one that the deposed dictator did his best to disrupt).

Not content to pronounce that justice had been done, Bush gushed that the sentencing of Hussein was a "major achievement for Iraq's young democracy and its constitutional government." Where Bush and Iraqi's Shiites discern simple justice in Hussein's comeuppance, the country's Sunni population sees sectarian payback by the Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. Maliki said that Hussein is finally "facing the penalty he deserves."

That penalty — death by hanging — is also controversial, with British Prime Minister Tony Blair reiterating Monday that his nation opposes the death penalty "whether it's Saddam or anyone else." Capital punishment is legal in Iraq (as it is in the U.S., regrettably), and Iraqi authorities are unlikely to be swayed by death penalty abolitionists in this of all cases. The prospect of capital punishment has always been at the end of this trial.

None of this suggests that Hussein should have been given amnesty for the atrocities carried out under his orders. Even critics of the U.S. invasion that brought him down acknowledge that his rule was not just brutal but bestial. Holding him accountable for his crimes is a matter of simple (if rough) justice. But it will be a "milestone" for the rule of law in Iraq only if Sunnis can be convinced that the new order in their country isn't as unjust as the old one.

Imperfect, But Fair Enough (WSJ)

By Alan Dershowitz

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

The Nuremberg trials it is not. But then again, Saddam Hussein is no Hitler or Goering. He was a regional tyrant whose invasion of Kuwait was turned back by the U.S., whose effort to develop nuclear weapons was thwarted by Israel, and whose war with Iran proved mutually destructive. He did succeed in murdering, torturing and terrorizing thousands of his own people, and for one small part of that -- the murder of 148 men and boys in the town of Dujail -- he was placed on trial, convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to hang.

The trial itself was repeatedly disrupted by in-court outbursts, out-of-court murders of lawyers, and frequent changes of court personnel. It did not go nearly as smoothly as Nuremberg: But those trials were conducted after World War II had been decisively won and all resistance ended. The trial of Saddam was conducted in the midst of continuing resistance and ongoing violence. Considering this important difference, the trial process was remarkably efficient.

But was it fair, or was it victors' justice, as Goering characterized Nuremberg? In a sense, all trials that follow military conflicts are victors' justice; the losers don't get to hold trials. No British generals were placed on trial for Dresden, nor were any Americans put in the dock for Nagasaki. But some victors' justice can be fairer than others. Nuremberg represents the epitome of fair victors' justice. The defendants were brilliantly represented by lawyers of their own choosing. The prosecutors were the brightest and fairest the victorious Allies could send. (Even the Soviet chief prosecutor was a distinguished lawyer, though he was clearly taking orders from Stalin.) The judges were, for the most part, highly regarded (the Soviet judges, though highly experienced, lacked the independence of the American, British and French). The verdicts were generally regarded as fair, with some death penalties, some terms of imprisonment (many quickly commuted) and not a few acquittals. These calibrated results satisfied the appearance of justice, as well as the reality in most cases.

The Baghdad trial also produced calibrated results: three death sentences, one sentence of life imprisonment, three sentences of many years behind bars, and one acquittal for lack of evidence. The fact that the conviction and death sentence of Saddam was a foregone conclusion does not necessarily undercut the trial's fairness. The verdict and sentence was predictable because the facts were clear and the evidence compelling. A defendant's obvious guilt does not necessarily make his trial unfair; nor does it necessarily make it fair. Even the most guilty and despicable are entitled to a trial before objective fact-finders (in this case judges, not jurors), with an opportunity to challenge the prosecution's evidence, to put on evidence of his own, and to have a fearless lawyer advocate on his behalf.

Saddam was afforded such a trial, though he denied it to others, and by the standards of justice in most Arab and Muslim countries, this trial was extraordinarily fair. But because the U.S. is the occupying power, and our representatives were looking over the shoulders of the Iraqi prosecutors and judges, the trial will be judged by Western standards. Even so, the Baghdad trial, though far from exemplary, must receive a passing grade, especially considering the circumstances in that city blighted by violence.

Would the trial have been fairer if it had been conducted by some sort of international tribunal situated outside Iraq? Certainly the threats to the lawyers would have been less dramatic. The death penalty probably would not have been imposed, since any court with European judges would not do so. The problem is that no international tribunal has yet established sufficient credibility, certainly not any that are under the auspices of the U.N. In this respect, the Baghdad trial represents a failure of the international community to devise a satisfactory process.

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who is one of Saddam's lawyers, was thrown out of court for characterizing the trial as a "mockery of justice." He and Saddam's other lawyers will have the opportunity to provide specifics to back this rather general charge when they file their brief in the automatic appeal to which the defendants are entitled. It will be interesting to see whether the issues raised by the defendants are more political or legal -- whether they are macro or micro. If the defendants believe they have no chance for an appellate reversal or modification, and want to use the appeal to score political points, they will, of course, lose. But if they approach the appeal in a lawyerlike manner -- focusing on the particular evidence, the elements of the crimes, the judicial rulings, and other more technical issues -- they may provide the appellate chamber an opportunity to demonstrate the fairness of the process by modifying or even reversing some of the judgments.

The fairness of legal proceedings -- whether domestic or international, whether in war or in peace -- is always a matter of degree. Perfect justice is an illusion. Perfect injustice is a reality, as Saddam Hussein proved when he inflicted it on his perceived enemies for so many years. Now this exemplar of perfect injustice has been subjected to imperfect justice. The result is satisfying, and should serve as an object lesson to the many dictators who continue to terrorize their people and others in the expectation that they will never be brought to justice.

Mr. Dershowitz, professor of law at Harvard, is the author, most recently, of "Preemption: A Knife that Cuts Both Ways" (Norton, 2006).

Justice In Iraq (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

Over the coming days and weeks -- throughout the appeals process, up to and including the day of the execution itself -- you are going to hear a lot about what went wrong with the trial of Saddam Hussein. You will be told, as an Amnesty International director put it , that the trial "has been a shabby affair, marred by serious flaws. . . . Every accused has a right to a fair trial, whatever the magnitude of the charge against him."

DOJ_NMG_0091446

You will hear many denunciations of the verdict itself: The British Guardian newspaper called on Iraq to maintain a "principled opposition to the death penalty, to which there can be no exceptions. No European country now executes its criminals." You will also be told that the judges were incompetent, that the Iraqi government interfered constantly and that the international legal community loathed the trial from the start. All of this is true -- and all mostly irrelevant.

In fact, all post hoc political trials are in some sense "victor's justice." That's just the nature of putting on trial people who were not doing anything "illegal," according to the laws of their totalitarian society, at the time they committed their crimes. The International Military Tribunal that sentenced the Nazi leadership at Nuremberg not only wrote special rules to duck the question of its own dubious legality but even accused the Nazis, at one point, of murdering some 20,000 Polish officers at Katyn and elsewhere, a crime that the Soviet judges -- among them an infamous participant in show trials -- knew for a fact that the Soviet Union itself had committed. The much-vaunted, approved-by-international-community trial of Slobodan Milosevic evolved into an occasion for the Serbian ex-dictator to carry on an extended rant. In part, the decision to hold Hussein's trial in Iraq was made in order to avoid that kind of U.N.-sanctioned failure. In part it was made because back in 2003 the U.N. Security Council -- led by France, Russia and China -- told the Iraqis organizing the trial that it wanted nothing to do with the trial anyway.

In truth, though, the shambolic and incoherent nature of this trial was not so much evidence of too few foreign human rights lawyers as it was yet another byproduct of the shambolic and incoherent nature of the U.S. occupation of Iraq. Clearly the violence outside the courtroom affected what happened inside: Defense lawyers were murdered, judges traveled under armed guard and members of the prosecution said privately that they still felt afraid when Hussein came in the room. At times, their fear showed, adding to the appearance of incompetence. Even now, the chief investigative judge visits mass-grave sites in strict secrecy; his family is in hiding, as are the families of other judges.

The violence outside the courtroom also affected how the trial was perceived outside its walls. Televised testimony, which Iraqis initially found riveting, grew less relevant as the violence increased. The trial became nothing more than the background noise of the sectarian struggle: On Sunday, Shiites cheered the verdict while Sunnis denounced it. Imagine how different Hussein's death sentence would sound today if a stable, peaceful Iraq with a reformed judicial system were uniting to declare it, unanimously. Even the British media might then accept that, in such extraordinary cases, the Iraqis are allowed to choose penalties of which Europeans disapprove.

And yet, in the end there is only one standard by which the trial of Hussein and other Baathist leaders should be judged: Did it or did it not compile a true record of Hussein's crimes -- a record that in some distant, future, peaceful Iraq, will be available to help Iraqis understand what took place during Saddam Hussein's reign? Though it is unfashionable to write anything positive about Iraq right now, the answer is that it did. The crime for which Hussein was condemned -- the torture and execution of 148 people in the small town of Dujail more than two decades ago -- was well documented. Witnesses and archives were produced. Cross-examinations were held.

In August the Iraqi court started hearings in a second trial, this one designed to examine the Anfal campaign of 1987-89, during which Hussein murdered up to 180,000 Kurds. Already, some dozen witnesses have testified about what they saw when Hussein, at the height of the campaign, unleashed chemical weapons on whole Kurdish villages. Large parts of Shiite and Sunni Iraq are hearing these stories for the first time. Listening to them may someday, in that distant, future, peaceful Iraq, help them to understand what Kurds experienced under Saddam Hussein's reign and help them to achieve some kind of reconciliation.

It is true that the execution of Hussein, if and when it occurs, could well have a positive effect on Iraqi politics. If nothing else, it will eliminate once and for all the Baathist dream of a Hussein-led revanche -- a dream that even Hussein himself appears to have cherished; witnesses say he was genuinely surprised by the verdict and was shaking afterward. But his death will also probably put an end to this truth-telling project, one that has been unique and unprecedented in the Arab world. For the first time, an Arab dictator was held accountable for crimes against his people. Thanks to American incompetence in Iraq, it may be the last time for a long time, too.

Thousands From Saddam's Party May Regain Jobs (USAT/AP)

USA Today, November 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091447

BAGHDAD — A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to die, the Iraqi government declared a major concession Monday to the Sunni Arabs who backed him. The action could result in thousands of purged members of Saddam's party being reinstated in their jobs.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, announced the deaths of five American troops. Two soldiers were killed in a helicopter crash north of Baghdad, and two Marines and an Army soldier died in fighting in Anbar province in the west. The deaths raised to 18 the number of U.S. servicemembers killed in Iraq in the first six days of November.

The political concession was detailed by the government organization that had been charged with removing Saddam loyalists from state institutions. Under a draft law, the organization would amend its rules to enable former Baath Party members to regain their jobs.

The amendments grew out of a 24-point national reconciliation plan that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, announced in June, shortly after he took office.

Sunni Arabs were the base of Saddam's support and became the backbone of the insurgency that has killed tens of thousands of Iraqis and has been responsible for the vast majority of U.S. casualties. Al-Maliki hopes to entice disaffected Sunnis away from the insurgency.

Under the former "de-Baathification" protocols, devised by the U.S.-led occupation authority after Saddam's regime fell, 10,302 senior Baath Party members had been listed for dismissal. The draft law, however, includes the names of just 1,500 party members, said Ali al-Lami, the commission's executive director. Those not reinstated would receive pensions, he said.

The draft law must be approved by the country's Shiite-dominated parliament.

The United States dissolved and banned the Baath Party in May 2003. It later modified its stance and invited former high-level officers from the disbanded military to join the security forces.

The former top U.S. administrator in Iraq, Paul Bremer, also allowed thousands of teachers who were Baathists to return to work. He conceived of the de-Baathification effort but later found that it had gutted key ministries and the military with no replacement personnel among the Iraqi workforce and educated elite.

The United States had joined recently with Sunnis Arabs in calling for the Shiite-dominated government to end the process, which had exacerbated the already deep fissures among the country's religious and ethnic groups.

"Such a move will be in the interest of Iraq because a Baathist, like any Iraqi citizen, has the right to get back his job," said Ammar Wajih of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni group.

About 1.5 million of Iraq's 27 million people belonged to the Baath Arab Socialist Party when Saddam was ousted. Many, however, joined for professional, not ideological, reasons. Career advancement, university enrollment and specialized medical care depended on party membership.

Regardless of why they joined, those who advanced in the party were expected to spy on fellow Iraqis and to join militias that helped suppress Shiite and Kurdish revolts after Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Administration Reaches Out To Saddam Backers (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A day after Saddam Hussein was sentenced to death by hanging, the Shi'ite-dominated government offered a major concession yesterday to his Sunni backers that could reinstate thousands of members of the ousted dictator's Ba'ath Party in their jobs.

With a tight curfew holding down violence after Saddam's guilty verdict and death sentence, the government reached out to disaffected Sunnis in hopes of enticing them away from the insurgency, which has killed tens of thousands of Iraqis and is responsible for the vast majority of U.S. casualties.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of five more American troops, two in a helicopter crash north of Baghdad and three in fighting west of the capital. The deaths raised to 18 the number of U.S. forces killed in the first six days of November.

Sectarian killings also persisted despite the extraordinary security precautions. Fifty-nine bodies were discovered Sunday and yesterday across Iraq, police said. But with no surge in violence, authorities gradually were lifting the restrictions in Baghdad and two restive Sunni provinces: Pedestrians were allowed back on the capital's streets late yesterday afternoon, and the international airport was to reopen today.

Across the country, Shi'ites celebrated the verdict while Sunnis held defiant counterdemonstrations.

Iraq's appeals court is expected to rule on an appeal by Saddam's attorneys by the middle of January, the chief prosecutor said yesterday, setting into motion an execution by mid-February. If the ruling is upheld, the Associated Press has learned, Iraq's three-member presidential council will allow Saddam's hanging. The execution must be carried out within 30 days of the appeals court's decision.

Sunday's verdict and yesterday's opening to the Sunnis were seen as a welcome break for the United States, which had called for the Iraqi government to stop purging members of Saddam's Ba'ath Party from their jobs. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, however, has balked at U.S. requests to set up an amnesty program for insurgents.

Mr. al-Maliki has been engaged in a public feud with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad since last month, when the prime minister disputed the envoy's announcement that he had agreed to a timeline for progress in quelling violence and encouraging Sunnis to join the political process.

Indications emerged yesterday that Mr. Khalilzad was preparing to leave his post.

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, during a visit to Baghdad on Friday, told Mr. al-Maliki that Mr. Khalilzad would leave about the first of the year and be replaced by Ryan Crocker, a senior career diplomat who is ambassador to Pakistan, two top aides to the Iraqi leader said.

The United States dissolved and banned the Ba'ath Party in May 2003, a month after toppling Saddam. The U.S. later softened its stance, inviting former high-level officers from the disbanded military to join the security forces.

About 1.5 million of Iraq's 27 million people belonged to the Ba'ath Party, formally known as the Ba'ath Arab Socialist Party, when Saddam was ousted. Most said they joined for professional, not ideological, reasons.

Proposal Would Rehire Members Of Hussein's Party (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 6 -- A high-ranking commission of Iraq's Shiite-led government said Monday it had prepared a draft law that could return tens of thousands of former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party to their government jobs.

After toppling Hussein in the spring of 2003, the interim U.S. authority that ran Iraq enacted a plan that purged Baath Party members from their government jobs, whether or not they had been accused of wrongdoing. The move threw thousands of Baathists out of work and is blamed by many for creating a vast pool of unemployed, disenfranchised Sunnis who later became eligible recruits for insurgent groups.

Thousands of former Baathists have since been allowed to return to their posts after rigorous vetting, but political and security analysts say that if the government were to enact more sweeping measures, it could help soothe rampant sectarian violence and advance reconciliation between the country's Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs.

Ali al-Lami, executive director of the Supreme National Commission for de-Baathification, said in an interview that the commission had drafted a law for parliament that would give 1.5 million former Baathists who "excommunicate" themselves from the party the option of returning to their former government jobs or drawing a pension for their past employment. Other estimates have put the number of purged Baathists in the tens of thousands; the figures could not be reconciled.

Lami said 3,000 or so top former Baathists would be given their pensions but would not be allowed to resume government employment. And about 1,500 high-level former Baathists would be barred from ever resuming their jobs or drawing a pension.

The announcement came as Iraq's capital and other volatile areas around the country remained under a full curfew following the death sentence handed down to Hussein the day before. With violence levels seemingly low and people increasingly defying the curfew, the government announced that life would return to normal on Tuesday.

Lami said the timing of the proposed rollback of de-Baathification -- which would be a boon for Sunnis -- had nothing to do with the verdict in Hussein's trial.

"There have been a lot of meetings with the political blocs and nongovernmental organizations, and it's almost complete," Lami said. "This is only for those who left the Baath Party," he said, noting that Iraq's constitution outlaws the party as a terrorist organization.

The two-day curfew, which covered Baghdad, the northern cities of Mosul and Kirkuk and the restive provinces of Salahuddin and Diyala, was imposed Sunday morning by authorities fearing a violent backlash against the verdict in Hussein's trial, which was announced later in the day. He was found guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced to hang for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the village of Dujail, north of Baghdad, in the 1980s.

The verdict sparked anguished protests by Sunni Arabs, particularly in Hussein's home town of Tikrit, and jubilant celebrations by Shiite Muslims, who were ruthlessly suppressed during his 24-year rule, but there were few reports of violence. It remains to be seen whether the curfew succeeded in stopping retaliatory attacks or only deferred them.

Passions remained high in some areas, but the government lifted the curfew for pedestrians at 4 p.m. Monday and announced that people and vehicles could return to all of Iraq's roads at 6 a.m. Tuesday.

Pro-Hussein demonstrators marched Monday in several towns north of Baghdad, in the Sunni heartland, including Tikrit, 90 miles north of Baghdad, and Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine in February sparked intense sectarian clashes across Iraq.

In the towns of Hawijah and Riyadh, outside Kirkuk, hundreds of protesters demonstrated against the Hussein verdict, the U.S. occupation of Iraq and the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, carrying Hussein's picture and chanting, "Yes, yes, to the leader Saddam Hussein" and, "Death, death, to the America and Maliki government."

In Sadr City, a sprawling Shiite slum in eastern Baghdad with 2.5 million residents, people defied the curfew blanketing the rest of Baghdad and celebrated the verdict by passing out sweets to children and performing celebratory dances in the streets. Residents contacted by telephone said that life had returned to normal, with cars and buses in the streets, shops opened and people going about their daily business. They said police made no attempt to enforce the curfew in the area, which is controlled by the Mahdi Army, a militia led by anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"We don't care about the curfew in our city," said a 32-year-old blacksmith, referring to Sadr City. "But we respect the curfew outside" in the rest of Baghdad, he said. "In our city, no one can force us to stay in our homes. The Mahdi Army will protect us."

While President Bush on Sunday called Hussein's trial and verdict "a milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," British Prime Minister Tony Blair, America's closest ally in Iraq, was more circumspect Monday, saying he and his party opposed the death penalty for Hussein -- or anyone -- on principle.

The U.S. military on Monday announced the deaths of five servicemen: Two soldiers died Monday when their helicopter crashed in Salahuddin province, north of Baghdad, a military statement said. No hostile fire was observed at the time of the crash, which is under investigation.

One Marine died Saturday and another on Monday of wounds sustained in fighting Saturday in Anbar province, west of Baghdad, a second military statement said. A soldier from the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division also died Monday in combat in Anbar, it said.

57 Iraqis Charged In Abuse At Prison (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 6 -- Iraq's Interior Ministry has charged 57 employees, including high-ranking officers, with human rights crimes for their roles in the torture of hundreds of detainees once jailed in a notorious eastern Baghdad prison known as Site 4, officials announced Monday.

The charges marked the first time the present Iraqi government has taken criminal action against members of its own security forces for operating torture chambers inside Interior Ministry prisons, said Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, a ministry spokesman.

Sunni Arab detainees and human rights groups have long alleged that members of the ministry's police force, made up mostly of Shiite Muslims, took revenge on Sunni captives through beatings and other brutal methods. For months, Shiite officials have said such accusations are exaggerations, branding them attempts by Sunnis to discredit the Shiite-led government.

But on Monday, senior Interior Ministry officials acknowledged there was clear evidence of such abuses, following a probe by three separate investigative committees that lasted 2 1/2 months.

A U.N. human rights report reached a similar conclusion in the summer, after Iraqi and U.S. officials uncovered the torture during a visit to Site 4 in May. More than 1,400 detainees at Site 4 were held in "overcrowded, unsafe, and unhealthy conditions" and "suffered systematic physical and psychological abuse" by Interior Ministry officials, the report said. Investigators also took photos that "documented lesions resulting from torture as well as equipment used for this purpose."

"Whoever abuses power and authority will be held accountable, regardless of their position or background," Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani told reporters in an opulent room in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces. "This is giving a lesson for those in our ministry who may want to violate the law."

The action was the latest move in a series of recent Interior Ministry crackdowns on the police forces it runs. The Iraqi government is engaged in an intense struggle to bring under control sectarian reprisal killings, death squads and criminal gangs.

U.S. pressure is also growing to get rid of militias and death squads that are widely believed to have infiltrated Iraq's security forces. U.S. officials said they have warned the Iraqi government that U.S. law bars financially backing any foreign security force that violates human rights with impunity.

In recent months, Bolani has fired more than 3,000 employees. In early October, the ministry suspended an entire police brigade on the suspicion that its members could be linked to Shiite death squads. Two weeks later, the ministry removed two of its highest-ranking police generals, who led its special police commandos and its public order brigade, both widely known to be infiltrated by Shiite militias.

Khalaf said one of the generals had played a role in the Site 4 abuses and "was disciplined within the military's legal system." The U.N. report said the Site 4 prison was holding detainees who were previously held by the public order brigade and the Wolf Brigade, a special Interior Ministry police commando unit.

Khalaf declined to name the commander, saying the names of all the accused would be released after they faced a criminal trial. In all, the investigating committees indicted 20 commissioned officers, 20 noncommissioned officers and 17 policemen and civilians. They were dismissed from their jobs and served with arrest warrants, Khalaf said. They could receive jail sentences.

"If the officer carried out the torture with his own hands, or supervised it, or it occurred while he was in command, it's all the same thing," Khalaf said.

On Monday, both U.N. and U.S. officials described the criminal charges as a positive development for efforts to bring order and the rule of law to Iraq. "The fact there seems to be action on Site 4 is a step in the right direction," said Gianni Magazzeni, chief of the U.N. human rights office for Iraq, which published the report. "It's an indication that the minister is taking seriously his responsibility and acting accountable."

"This is one step of many he needs to take in this direction," said Army Maj. Gerald Ostlund, a U.S. military spokesman who focuses on issues concerning Iraq's security forces, referring to the minister.

Magazzeni said he hoped the Site 4 action would spur closer scrutiny of atrocities that unfolded in another Interior Ministry facility in the Baghdad neighborhood of Jadriyah in November last year. U.S. soldiers entered an underground bunker there and found a clandestine torture center where scores of Sunni men were held for months. Many were beaten, starved and then killed by their Shiite captors.

A report on Jadriyah was delivered to Iraq's government, but its findings have never been publicly released nor its perpetrators forced to face justice. "That would be another way to help reduce the feeling of impunity," Magazzeni said.

It remains to be seen whether Bolani, a Shiite and an engineer by training, can take on senior figures in his ministry who are suspected of links to Shiite militias. Many are left from the days of his predecessor, Bayan Jabr, who many Sunnis allege turned the ministry into his own Shiite fiefdom and a haven for the militias.

Bolani has no political affiliations, a quality that made him attractive as a replacement for Jabr. But this very independence means he has less clout in getting rid of politically connected co-workers inside the ministry.

"That's part of his challenge," Ostlund said. "You fire somebody from the government here, what have you turned them into? What have they become the day after? Sometime it is better to keep your enemies closer than your friends."

On Monday, Bolani spoke cautiously. Asked if any of the 57 alleged offenders were members of Shiite militias, he said that "no reference to militias came up during the investigation."

Khalaf, the spokesman, was also cautious when asked if the ministry would go after Jabr, now Iraq's finance minister and alleged by human rights groups to have been aware of the torture unfolding in Site 4 and other ministry prisons.

"This is not true," Khalaf said of the allegation. "No minister would allow such violations if he knew, because the Interior Minister is for all of Iraq's people."

Third Guilty Plea In Killing Of Iraqi By A Marine Patrol (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Nov. 6 — A marine corporal pleaded guilty on Monday in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi in April, the third person charged in the case to do so.

As part of a plea agreement, the marine, Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, received reduced charges of aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice.

Corporal Jackson said Monday at his court-martial here that he knew that the killing was unlawful when it occurred. Initially charged with seven others with kidnapping and premeditated murder, he avoided the more serious charges as part of a plea agreement to testify against fellow squad members.

A military judge set sentencing for Nov. 16.

Corporal Jackson, 23, accepted the deal last week, after months of proclaiming his innocence as he remained in the brig.

Seven marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with kidnapping and killing the Iraqi, Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, who died of multiple gunshot wounds on April 26, and with covering up the crime.

Another marine, Lance Cpl. Jerry E. Shumate Jr., has also been negotiating a plea, defense lawyers said.

At the court-martial on Monday, Corporal Jackson gave testimony about the killing that closely tracked testimony by the two others who have pleaded guilty.

He said the men were on patrol near Hamdaniya searching for Saleh Gowad, an insurgent who repeatedly planted bombs, including one that was thought to have killed four members of a platoon in his company.

The corporal testified that the men kidnapped and killed a man they believed to be Mr. Gowad, but who was Mr. Awad, staging the scene to make it appear as if there had been a gunfight.

“Everyone told the story that it was a good shoot and a lawful engagement,” Corporal Jackson said.

Plea bargains are common in cases with multiple defendants. But experts in military law say the number of deals in the Hamdaniya case and the rapid legal proceedings are somewhat unusual.

“In my view, one deal is sufficient when you have statements” admitting guilt, said Gary D. Solis, a former military judge and Marine prosecutor who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University.

“Two deals make you sleep well,” Mr. Solis said. “But three is gilding the lily. At some point, a prosecutor has to prosecute.“

Aside from the testimony by those who reached plea bargains and a summary of the individual charges, prosecutors have divulged little information about their case.

The government’s case is considered strong because statements describing the killing were signed by members of the squad, part of the Second Platoon of Kilo Company in the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, which is based here.

In addition to Corporal Jackson, deals were reached with the Navy hospital corpsman, Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, 21, who was sentenced to one year in prison after pleading guilty to modified charges of conspiracy and kidnapping, and Pfc. John J. Jodka III, 20, the youngest and least experienced of the marines, who faces sentencing on Nov. 15.

DOJ_NMG_0091452

The terms of the agreement with Private Jodka will be made public at the hearing next week when the defense intends to call additional witnesses, his civilian lawyer, Jane Siegel, said.

Under military law, the defendants who have accepted pretrial agreements retain the right to go to trial until their sentencing hearings, said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice.

"You can still try to beat the deal," Mr. Fidell said. "A defendant can, and not infrequently does, do better at trial than the outcome for which he bargained at pretrial."

Others who have been ordered to trial are Cpl. Marshall Magincalda, Lance Cpl. Robert B. Pennington and Cpl. Trent D. Thomas. The squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, has not been ordered to trial.

The testimony of fellow troops in such cases can make the defense difficult. It leaves little alternative but to argue that a killing was somehow mitigated by extenuating circumstances. Because the witnesses know one another well, there is the risk of information coming out that undermines a witness's credibility, legal experts say.

Some defense lawyers have suggested another reason for the multiple plea agreements. "I think it is a matter of expediting the process and saving the command a lot of money," Ms. Siegel said.

Marine Enters Pleas In Iraqi Case (AP-Y)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, November 7, 2006

A Marine pleaded guilty Monday to aggravated assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the case of an Iraqi civilian who other servicemen said was kidnapped and killed by members of the squad.

Lance Cpl. Tyler A. Jackson, 23, entered those pleas and others through his attorney Thomas Watt at a military court hearing. Jackson pleaded not guilty to murder, kidnapping, larceny, housebreaking and another charge of conspiracy.

Jackson was the third serviceman to plead guilty to reduced charges in return for his testimony in the case, in which seven Camp Pendleton-based Marines and a Navy corpsman were charged with murdering 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad.

Jackson, who has been in military prison since May, spoke only to confirm his identity and attorneys' names and say he understood his rights.

The sentencing guidelines for the counts Jackson pleaded guilty to were not immediately clear.

Last month, Pfc. John Jodka III pleaded guilty to assault and conspiracy to obstruct justice in the incident.

The first to make a deal was Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos, a Navy corpsman on patrol with the Marines. He pleaded guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy.

Members of the squad abducted Awad after their plot to kidnap and kill a known insurgent failed, according to testimony from Bacos and Jodka. The victim was a former policeman and father of 11.

Awad was shot after being dragged to a hole several hundred yards from his house, Bacos and Jodka said. A shovel and AK-47 were placed near the body to make it appear Awad was an insurgent planting a roadside bomb, both defendants said.

Both Jodka and Bacos singled out their squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins, as hatching a plan to kidnap an insurgent. Hutchins' attorney, Rich Brannon, has said he did not believe Hutchins did anything wrong.

Jackson joined the Marines in March 2005 and was on his first combat tour.

His father declined to comment. A Web site set up by Jackson's family to raise money for his defense said Jackson was innocent.

"To send these men to war to do a job and then imprison them for doing it is absurd," the Web site states.

"Why are they being subjected to less rights and freedom of movement than the very terrorists they put their lives on the line to protect the world from?" the site states.

The Day The Hatred Boiled Over In Balad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

BALAD, IRAQ — There were no heroes here.

DOJ_NMG_0091453

When gunmen murdered dozens of people in this once peaceful Shiite market city over two days last month, no one stepped in to stop the killing. Not U.S. forces, whose stated purposes in Iraq include preventing all-out civil war. Not the Iraqi security forces, who mostly turned a blind eye to the massacre. Not the people of Balad, who allowed decades of fear and hatred to overwhelm their better instincts.

Perhaps nothing could be done. Perhaps Iraq's Shiite-Sunni feuds have become so heated that not even 140,000 U.S. soldiers can stop the country's increasingly brutal civil war.

"They hate each other," said one U.S. officer in the Balad area, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly on matters pertaining to Iraqi society. "How are you going to get rid of that? You're not going to give these guys sensitivity classes."

Balad, a city of 120,000 up the Tigris River from Baghdad, lies less than 15 miles from Logistics Support Area Anaconda, the largest U.S. military base in Iraq. A small forward operating base, Camp Paliwoda, lies just outside the city. But U.S. troops stuck by the mantra of letting Iraqis take the lead and gave the Shiite-dominated police force latitude as townspeople went on a murderous rampage.

"We didn't think it would happen on this scale," said Capt. Mark T. Jenner, intelligence officer of the 1st Battalion, 8th Infantry Regiment of the 4th Infantry Division, which was in the process of handing over the area to another U.S. unit when the slayings occurred.

Perhaps the most chilling thing about the massacre in Balad was that it was not the work of outside death squads. According to Iraqis and U.S. intelligence officials, it appears to have been the work of Shiite residents who turned on their neighbors.

"The ordinary people, some of them took their guns and did this thing," said Amira Baldawi, a Shiite member of parliament who is from Balad. "The city is under pressure all the time. There is a reaction to every action."

Usual calm is broken

The killings began on a Friday afternoon, normally the day of rest in Muslim countries. Ajeel Mujamaie, a 30-year-old high school teacher of English and Arabic, was rushing his pregnant wife, Fadhilla, to the hospital and could tell that the usual calm of the day had been broken.

"There was a lot of tension and commotion in the area," he said.

Mujamaie got Fadhilla to the delivery room, then scouted the hospital for a doctor. He ran into a security guard he knew, a man named Abbas who was a relative by marriage. Abbas warned him to get out.

"He told me I have to leave," Mujamaie said. "He told me they will kill me."

Soon gunmen swarmed the hospital, aided by some of the employees. "They were from Balad," Mujamaie said of the men who guided the gunmen from room to room. "They were saying: 'Take this guy. Don't take this guy.' "

As Fadhilla writhed in pain, Abbas, who wore a police uniform, slipped the couple into their car and headed for a midwife outside the city center.

Across Balad, Sunnis like Mujamaie and his wife had begun to flee.

Deep-rooted tensions

For decades this farming region north of Baghdad has been a caldron of mistrust between the Shiite Muslim tribes living in town and the Sunni Arab tribes spread out in the surrounding farmlands.

In the 1970s, the city became a stronghold of Shiite activists of the then-outlawed Islamic Dawa Party, which had strong ties to neighboring Iran. After the Iran-Iraq war erupted in 1980, President Saddam Hussein and his Baath Party supporters cracked down, executing Dawa members, uprooting orchards and seizing the property of well-to-do Shiites to hand over to Sunnis.

The U.S.-led invasion in 2003 upended the balance of power. Shiites began asserting their muscle, angering Sunnis. In 2004, a group loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr took over a Sunni mosque in downtown Balad, declaring it its own.

In February, when a bomb severely damaged the Shiite shrine of the Golden Dome in nearby Samarra, U.S. soldiers said they had to seal off Balad to prevent Shiites from heading there to exact revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0091454

The tally of death squad abductions and shootings mounted. U.S. and Iraqi soldiers found the bodies on farms or floating down the Tigris.

Economic rivalry underlies some of the feuding. The Shiite Bani Tamim tribe in the city and the Sunni Mashadani in the countryside fight for control of trade routes and the transport of construction materials to Baghdad. Tribal vendettas add a complicated layer of bloodshed to the sectarian violence.

In recent months, Sunnis began complaining of Shiite thugs, allegedly with ties to the Sadr organization, manning checkpoints. Shiites, too, warned of a coming breaking point. In September, Baldawi sent a bundle of desperate letters from her constituents to Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"People complained that the situation is not at all secure," she said. "They wanted more security forces to protect the area."

Nevertheless, on Sept. 13, U.S. forces formally handed over control of the area to Iraqis.

The episodic killing continued. A Sunni man visiting the Balad hospital was found dead in the city in early October. On Oct. 6, a group of Sunnis attacked a Shiite-dominated Iraqi army unit. The soldiers killed two Sunni members of the Jabouri tribe.

The final trigger came in the early morning of Oct. 12: a shootout in which soldiers of Iraq's Shiite-dominated government killed an alleged Sunni insurgent. Townspeople, villagers and U.S. troops nervously awaited a Sunni reprisal. It came within hours.

Swarmed by gunmen

Mohammed Adnan Obeidi's mother had warned him not to take construction jobs in the Sunni village of Duluiya. But the 22-year-old Shiite's family is poor, and the Sunni merchant offering work seemed respectable enough. So on Oct. 12, Obeidi, his best friend, Thamer Azzawi, and 14 other men accepted the merchant's offer to rebuild his roof and headed to the village, across the Tigris from Balad.

They finished the job by midday and were heading back when they were swarmed by dozens of masked gunmen who blocked the road and began shouting "God is great!"

The gunmen boarded the workers' bus and demanded that they put their hands on their heads and their heads between their legs. The bus drove on for nearly an hour.

"I tried to see what was happening, but one of the gunmen hit me on the head with the butt of his rifle," Obeidi recalled.

Once the bus stopped, the men were ordered off, handcuffed and blindfolded. The gunmen had walkie-talkies and heavy-caliber machine guns. Azzawi begged for mercy. He was a Sunni, he pleaded. He lied and said that Obeidi, a member of a tribe that includes both sects, was a Sunni too.

"They let us go, only me and my Sunni friend," Obeidi said.

The two froze when they heard gunfire behind them, and walked on for nearly two hours. As night settled, they found a way back to Balad, where they told their stories to police.

The next morning, the bodies of the 14 workers were found on the outskirts of Duluiya. They had been shot at close range and bore signs of torture.

U.S. and Iraqi officials immediately recognized the threat the incident posed for the 200 or so Sunni families living in town in Balad. "It was outside the tribal boundaries," said Jenner, the U.S. intelligence officer. "It was strictly Sunni versus Shiite."

The provincial governor, a Sunni, headed for the city in an attempt to impose calm. But mistrustful Shiites at checkpoints reportedly refused to allow him to enter. Friday prayer leaders in Shiite and Sunni mosques issued calls for calm at noontime. They fell on deaf ears.

No outside job

Though suspicious of each other, Sunnis and Shiites in the Balad area lead intertwined lives. The Sunnis in the countryside grow produce, and the city serves as a commercial hub. Sunnis come into town to use the hospital, shop, make appointments with lawyers and buy and sell cars at auction lots.

When the retaliations against Sunnis began Friday afternoon, killer and victim probably knew each other.

Obeid Nawaf, 51, a Sunni real estate dealer, left for his small house in the countryside as soon as he heard about the slain workers. In the afternoon, he dispatched his brother and son to fetch supplies. He never saw them alive again.

The killings continued Saturday. For hours, mobs killed any Sunni men they encountered. A woman from Duluiya who identified herself only as Umm Mohammed said her 22-year-old son, Hamid, haplessly wandered into Balad for a shopping trip Saturday and was shot by Shiite gunmen.

The gunmen went to car auctions and seized Sunnis, killing them and burning their vehicles.

Hussein Azzawi, a 39-year-old used-car dealer from Duluiya, had sent two of his employees to sell cars in Balad. "They burned the corpses with the cars," he said. "They had committed no crime except they were Sunnis."

Nawaf, the real estate dealer, heard that some of the dead were being taken to the morgue of a nearby town. There he found the bodies of his son and brother. "It cannot be described," he said. "They were cut up and mutilated. There was acid on their faces."

Sunni political and religious leaders accused fighters linked to Sadr's Al Mahdi militia of streaming into the city and leading the killings at the request of Balad residents. But Balad's Shiite residents and U.S. forces reject that theory.

"We don't think it was the Mahdi army," said Capt. Matthew Thomas, the incoming intelligence officer of the 3rd Battalion, 8th Cavalry Regiment.

Capt. Keith L. Carter, a company commander whose area of responsibility included the city, probably knows contemporary Balad better than any other American official. "I don't think you could see violence on this scale by outsiders," he said.

Indeed, days before the attacks, the city's cellphone service had gone down because of an insurgent strike, cutting Balad off from outside communication.

The hatred that day was homegrown.

"There is no Sadr army in Balad and we never asked for their interference," said Tahseen Rasheed, a resident. "It was the families of the victims who decided to retaliate. They armed themselves and stood on the road and started to kill whichever suspects they could find."

Offer of help rejected

The U.S. military monitored events from its base just outside Balad, where its role in policing conflicts has become increasingly marginal. "We could tell the sectarian tension was flaring up," Thomas said. "We got reports of Shiite retaliation against Sunnis."

By Friday afternoon, U.S. forces dispatched a platoon-sized unit into town. The soldiers offered to help the local Iraqi forces keep order. Iraqi officers declined, and the Americans left.

At some point on Saturday, U.S. forces got in touch with Iraqis and told them to establish checkpoints around the city and retrieve bodies. At 5 p.m., city officials declared a 48-hour curfew for Balad and Duluiya, with cars barred from the streets and no traffic allowed in or out of either town.

Nearly 30 hours after the discovery of the bodies of the Shiite workmen, the retaliatory killings subsided.

By then, 36 to 70 Sunnis had been killed in a city about the size of Thousand Oaks. Hassanian Baldawi, an official at the Balad hospital, said two days after the massacre that the facility had received 80 bodies over the previous four days, including those of women.

The Americans' hands-off approach stunned many. "Everyone was asking why the American forces aren't intervening," said Ismail Amili, a 45-year-old hospital employee. "Is it because such bloodshed serves their interests?"

U.S. forces here abide by a tough-love approach, forcing Iraqis to take the lead. "While we probably have the capability of sending all of our forces and barricading the city, it is a good thing that the Iraqis are taking over," Thomas said.

But perhaps U.S. soldiers — consciously or unconsciously — do make a grim calculation that benefits them. Sunni insurgents in the countryside attack American troops as well as Shiites. By contrast, Shiite gunmen often welcome Americans to their towns and primarily target young Sunni men suspected of being insurgents.

Whereas American soldiers get dirty looks in Sunni villages, they can walk through downtown Balad with little fear.

DOJ_NMG_0091456

"Honestly, it makes our job easier," Sgt. Dominie Price, 25, of Wheaton, Ill., said of the Shiites targeting Sunnis. "There's less insurgents attacking us."

Still, even with Americans taking a back-seat approach, Balad is better off with them around, Carter said.

If the U.S. left tomorrow, he has no doubt what would happen: "Shiite gunmen would come to power in Balad and would form a defensive barrier," he said. "The Sunni insurgents would lay siege to the town."

Shortly after the massacre, a reconciliation conference was held in the provincial capital of Tikrit. U.S. officials hailed it as "a clear sign of solidarity among civic, military and religious leaders of Balad." But it failed to produce any political resolution or ease much of the friction between Shiites and Sunnis or the various tribes.

Despite talk of a truce, Sunnis fire mortar rounds every night into Balad and have killed and injured dozens. Shiite police and soldiers battle Sunni gunmen nightly for control of a checkpoint on the edge of the city that serves as the gateway for food, gas and people. The checkpoint has been hit so many times by bombs that its concrete watchtower has collapsed.

And more than half of the 200 or so Sunni families who lived in Balad before the massacre have fled for the countryside, terrified of more bloodshed at the hands of their neighbors.

On a recent day, a visiting U.S. officer praised a ragtag group of Iraqi soldiers and police guarding the checkpoint, called Delta 49. The men had captured two suspected Sunni fighters and killed one. The fighters allegedly were trying to get into town with a cache of dynamite and other munitions.

The 20 young men explained that they were volunteers protecting the gates of the city from the Sunni intruders outside.

"The terrorists come from this area, this area and this area," said police officer Saad Fakhreen Hassan, pointing to the green countryside. "We came here to challenge the terrorists."

Asked about the events of Oct. 13-14, he denies that there were any reprisals against Sunnis in Balad. The Sunni families who left did so because they wanted to, he said.

"Balad right now is surrounded by terrorists, and all the villages are filled with terrorists," he said. "Balad is a peace-loving city."

Mujamaie sees things differently. He and his wife reached the midwife that Friday afternoon, and they now have a baby daughter named Noor.

"The people in Balad are divided," he said. "There are those against the killings and those in favor of them. But I will never go back to Balad. We saw what kind of killers those people are."

Fewer Pakistanis Rally To Support Islamists (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, November 7, 2006

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

For a week after missiles destroyed a madrassah, or religious school, in Pakistan's tribal belt suspected of harboring al-Qaeda officers, thousands of angry men, many armed, have stormed through the area's main towns, chanting jihad against America and endorsing suicide attacks.

But hundreds of miles away, in the cosmopolitan cities of Karachi, Lahore, and Islamabad, relative silence has prevailed.

The difference in response is telling, observers say. It underscores not only an important gap in understanding between the tribal areas and the rest of the country - a gulf that helps keep the area underdeveloped and prone to extremism - but an erosion of the Islamist parties' power on the national stage.

"[The Islamist parties] have used this opportunity to divert people's attention. But in other provinces, people have not responded to the call. They're fed up," says Afrasiab Khattak, former chairman of the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan.

It was supposed to be a raucous week. Fresh on the heels of last Monday's missile attack, the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), the main coalition of religious parties and the ruling entity in the semi-autonomous North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) and Balochistan, called for nationwide protests, hoping to stoke the fires of religious sentiment.

DOJ_NMG_0091457

In Bajaur and other areas of the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA), they got what they wanted. Thousands massed for days in several towns, carrying weapons and calling for jihad. It was even announced that a suicide-bomb squad was preparing to attack the Pakistani military.

As the protests raged, militants in North Waziristan, who recently brokered a peace deal with the government, moved to solidify their power. They passed out leaflets in several towns announcing the establishment of a "Mujahideen Shura" or council to institute "Allah's law in Allah's land," according to local press reports. At least two men suspected of spying for American forces were killed in North Waziristan last week, while several other government-linked tribesmen were shot dead, allegedly for aiding the government's efforts to oust militants.

But this anger, while certainly significant, barely projected beyond the tribal zone. In Islamabad, there were hardly any protests to be seen. Lahore, a city of 10 million, saw a turnout of 500. In Karachi, 5,000 shouted slogans, hardly significant for a metropolis of 15 million.

This contrasts sharply with past protests. In January, when another militant hideout was targeted by the CIA in Bajaur, 10,000 people flooded the streets of Karachi to protest. Not long afterward, the MMA summoned 15,000 protesters in Lahore alone when the controversy over the Danish cartoons erupted, although many speculate that widespread discontent with the government, and not mere religious sentiment, brought them to the streets.

Still, many observers see it as a sign that the power of religious parties over public anger has diminished. The MMA came to power in the NWFP and Balochistan in 2002 on the promise that they would resist Western-oriented foreign policy and govern according to the tenets of Islam. But many of the MMA parties, particularly Jamaat-Ulema-Islami (JUI) - which dominates politics in the North-West Frontier Province, Balochistan, and the tribal zone - have slowly cozied up in recent months to President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's military regime. Such compromises have ultimately undermined their claims to independent credentials, analysts point out. That's perhaps one reason why last week's calls for nationwide strikes were dismissed as pure political play.

"People now realize that they're just doing politics rather than really showing their mettle. They're just using the occasion," says Behroz Khan, a journalist and analyst in Peshawar who writes for Pakistan's The News. Government officials last week echoed this refrain.

"The MMA has already seen that people have rejected their strike call a day before and will not take to the streets today," Muhammad Ali Durrani, the information minister, told a press conference last week. Pakistani authorities had suspected the madrassah of harboring al-Qaeda officers.

Leaders of Jamaat Islami, the MMA's central party, deny these accusations, saying their power is as strong as ever.

"The people believe in Jamaat Islami because ... they have strong leadership and commitment," says Siraj-ul-Haq, a Jamaat Islami leader and member of the provincial assembly in the NWFP. He added that if protests have been muted, it is only because the MMA is working slowly toward its goal of building a nationwide protest movement.

"We are sure we will succeed to organize a new agitation throughout the country," he says.

Certainly, Pakistanis at large condemn last week's missile strike, arguing that the militants should have been arrested. But street protests will continue to founder because, besides the MMA's political weakness, many Pakistanis are only mildly concerned with events in FATA, say analysts. As far as many Pakistanis are concerned, the tribal zone may as well be a different country.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Appeals Court Panel Rejects Challenge To Clearing Of Lay's Convictions (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, November 7, 2006

An appeals court panel has slapped down an Enron shareholder's challenge of a judge's decision to erase former Enron Chairman Ken Lay's criminal convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0091458

The three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals refused to order U.S. District Judge Sim Lake of Houston to reverse his October ruling that cleared Lay's name because the ex-chairman died before he had been sentenced or launched an appeal.

The appeal panel's ruling, issued last week, reiterated what Lake said in his decision: Legal precedent says that "when a defendant who has been found guilty of a federal crime dies before exhaustion of his appeal, his prosecution must be abated, his conviction vacated and his indictment dismissed."

That is how all such situations are to be addressed unless the law is changed by Congress, the U.S. Supreme Court or by the full 5th Circuit, the panel ruled.

Russell P. Butler, the shareholder who challenged Lake's ruling, said he would appeal the panel's decision to the Supreme Court.

"I think we have a good chance," said Butler, who said he lost $8,000 when the disgraced company collapsed nearly five years ago.

Samuel Buffone, who represents Lay's estate, didn't return messages seeking comment tonight.

Lay died of heart disease July 5, just six weeks after he and former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling were convicted of multiple charges including fraud and conspiracy after a four-month trial. Last month Lake sentenced Skilling to more than 24 years in prison. The ex-CEO is confined to his home, awaiting a decision from the U.S. Bureau of Prisons as to where he will serve his time.

Lay's death before sentencing and appeal prompted his lawyers to ask Lake to erase his convictions as allowed by law.

The government fought that move and hoped Congress would act quickly on a new law proposed by the Justice Department that would prevent courts from vacating criminal convictions in similar circumstances. That effort failed.

The government did not appeal Lake's ruling, nor did prosecutors take a position on Butler's challenge.

Had Lay's convictions stood, the government could have pursued efforts to seize millions of dollars in alleged ill-gotten gains through criminal proceedings. Lake's ruling blocked that strategy, leaving the Justice Department to pursue Lay's assets in civil courts.

Days later — on the same day Skilling was sentenced — the Justice Department filed a civil forfeiture claim against Lay's estate that is pending. The Securities and Exchange Commission also has a civil case against Lay and Skilling that has been pending since they were indicted in 2004.

Former Homestore Exec Receives 30-month Sentence (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, November 7, 2006

Peter Tafeen also faces 3 years of supervised release

Peter Tafeen, a former Homestore executive who pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud for his participation in a fraudulent advertising scheme, today was sentenced to serve 30 months in federal prison.

Tafeen was also sentenced to three years of supervised release following the prison sentence, and six months of the supervised release program must be served in home confinement.

Tafeen, who faced a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison, served as executive vice president of business development at Homestore from 1997 to November 2001. Homestore, which has operated Realtor.com and other property-search Web sites, this year re-branded as Move Inc.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner said, "The sentence … was very fair and it reflected both Tafeen's involvement in the crime and his assistance in cooperating with the government during (Stuart) Wolff's trial."

Brian J. Hennigan, a lawyer for Tafeen who is a partner at Los Angeles law firm Irell & Manella LLP, said that Tafeen, who is currently out on bond, will report to prison Jan. 8. The judge, he said, has recommended that Tafeen serve his prison sentence in a Pensacola, Fla.-area prison near Tafeen's home.

A facility in that area is the Federal Prison Camp in Pensacola, a minimum-security prison that is on the grounds of the Saufley Field Naval facility.

DOJ_NMG_0091459

As part of a plea agreement announced in March, Tafeen had agreed to testify against his former boss, Stuart Wolff, who was chief executive of Homestore during the accounting scandal. Tafeen had faced similar charges to Wolff before entering into the plea agreement, which came a few weeks before his trial was scheduled to begin.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Justice Department had filed criminal and civil cases against Wolff and Tafeen in April 2005.

Last month, Wolff was sentenced to 15 years in federal prison and ordered to pay a $5 million fine and restitution to victims of a financial scheme that deceived investors by artificially inflating revenues.

U.S. District Court Judge Percy Anderson found Wolff guilty of conspiracy, three counts of filing false statements with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, four counts of lying to accountants, five counts of fraudulent insider trading, and five counts of falsification of corporate books and records.

The judge had also ordered that Wolff must not be involved in any business relating to Internet advertising, and Wolff is reportedly appealing his conviction. A hearing is scheduled next Monday related to Wolff's request to stay out of custody on bail pending his appeal.

Tafeen, after leaving Homestore, in October 2003 filed a lawsuit against the company charging that he was owed millions of dollars relating to legal expenses. Homestore officials reached a settlement through which the company would pay up to $11.9 million to support Tafeen's legal costs.

The company also had reached a separate agreement to pay up to about $15.2 million related to Wolff's legal expenses.

Ten other individuals have pleaded guilty in connection with the illegal financial scheme at Homestore, which involved multimillion-dollar "circular" advertising transactions with AOL and other companies through which Homestore essentially paid itself by routing money to and from other companies and disguising the true nature of those transactions.

Wilner said three former Homestore employees are still awaiting sentencing, including the company's former CFO Joseph Shew, 37; former chief operating officer John Giesecke Jr.; and Jeffrey Kalina, who had served as senior manager of mergers and acquisitions transactions at Homestore.

Jury Acquits, Hangs In Trial Of McKesson's Former CEO And GC (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, November 7, 2006

The securities fraud trial against the former CEO and general counsel of HBOC -- now McKesson Corp. -- was never an easy one for the government.

The government's central witnesses were snitches of questionable credibility -- so much so that prosecutors declined to bring one key witness to the stand.

And in an earlier bench trial of another executive, a judge found their testimony was not credible enough to convict.

So it wasn't terribly surprising Friday when a jury acquitted former CEO Charles McCall and ex-GC Jay Lapine of conspiring to commit securities fraud while deadlocking on six other counts.

That's not to say it didn't hit the lawyers involved like a sack of bricks: There were tears on both sides, most notably from Theodore Wells Jr., the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who represented McCall in the six-week trial.

"I've been living in a hotel in San Francisco since August the 14th working, truly, 20-hour days," Wells told a group of reporters outside the courtroom. "The fact that I was emotional, given the circumstances, is entirely understandable."

Mark Topel of Topel & Goodman, who argued Lapine's case, was similarly relieved after the acquittal and U.S. District Judge Martin Jenkins' subsequent declaration of a mistrial on the other counts.

Topel said he saw the case as one in which the people who admitted to the conspiracy -- a brace of lower-ranking executives who entered guilty pleas -- couldn't be trusted when it came to fingering higher-ups.

He pointed to prosecutors' decision to not take testimony from Jay Gilbertson, the company's CFO who in 2003 pleaded guilty to being involved in the fraud scheme which misstated billions of dollars in earnings. Gilbertson blamed it on Lapine and McCall, and was seen as potentially being the key witness before the trial started.

DOJ_NMG_0091460

"The fact that they didn't call him sends a strong signal that they didn't think he was credible enough to put in front of a jury," Topel said.

While the conspiracy acquittal was victory for the defense, on three fraud counts 11 of 12 jurors voted to convict -- giving prosecutors an enticing incentive to bring a new trial.

The jury deliberated for six days before deciding that it was hopelessly stuck on the deadlocked counts, creating a source of intense stress for the lawyers.

They spent most of this week pacing the federal building halls, since Jenkins required them to stick around until a verdict was rendered.

"It doesn't usually drag out that long, waiting for a verdict. That made it more exciting," said Michael Shepard, a partner at Heller Ehrman and a lawyer for McCall who conducted cross examinations in the case.

He and the other defense lawyers said the victory was particularly gratifying because of the post-Enron shadow cast over corporate executives.

McCall, Wells said, "is the first CEO or chair of a major corporation to go to trial post Enron, post-WorldCom, and be acquitted."

The McKesson case grew out of a $9 billion scheme to inflate software company HBOC's profits by misstating contract terms to maintain the company's value in preparation for the merger with pharmaceutical distributor McKesson.

Four top executives entered guilty pleas after the scheme was uncovered, and in 2003, their cooperation led to the indictments of Lapine and McCall.

A trial of former McKesson CFO Richard Hawkins brought an acquittal last year. In that bench trial, Jenkins found that a key cooperator, former company Vice President Albert Bergonzi, was not credible. Bergonzi also testified in the latest trial.

Former Latham & Watkins partner Timothy Crudo was the assistant U.S. attorney who led the prosecution. Another AUSA, Brian Stretch, also handled a sizable portion of the arguments.

After the case, Crudo referred requests for comment to office spokesman Luke Macaulay, who didn't return calls or e-mails.

It's not clear whether the government will seek a new trial, and Jenkins said that given the schedules of the various lawyers, there'll be no new hearings until next year.

That's fine with Wells, whose highest-profile client -- former Bush administration official I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- is getting ready for his own trial in Washington in connection with the highly publicized leak of a CIA agent's identity.

"I am going to move out of this hotel and I'm going to move into another hotel," Wells told Jenkins.

Fed Warns Of Illicit Bond Activity (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

The Federal Reserve put traders on notice yesterday that it is scrutinizing activity in the bond market, highlighting recent concerns that some traders may have made illicit profits by manipulating securities prices.

Dino Kos, executive vice president of the markets group at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, led an hour-long discussion of such concerns yesterday with representatives of the bank's 22 primary dealers -- the banks and securities firms that trade Treasury securities with the central bank.

The Fed meets with its dealers periodically to discuss market issues, but this was the first session devoted to suspicions at the Treasury Department about possible manipulation of the market for government bills, notes and bonds, and for futures contracts and other financial contracts linked to the securities.

The government's concerns were detailed in a Sept. 27 speech by James Clouse, deputy assistant Treasury secretary for federal finance. He described ways in which traders could control the supply of highly sought Treasury securities, driving up their prices. Such practices enable traders to borrow money at low interest rates and then invest it at higher rates to earn a profit.

The U.S. Treasury market plays a critical role in the global financial system, allowing the federal government to borrow and pay for its activities, providing benchmarks to lenders setting interest rates, and serving as a tool for the Fed to adjust interest rates in its efforts to control inflation and encourage economic growth. "Ensuring the integrity of the Treasury market is essential," Clouse said in his speech.

Over the past two years, government agencies that monitor financial markets have "observed instances in which firms appeared to gain a significant degree of control over highly sought-after Treasury issues and seemed to use that market power to their advantage," Clouse said. "In the process, prices in the . . . markets appear to have been distorted to varying degrees."

Clouse noted that some of the trading patterns may have innocent explanations. But he warned that others might violate securities laws that prohibit market manipulation. Neither Clouse nor the Fed would identify which firms have engaged in questionable trading. The Fed regulates major banks but does not investigate suspected trading violations.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, which enforces securities laws, declined to say whether it was investigating any specific firms and declined to comment on the Fed's meeting. The Wall Street Journal has reported that the SEC is probing UBS AG, which has said it is cooperating with government authorities.

The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, which represents bond traders, declined to comment on the Fed meeting and statement. But it plans to organize discussions with Treasury to clarify which trading practices are causing concern, said Robert Toomey, the group's vice president and assistant general counsel.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Man Set For Execution For Slaying Of Bank Guard Alleges Prosecutorial Misconduct (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Gelineau, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 7, 2006

(AP) - RICHMOND, Virginia-Attorneys for a man scheduled to be executed Thursday for the 1999 slaying of a bank security guard have appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court and say his life should be spared because a prosecutor withheld information about a key witness.

John Yancey Schmitt, 33, is set to die by injection at Greensville Correctional Center in Virginia for the fatal shooting of 39-year-old Earl Shelton Dunning during a bank robbery.

In their petition to the Supreme Court and in a clemency petition to Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, Schmitt's attorneys criticize prosecutor Warren Von Schuch's actions, which they say could have influenced the jury's decision to recommend a death sentence. In the clemency petition, they also argue the shooting of Dunning was accidental.

Von Schuch said there was no prosecutorial misconduct, and described the killing as cold-blooded and clearly premeditated.

"The court found that we did nothing wrong," Von Schuch said. "This is simply defense attorneys misrepresenting the truth to the public."

On Feb. 17, 1999, Schmitt entered the bank wearing sunglasses and a bulky jacket, attracting the attention of Dunning, who followed him inside. After shooting Dunning, Schmitt fled with nearly $36,000 (â,¬28,000) in cash. Schmitt had robbed the same bank a month earlier.

In 2000, a jury convicted Schmitt of capital murder and robbery and firearms charges and recommended a death sentence, declaring him a future danger to society.

Last year, U.S. District Judge Robert Payne wrote that Von Schuch did not disclose information the defense contends could have cast doubt on the credibility of one of the prosecution's witnesses, a man who surreptitiously recorded a damning jailhouse phone call with Schmitt.

In the taped conversation, Schmitt discusses the slaying without remorse, at one point laughing as he describes how Dunning's eyes "got real big" when he saw the gun pointed at him. The tape, introduced during the trial's sentencing phase, was described by the district court judge as "a ticket to the death chamber."

DOJ_NMG_0091462

The man who taped the call - a friend of Schmitt's - had been offered a grant of immunity in return for his cooperation with authorities. That information - not turned over by prosecutors - could have made him appear to be less credible and therefore affected the jury's sentencing decision, the defense contends.

"All it takes to prevent a death penalty from being imposed is to convince one juror to vote for life," attorney Dana Finberg said.

But Payne ultimately decided there was no reasonable probability that the verdict would have been different if the information had been turned over to the defense. In July, a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed, though not before criticizing the prosecution for failing to disclose the information.

Schmitt - who declined through his attorney to be interviewed - had been in trouble with the law for years and showed no remorse for the killing, Von Schuch said.

"He's a man with a terribly inadequately developed conscience," Von Schuch said. "And that's why he deserves to die."

Polygamist Compound South Dakota Still Growing (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

A compound reportedly occupied by members of polygamist leader Warren Jeffs' sect continues to expand southwest of Pringle, South Dakota, even though Jeffs is behind bars in southern Utah.

The group has built several structures on the 100-acre property since October 2003.

In March, The Salt Lake Tribune reported that members of Jeffs' church had acquired remote land southwest of Pringle.

Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which practices polygamy. He was a fugitive for nearly two years, sought on charges in both Utah and Arizona accusing him of arranging marriages between underage girls and older men. Jeffs was placed on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list last spring. Jeffs was arrested Aug. 28 during a traffic stop near Las Vegas.

He is being held in Washington County, Utah, at the Purgatory Correctional Facility. A preliminary hearing in his case has been scheduled later this month in 5th District Court in St. George, Utah.

Private investigators have said they believed the Pringle compound was among places Jeffs had hidden while he was on the run, but state and federal authorities said they could not confirm that.

United Land Management, a group with ties to the church, bought another 40 acres next to the compound: 15 acres in March for $37,500 and 25 acres on Oct. 13 for $275,000. The second piece of property includes a new 2,400-square-foot log home, documents at the Custer County courthouse show.

Les Struble, Custer County equalization director, said compound members also have begun work on another, larger lodge that will total more than 14,000 square feet. It is to have 18 bedrooms and 14 bathrooms, according to documents.

Struble said one or two lodges a year have been built on the gated compound. The lodges are each about 3,000 square feet, with large kitchens and living rooms, plus separate bedrooms and bathrooms.

``What they use them for, I don't know," Struble said. ``That's just speculation on anybody's part."

He has been on the compound to assess the property for tax purposes. Struble said he saw only the men who escorted him and others either working on the buildings or tending gardens. Struble said he saw no women or children on his visits.

Neighbors last spring said they saw as many as 60 people, including women and children, on the grounds.

The assessed value is about $1.5 million. After the new lodge is done, Struble said the total assessment likely will be between $2.5 million and $3 million.

The compound pays its taxes on time and has met every county rule and requirement, he said. ``It's amazing. I have not found anything that did not match their building plans to the inch. Everything they said they're going to do, they've done."

Its tax bill next year will be about $30,000.

Polygamy is against South Dakota law, but no one has filed a complaint about the Pringle compound, said Rick Wheeler, Custer County sheriff. ``I've got to have some kind of complaint to go in there."

The sheriff said he hopes to establish even minimal communication with compound leaders in case of a fire or other emergency. ``It's something I'm going to be working on," he said.

Sunland Park Man Arrested In Kidnapping (EPT)

El Paso Times, November 7, 2006

A man from Sunland Park has been arrested in connection with the kidnapping of an El Paso teenager in May.

Noe Guadalupe Ochoa, 20, of Sunland Park is facing five separate charges stemming from the May 4 kidnapping at gunpoint of a 16-year-old El Paso boy, whose identity was withheld because he is minor, Federal Bureau of Investigations spokeswoman Agent Andrea Simmons said.

Ochoa is charged with conspiracy to kidnap; kidnapping a minor; using a firearm in a crime of violence; possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute; and conspiracy to distribute marijuana, Simmons said.

An FBI investigation revealed that the teenager was taken from outside his home and held for ransom in Juárez. The day after he disappeared he was rescued by FBI agents and the Chihuahua state police anti-kidnapping unit.

The teenager was found unharmed and in a car in Juárez near the Paso del Norte Bridge, where a ransom was supposed to be delivered. Mexican authorities have said the boy was held for a $40,000 ransom, which negotiators managed to reduce to $17,000.

Two men -- Pedro Rocha Rios, 35, and Rodolfo Rivera Aguilar, 29, both of Juárez -- were arrested by Mexican authorities when the teenager was found.

The FBI investigation led to the federal indictments of Jonathan Ocon of Albuquerque; his brother, Ivan Ocon, of Las Cruces; and Lucas B. Wittmayer of Albuquerque.

Simmons said they were indicted on May 17 on federal kidnapping charges related to the teenager's disappearance. The Ocon brothers were arrested June 19. Wittmayer, who has an outstanding arrest warrant, remains at large.

FBI Charges Man In Kidnapping (KFOX)

KFOX-TV, November 7, 2006

A Sunland Park man is in FBI custody for his alleged role in a kidnapping.

FBI agents told KFOX that 20-year-old Noe Guadalupe Ochoa was arrested late last week.

In May of this year, a 16-year-old male was kidnapped at gunpoint in El Paso and taken to Juarez where he was held for ransom.

The teenager was recovered safely less than two days later.

Ochoa now faces charges including kidnapping a minor, using a firearm in a crime of violence, and possession and conspiracy to distribute marijuana.

FBI Looking At Whether Duncan Linked To North Dakota Slaying (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

FARGO, N.D. -- The FBI is investigating whether convicted murderer and sex offender Joseph Edward Duncan III might be involved in the slaying of a Montana teenager found dead in North Dakota four years ago.

"We're a long way from saying he's a suspect, but it's certainly a case we're reviewing," said Donald Robinson, an FBI supervisor in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

Russell Turcotte, of Wolf Point, Mont., was 19 when he disappeared in July 2002. He called his mother from Grand Forks, and she promised to wire him money so he could take the bus home. His body was found in a tree grove along U.S. Highway 2 near Devils Lake the following November.

Duncan, 43, who was living in Fargo when Turcotte disappeared, pleaded guilty last month to murder and kidnapping in Idaho, in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty. He was charged in state court with bludgeoning a man, a woman and a teenager to death at a home near Coeur d'Alene in 2005 so he could kidnap the woman's two youngest children for sex.

Federal authorities are expected to charge Duncan in the abduction of the children and the killing of one of them, a 9-year-old boy.

Authorities say Duncan, a Tacoma, Wash., native, spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons for sex crimes against children. He also is being investigated in the slayings of two children in Washington and one in California.

Bill Turcotte said his family asked the FBI last year whether Duncan might be a suspect in his son's death.

Robinson said the FBI is putting together a timeline on Duncan's whereabouts dating back to the early 1990s.

"Every single day Mr. Duncan was out of custody, we're looking at where he was - and we're looking at all sorts of unsolved crimes," Robinson said.

"There is no direct evidence Mr. Duncan was involved in the disappearance of Mr. Turcotte," Robinson said. "Mr. Duncan was in North Dakota at that time."

Bill Turcotte said the FBI told him there is evidence placing Duncan at the same Grand Forks truck stop "within hours" of the time Russell Turcotte was last seen.

Robinson said he could not comment on "anything that may or may not be evidence."

Bill Turcotte said investigators were skeptical of any possible connection because his son was 19 and Duncan preyed on children.

"Russell was very young in appearance and he was also very vulnerable," Bill Turcotte said. "He was traveling alone and was looking for help, so maybe he reached out for the first person who offered him a hand and it was the wrong person."

Dallas Woman Sentenced In FEMA Fraud Case (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DALLAS (AP) — A Dallas woman who pleaded guilty to defrauding the Federal Emergency Management Agency of $80,000 through false claims for Hurricane Katrina benefits was sentenced Monday to nearly six years in prison.

U.S. District Judge David C. Godbey sentenced Lakietha Diann Hall, 35, to 70 months in prison. She was ordered to pay $83,254 in restitution. In a related case, she pleaded guilty to one count of failure to appear.

Hall admitted in court documents that she conspired with nine others between August and December of last year.

Hall was accused of leading a scam in which she submitted online claims for disaster and unemployment assistance on behalf of several of the other defendants, falsely stating that their primary homes were in areas devastated by Katrina and that the hurricane caused them to lose their jobs.

All of Hall's co-defendants have pleaded guilty.

Hall was initially arrested in December, and authorities seized more than $10,000 in cash during a search of her apartment. She pleaded guilty in July.

Business Owner Pleads Guilty (HARTC)

The Hartford Courant, November 7, 2006

The owner of an East Windsor mail consolidation business pleaded guilty Tuesday to mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor said.

Thomas J. Rueli, 48, of Springfield, who owned Total Logistics Services Inc., was charged with establishing a line of credit with a commercial lender of up to $12 million based on fraudulently inflated account data. He was also accused of paying bribes to another business owner and conspiring not to report the transactions to the IRS, O'Connor said in a statement.

Rueli was also accused of leaving mailings he had contracted to deliver at a recycling center. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 29 and faces penalties of up to 30 years in prison and $23 million in fines, O'Connor said.

A La Verkin man is facing a mandatory five-year prison sentence after admitting to downloading dozens of images of child pornography off the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0091465

Terence D. William, 53, appeared in U.S. District Court on Monday to enter a guilty plea to one count of receiving child pornography. William was arrested and charged last August as part of a nationwide sting on a Web site based out of Orlando, Fla., that sold images of child pornography.

The federal investigation netted more than 125 people who allegedly subscribed to the Web site, including three Utah men. A St. George man and a Midvale man are also facing child-pornography possession charges.

In court Monday, William admitted to downloading between 10 and 150 images of children engaged in sexual acts.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell ordered a psycho-sexual evaluation before William is sentenced on March 6. When sentenced, he faces a mandatory five years, and up to 30 years, in prison.

In exchange for his guilty plea, federal prosecutors dropped an additional possession charge and will recommend that William be given credit for accepting responsibility.

Prosecutor Kills Himself In Texas Raid Over Child Sex (NYT)

By Tim Eaton

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

TERRELL, Tex., Nov. 6 — A prosecutor in this North Texas town killed himself Sunday as the police tried to arrest him on charges of soliciting sex over the Internet from a person he thought was a 13-year-old boy.

The prosecutor, Louis Conradt Jr., 56, had been caught in a sting operation set up by Dateline NBC, the television news magazine, and an Internet watchdog group called Perverted Justice. An NBC camera crew was outside the house to film the scene when the fatal shot was fired.

Mr. Conradt had refused to open the door when police officers arrived at his house, where he lived alone, said Sgt. Snow Robertson of the Police Department in Murphy, a nearby town where officers said Mr. Conradt intended to meet the boy he thought he had communicated with.

Officers eventually forced their way into the house, only to find that Mr. Conradt had shot himself in the head with a small-caliber semi-automatic handgun, Sergeant Robertson said. Mr. Conradt died later at Parkland Hospital in Dallas.

Police officers from Murphy had gone to the house with a tactical team and two officers from Terrell to serve a warrant for Mr. Conradt's arrest. One of the officers from Terrell knew Mr. Conradt from his work as a prosecutor, Sergeant Robertson said.

Mr. Conradt had been a district attorney in Kaufman County and was the chief felony assistant district attorney in Rockwall County at the time of his death.

The police planned to search his computer and his house, Sergeant Robertson said.

The sergeant's department had been working with Perverted Justice and NBC News in a sting operation singling out people who solicit sex from children.

Allison Gollust, an NBC News spokeswoman, said the crew for Dateline NBC's "To Catch a Predator" series was taping as the police approached the house. But Ms. Gollust added that no one from Dateline had had contact with Mr. Conradt and that there was nothing to suggest that he had seen the crew before he turned the gun on himself.

"There's absolutely no evidence that would suggest that he was aware of us," Ms. Gollust said. "We don't anticipate making a change to our reporting."

Xavier Von Erck, director of operations with Perverted Justice, said Mr. Conradt had made contact in an AOL chat room with a decoy from Perverted Justice who was posing as a 13-year-old boy. Mr. Von Erck would not disclose the details of the chat, but he said, "It was sexual in nature."

Unlike some suspects in pedophile stings that appear on "Dateline NBC," Mr. Conradt had not actually met the person he thought was the teenager, but Sergeant Robertson said he planned to do so. Perverted Justice staff members found profiles from Mr. Conradt on AOL, Yahoo and MySpace.com, Mr. Von Erck said. He also said that he thought Mr. Conradt had tried to erase at least one online profile, on MySpace.com, a popular online social networking community used mainly by teenagers, in the moments before he shot himself.

Sergeant Robertson said the police in his town of 3,100 had apprehended 22 other people in stings since last Thursday, mostly from the Dallas-Fort Worth area, with the help of Perverted Justice. He said more would be arrested in the coming days.

"We'll continue to work with them right now," Sergeant Robertson said.

Perverted Justice stings have led to the arrests of 260 people nationwide this year, Mr. Von Erck said.

Several residents in this town of 14,000 about 30 miles east of Dallas said they were shocked to hear the accusations of pedophilia against Mr. Conradt, who had served two terms as district attorney.

Kirby Webb, an investment advisor from Terrell, said he never wanted to hear about people taking their own lives, but he applauded law enforcement's effort to catch online child predators in the town.

"This is a good family town," Mr. Webb said. "We want to preserve that image."

Series Of Deaths Rattles A City (WP)

By Robert Gutsche Jr.

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

LA CROSSE, Wis. -- At night the Mississippi River here is black like pavement. Lights brighten the shoreline, where walkways end with a steep drop at the river's edge. There is no railing. Even to a familiar eye, the river looks like an empty parking lot.

This is where eight young men have apparently drowned in the past nine years, just blocks from the busy downtown bar district where many victims had been reported seen last. The latest victim was found in October.

Officials from the city and the three colleges and universities here -- as well as a group of vocal college students -- say the men became intoxicated and accidentally fell into the river.

Yet as the number of fatalities grows, so does the idea that a serial killer could be loose.

"There just ain't no people who want to walk by the water at night," said Yulonda St. Junious, 34, a hotel worker. "That makes you think someone else has had something to do with it."

All of the victims were young, athletic, and either visiting La Crosse or attending college in the city. Toxicology results have indicated that almost all had high levels of alcohol in their systems when they died.

Still, the similarities among the apparent drowning victims have many concerned that the students are being stalked -- lured into the black waters by a female posing as a police officer or a man wielding a gun, locals say.

"They must have been following someone they trusted," said resident Rusty Paar, 39, who is sure these deaths are murders.

While the idea of a serial killer is gaining credence in some quarters of La Crosse, other residents say the explanation is merely a way to deflect attention from the criticism that city and college officials are not working hard enough to crack down on underage drinking or to secure the waterline from accidental drownings.

"People would rather blame a serial killer than take responsibility," said Drew Gavrilos, a community services police officer who acts as a liaison between the police and the universities.

The idea among residents and some officials that a serial killer could be lurking in La Crosse and the Upper Midwest is not new.

For decades, this city of 50,000 has turned to that theory to explain missing persons and the few murders that happen, with many saying the river and bluffs along the city's borders are dumping zones for bodies.

"The rumor mill here is still alive and well," said Paula Knudson, dean of students at the University of Wisconsin at La Crosse. "But you can't think about what's happening here from a sober perspective. It is easy for those who drink a lot that they might be able to be disoriented and get lost downtown. It happens."

The chief of police has declined to comment on the cases, but late last month -- to either quell or confirm the serial killer rumors -- local police turned to the FBI for a formal review of the most recent death.

Linda Krieg, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Milwaukee office, told the Associated Press that her office will forward everything the La Crosse Police Department has on the drownings to the FBI's National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime in Quantico.

"They still believe these are drownings and they're accidental," she said. "They just asked if there's anything else they could be looking at."

DOJ_NMG_0091467

Still, many say the city is not making efforts to slow or stop the deaths.

"I am frustrated that nothing was done, not only with this death, but with past deaths," said Viterbo University student Travis Bassett, 21, speaking of the most recent victim. "And when the government doesn't meet the peoples' needs, it is time to do it ourselves."

Bassett is one of at least 20 college students who have donated much of their late weekend nights over the past month to patrol Riverside Park, where many of the apparent drownings are suspected to have occurred. The students walk in pairs, wearing reflective vests and carrying police-issued cellphones and flashlights. Their goals are to prevent drinkers from falling into the water and to pull them out if they do.

In the past month, patrollers report having met at least two intoxicated college students in the park and calling police to take them home.

Several attempts to build a fence or barrier along the river have been blocked by the City Council, and city groups have also opposed proposals for video cameras along the walkways.

The city has created several task forces to evaluate limiting access to the park after hours, and it has instituted fees for beer-keg rentals and restrictions on bartenders' drinking as they serve customers.

But officials were slow to replace deteriorating portions of the levee at the park where many of the men apparently fell, and the city does not have plans to continue improving the area, including reducing a steep slope from the park onto the levee and into the river. The City Council is scheduled to vote again in the coming weeks on recommendations to improve the park.

Mayor Mark Johnsrud said the city should not be responsible for a person's drinking or its consequences. He does not entertain the idea of a serial killer, either.

"The thing I keep hearing about these kids is that they are good kids," Johnsrud said. "The definition of a good kid to me is that they know the difference between right and wrong. And this means they didn't make the good choice by getting intoxicated and placing themselves in the situation where they could die."

Johnsrud, who has been mayor since 2005, says he is not interested in making major changes to a public park, including fencing it off at night, just to keep a few people out of a potentially dangerous area.

The debate has made its way to the opinion pages of the local newspaper, with some writers supporting the rumors of a serial killer and others claiming that the victims had simply stopped at the river to relieve themselves and toppled in.

Still, the most apparent sentiment is this: "It is shocking to me, and the government here grinds very slowly," said the Rev. Tom O'Neill, vice president for mission and ministry at Viterbo University. "We've got lots of fine minds in this town that we ought to be able to do other things than say 'College kids shouldn't drink' or blame a serial killer that might not exist."

Jury Duty Is Getting Harder To Shirk (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, November 7, 2006

The murder trial in the shootings that left five people dead at Pato's Place Bar was the biggest in the history of Tulare, Calif. However, when the judge in the case tried to pick a jury, only 160 of 500 people summoned to jury duty showed.

The shortage of jury candidates delayed last year's trial of Donald and Timothy Young, brothers charged with capital murder. It also prompted court officials in Tulare, a city of 52,000 between Fresno and Bakersfield, to revamp the jury system in July.

Tulare is among dozens of communities across the USA that are punishing no-show jury candidates.

“We were down to a 50% response rate. That is simply not acceptable,” says Tulare County Superior Court Judge Lloyd Hicks.

Tulare jury candidates who fail to show are warned that they could be found in contempt of court. If they do not respond, a second letter is sent, warning that a warrant will be issued for their arrest, Hicks says.

No one keeps national figures on jury duty no-shows, but the American Judicature Society considers the problem an epidemic in some communities, especially large urban areas such as Miami, Houston and Atlanta, where no-show rates routinely top 50%, says David McCord, a society spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0091468

For years, courts across the nation have tried to make jury service more attractive by, among other things, increasing juror pay and offering amenities. This year, for example, Texas increased pay from $6 a day to $40, and no-show rates declined, says Rob Walters, a Texas attorney who worked on a jury service improvement project. Paula Hannaford-Agor, director of the Center for Jury Studies in Williamsburg, Va., says some courts have equipped jury pool rooms with wireless Internet service.

Now, communities are emphasizing the consequences of skipping jury duty. Among them:

•In Danville, Ill., a 19-year-old woman was found in contempt of court and sentenced to 14 days in jail for failing to appear for jury duty.

•In Topeka, no-shows have been fined up to $100 a day.

•In Grand Rapids, Mich., warrants were issued recently for the arrests of 56 people who failed to go to court and explain why they couldn't serve.

Failure to show up for jury duty increases court costs, Hicks says, because court officials have to send out additional summonses. High no-show rates also put at risk one of the most basic tenets of our democracy, he says.

“One of the reasons for our severing ties from England was being deprived of the right to trial by jury,” Hicks says. “It is a sacred right.”

In Fulton County, Ga., attorneys for Brian Nichols are raising the issue of an unrepresentative jury in his capital murder trial, now set for Jan. 11. Nichols is charged with killing an Atlanta judge and three others in a courthouse rampage March 11, 2005.

Nichols' attorneys say Fulton's high no-show rate for jurors — estimated by the county to be at least 47% — altered the racial composition of the grand jury pool. They have asked that the charges be dismissed because the panel that indicted Nichols was underrepresented by minorities, and that a new representative grand jury be seated.

“We're asking that the jury be properly constructed and meet the mandates of state and federal law,” says Gary Parker, one of Nichols' attorneys.

Fulton County officials say incorrect addresses are to blame for much of the problem with juror no-shows. Matthew Sorenson, deputy court administrator, says a plan to fix the situation may not be in place to affect Nichols' upcoming trial.

In Tulare, Hicks says the letters sent to no-shows produced an immediate 10% increase in jury service. Of 1,600 who hadn't responded to the first summons, all but 73 had replied by last week.

“By the time we arrest a few people, the response rate for jury service will go up further,” he says.”

Abortion Clinics Request O'Reilly Probe (AP-Y)

By John Hanna

AP, November 7, 2006

Two abortion clinics asked the state's highest court Monday to investigate Attorney General Phill Kline and Fox television's Bill O'Reilly over O'Reilly's statements that he had information from Kansas abortion records.

A Kline spokeswoman called the move "a political ploy."

The clinics' attorneys want the Kansas Supreme Court to seize records that Kline, an outspoken abortion opponent, obtained on 90 of the clinics' patients. Kline received edited versions of the records from a district judge on Oct. 24 after arguing he wanted to review the records for evidence of possible crimes including rape and illegal abortions.

The attorneys asked the court to appoint a special prosecutor to determine whether O'Reilly's information came from the records turned over to Kline.

There is no record of the Supreme Court ever appointing a special prosecutor, court spokesman Ron Keefover said.

O'Reilly said Friday on his show, "The O'Reilly Factor," that an inside source gave him information that a doctor at one of the clinics, George Tiller, had performed late-term abortions because patients were depressed. O'Reilly deemed it "executing babies."

He said on his Monday radio show he "got information" about Tiller's activities "somewhere along the line."

"I'm not going to tell you when or anything else about how we got them," O'Reilly said.

Kline spokeswoman Sherriene Jones has said the attorney general doesn't know how O'Reilly obtained the information.

David Tabacoff, executive producer of "The O'Reilly Factor," issued a statement saying, "We stand by our story."

DOJ_NMG_0091469

The two clinics requesting the investigation are Tiller's Wichita clinic and a Planned Parenthood-run clinic in Overland Park. Tiller, one of the few U.S. doctors to perform late-term abortions, has been targeted by protesters for years, his clinic was bombed in 1985 and he was shot by a protester in 1993.

The clinics' request for an investigation was the second in a week targeting the attorney general. On Wednesday, former Attorney General Bob Stephan, a Republican like Kline, asked the state Governmental Ethics Commission to examine Kline's fundraising and activities involving churches. Kline is running for a second term.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Dismisses House Democrats' Lawsuit Over Budget Bill (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DETROIT - A federal judge on Monday dismissed a lawsuit filed by U.S. House Democrats trying to stop a $39 billion budget bill because the House and Senate did not approve identical versions.

House Democrats accused GOP leaders of abusing the legislative process and contend they were denied their right to vote on legislation signed into law by President Bush in February. Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee, sued in April along with 10 other House members to prevent the law from being implemented.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and the language was approved by the House on Feb. 1.

When the bill was sent to Bush for his signature, the number was back to 13 months. The lawsuit said the oversight amounted to an additional $2 billion in spending, and the plaintiffs claimed that because they never had the chance to vote on the version signed into law, the law was invalid.

The Department of Justice had sought the lawsuit's dismissal, claiming the 11 House members lacked standing because they are not renters of medical equipment and were not in "any way personally affected or injured."

Messages seeking comment were left Monday night with Conyers' office and the Justice Department.

The White House and Republican leaders in Congress have said the matter is settled because the mistake was technical and top House and Senate leaders certified the bill before transmitting it to the White House.

Abortion Method Returns To Justices (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Douglas Johnson, the lobbyist for the National Right to Life Committee, first heard a description 14 years ago of a midterm abortion procedure, he felt a sense of revulsion and saw an opportunity.

He was convinced that if most Americans knew about it, they would think differently about abortion.

Johnson and a congressman coined a name for it: "partial-birth abortion." The antiabortion group obtained and widely distributed a set of line drawings that illustrated the procedure. Johnson said he thought "the reaction of many Americans to seeing a drawing of this would be to say: 'This can't be legal.' "

Whether that procedure, known medically as dilation and extraction or D&X, will be legal comes before the Supreme Court on Wednesday, the day after the midterm elections.

With two new Bush appointees on the court — one replacing a justice who supported abortion rights — Johnson and other abortion opponents are optimistic that, for the first time, the court will uphold an outright ban on an abortion method.

The campaign against the procedure has succeeded where other attacks on abortion failed.

By branding it gruesome and unnecessary, Johnson won broad support for a criminal ban, even from lawmakers who usually vote in support of abortion rights. And he tapped into the public's public discomfort with abortions late in a pregnancy. A 2003 CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll showed, by a ratio of more than 2 to 1, that Americans believe abortion should be illegal in the second trimester.

DOJ_NMG_0091470

A win for Johnson and abortion foes would chip away at the court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which held that women have a constitutional right to an abortion.

Those fighting a ban argue that the disputed procedure is sometimes the safest method for aborting a fetus in midterm and, despite the attention it receives, is not commonly used.

Johnson, 55, first heard about it in 1992, when someone mailed an Ohio doctor's account to his organization. In the procedure, performed in the fifth or sixth month, the fetus is pulled partway out of the dilated cervix and the skull punctured to collapse it, allowing the fetus to be removed intact from the uterus.

Working out of a small, drab Washington office, Johnson tried to shift the focus of the abortion debate from the rights of pregnant women to the fetuses. He walked the halls of Congress with a briefcase that included a plastic model of a 20-week-old fetus that he used to make his case.

Relentless, Johnson was dubbed "the most effective lobbyist in Washington" by a conservative magazine.

Twice in the 1990s, Congress passed bills to outlaw the procedure, except to save a mother's life, but President Clinton vetoed them. He said he would sign such legislation if lawmakers added an exception for when the procedure was needed to preserve the health of the woman.

Abortion foes refused. They distrusted health exceptions, believing they would render a ban meaningless. Roe vs. Wade had defined health to include emotional, psychological, familial and age factors.

Based on language drafted by Johnson's office, 30 state legislatures had enacted bans by the late 1990s.

In 2003, President Bush signed the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act without an exception for health concerns.

It's not clear that the ban would affect many abortions. Only 1% to 2% of abortions take place after the 20th week of pregnancy.

Of these, about 3,000 to 5,000 per year are done with D&X. Doctors say only a small percentage of those are done because of medical complications or fetal deformity.

Johnson's attack on the procedure put the abortion-rights movement on the defensive. Its leaders argue that abortion has been and should remain a private matter between a woman and her doctor.

They also say there is something profoundly illogical about a ban on one method: If abortions are legal at the 20th week of pregnancy, why forbid doctors to use a method that might be the safest?

" 'Partial-birth abortion' is a political term. It's about generating public outrage. It's not a medical term," said Dr. Deborah Oyer, a Seattle physician who does midterm abortions but not the D&X procedure. She said she resents legislators trying to regulate the practice of medicine.

"Doctors want to do what is best for the patient. This is all about keeping the abortion issue before the public," she said.

Six years ago, the Supreme Court struck down Nebraska's ban on the procedure. The 5-4 majority, which included now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, said the ban violated a woman's right to abortion because it did not include a health exception.

Dr. Leroy Carhart, an abortion doctor from Bellevue, Neb., had challenged the state law as unconstitutional. During a two-week trial, Carhart and several medical experts testified that the D&X procedure was sometimes safer because there was less risk of bleeding and infection.

"Where substantial medical authority supports the proposition that banning a particular abortion procedure could endanger women's health," the government cannot ban it by law, the court ruled in Stenberg vs. Carhart in 2000.

When Congress took up the issue, many of its members were in a defiant mood. They declared the method, which they described as "gruesome and inhumane," was "never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother."

Carhart sued to challenge the law, and lower courts blocked it from taking effect. On Wednesday, the high court will debate the case, Gonzales vs. Carhart.

The replacement of O'Connor with Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., a conservative and a Catholic, has convinced many legal experts that the court is prepared to uphold stricter regulation of abortion. In Gonzales vs. Carhart, the court must first confront the precedent it established in the Nebraska case. The justices must also decide whether to defer to Congress on its ban of the procedure, as requested by U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, or to side with medical experts who testified.

DOJ_NMG_0091471

After the bill became law, federal judges in San Francisco, New York and Omaha conducted trials on lawsuits that sought to overturn it. They heard from doctors who teach in medical schools at Cornell, Yale, Columbia, Northwestern, the University of Pittsburgh and UC San Francisco.

By the middle months of a pregnancy, doctors remove the fetus with surgical instruments, using the D&X method or the more common "dilation and evacuation," called a D&E. In that procedure, the doctor breaks apart the fetus before removing it from the uterus.

Experts told the three judges that the D&X procedure was not the only safe way to perform abortions after 20 weeks, but was safer than D&E in some cases, especially for women who have a damaged immune system or are in danger of hemorrhaging.

"Congress can 'find' that the moon is made of green cheese. That doesn't make it so," Dr. Nancy Stanwood, who teaches obstetrics at the University of Rochester, said in a recent interview. "When you're doing surgery, shorter and faster is better. If an intact extraction is possible, it's preferable."

In Carhart's case, U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf issued a 474-page opinion that extensively cited medical testimony to explain why the ban was unconstitutional.

Dr. Jill Vibhakar, who teaches obstetrics at the University of Iowa and performs abortions at an independent clinic in Iowa City, is a plaintiff with Carhart in the suit before the court. She said the justices face the same issue Wednesday that they did when they threw out the Nebraska ban.

"Nothing has changed recently in medical practice. The only thing that has changed is that a moderate female justice has been replaced by a conservative male justice," Vibhakar said.

For his part, Johnson is cautious, but hopeful.

"I have given up making predictions about what the Supreme Court will do," he said. "This law is really quite limited, but we hope it is a turning point and the beginning of a return to sanity."

All Eyes On Roberts Court As It Takes On Abortion (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The morning after the closely fought midterm elections, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear its first major abortion case in six years.

The hot-button issue has been debated for years among social and religious activists, voters and judges themselves.

At issue in Wednesday's arguments is the constitutionality of a federal law banning a specific late-term procedure its critics call "partial-birth" abortion. (Watch a new Supreme Court meet an old hot-button issue -- 2:16)

After Justice Samuel Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor this year, court watchers have been waiting for a pair of cases to signal whether the court is shifting to the right.

For a quarter of a century, O'Connor, the first woman on the high court, was a key swing vote upholding the basic right to abortion. The views of Alito, a more conservative jurist, could prove crucial in the new debate. So, too, could the views of moderate-conservative Justice Anthony Kennedy, who takes O'Connor's place as the key swing vote.

"This case will test how far the government can reasonably go in outlawing so-called 'partial birth' abortion," said Thomas Goldstein, a leading appellate attorney and Supreme Court legal analyst.

"But we'll be able to take the temperature of the justices based on their questions, the opinions they write, whether they've moved one more vote toward overruling Roe v. Wade," he added. "They may well be very close."New justices, old issue

Even with Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts joining the bench in recent months, many legal scholars say the outcome is far from clear.

Three federal appeals courts have ruled against the government, saying the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 is unconstitutional because it does not provide a "health exception" for pregnant women facing a medical emergency.

The federal law has never gone into effect, pending the outcome of nearly three years of legal appeals.

The outcome of the latest challenge could turn on the legal weight given past rulings on the health exception.

DOJ_NMG_0091472

In states where such exceptions are allowed, the lists of possible health risks include severe blood loss, damage to vital organs and loss of fertility.

Court briefs noted pregnant women having the procedure most often have their health threatened by cancer, heart disease, high blood pressure or risk of stroke. Doctors are given the discretion to recommend when the late-term procedure should be performed.

"This abortion ban would forbid doctors from providing their patients with the care they believe is safest and best, and would give Congress and states a green light to endanger women's health when they restrict women's access to abortion," said Eve Gartner, a senior staff attorney for Planned Parenthood Federation of America, who will appear before the justices. Prior cases may carry weight

Many conservatives strongly disagree. "Partial-birth abortion really isn't abortion. It's killing a baby in the process of being born," said Tom Fitton of Judicial Watch. "I think conservatives are hopeful that the court will be more willing to allow further regulation."

The issue of late-term abortions is not new to the high court, and legal precedence may be key when justices review the federal ban.

In 2000, the justices threw out Nebraska's version outlawing the procedure. Using an earlier legal standard, a divided 5-4 court concluded the state law was an "undue burden" on women because it lacked the critical health exception.

Despite that ruling, the Republican-controlled Congress -- backed by the Bush White House -- passed its own version three years later.

The Justice Department had urged the justices to accept the new case, saying the lower courts viewed the issue wrongly.

"That decision overrides Congress' carefully considered finding, following nine years of hearings and debates, that partial-birth abortion is never necessary to preserve a mother's health," said Solicitor General Paul Clement in a legal brief filed with the court. Clement will argue the government's side before the high court.Debate focuses on numbers

Abortion-rights groups object to the term "partial birth" and even "late-term abortion," saying the procedure is done before the fetus is viable and is performed only in the second trimester, sometimes as early as 12 to 15 weeks after the start of pregnancy.

The federal law bans what doctors call "intact dilation and evacuation," which Congress in its legislation termed "gruesome and inhumane."

It is a rarely used second-trimester procedure, designed to reduce complications to the mother.

More common is "dilation and evacuation," used in 95 percent of pre-viability second-trimester abortions, according to Planned Parenthood. Both are generally performed after the 21st week of pregnancy.

About 1.4 percent of all abortions are believed to be performed after the 21st week, according to the latest numbers from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Comprehensive federal health statistics are not kept on a yearly basis. Conventional medical practice puts the earliest point of viability somewhere between the 24th and 28th weeks, although there have been rare earlier cases.

Since the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion, various states have tried to place restrictions and exceptions on access to the procedure, prompting a string of high court "clarifications" on the issue over the years.Political, religious groups weigh in

The abortion question has become part of the political debate this election season.

Many religious groups have filed legal briefs backing the government and plan to gather supporters outside the Supreme Court during Wednesday's arguments.

"We're garnering names on a petition; so far we have well over a hundred thousand," said Dr. Gary Cass, director of the Center for Reclaiming America for Christ. "I think we've come a long way away from our God-given right to life that was secured for us by the Founders. And so we're going to petition the court."

On the other side, abortion rights groups protested the nominations of Alito and Roberts, fearing they would roll back women's rights.

"How does the court preserve its own institutional integrity where this is nothing other than a bold-faced attempt to get the court to change an earlier ruling when the only thing that's changed is the makeup of the court?" said Roger Evans, Planned Parenthood's senior director.

As far as the legal merits, a ruling could turn on the court's newest member.

"It may come down to Justice Alito and whether he is persuaded or not that it would be appropriate to allow the legislature to make some definitions with respect to the time or types of procedures of abortion," said Theodore Olson, former solicitor general in the Bush White House. "It's one that could be overturned."

Abortion Cases Pit Justices Vs. Congress (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, November 7, 2006

In weighing the constitutionality of a federal law, the U.S. Supreme Court sometimes gives deference to congressional findings of fact. How will it view the critical finding at the heart of its latest abortion challenge?

The justices this week will hear arguments in two cases testing the constitutionality of the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Act of 2003. Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380; Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. Partial-birth abortion is a term used for an abortion procedure, intact dilation and extraction, infrequently used in second-trimester pregnancies.

Although the high court's abortion precedents and the future of a woman's right to choose abortion will dominate discussions, the cases also are very much about separation of powers and the roles of the legislative and judicial branches in making and interpreting laws, say scholars on both sides.

"Our concern is [that] the Court's dislike of Roe v. Wade will drive the amount of deference it's willing to give to Congress," said Mark Moller, senior fellow in constitutional studies at the Cato Institute, which filed an amicus brief on the issue. "We think this is a much larger issue that goes far beyond Roe. It's about who gets to decide what the law is."

The Court's approach to deference in these cases, he added, can affect "a whole array of different rights."

In enacting the 2003 law, Congress made explicit findings in the statute that partial-birth abortion "is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother." A health exception to abortion restrictions has been central to the court's abortion jurisprudence since the landmark Roe v. Wade. The lack of such an exception was a key basis for a 5-4 majority's decision to strike down a Nebraska partial-birth abortion law, very similar to the federal law, just six years ago. Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914.

In the 2003 law, Congress criticizes Stenberg and the findings of the trial judge that gave rise to the Stenberg high court case. The federal lawmakers call for a "high degree" of deference to their own findings, a call echoed by the Bush administration and its supporters in briefs defending the federal law.

NEUTRAL FACT-FINDING?

But opponents contend that that type of deference is not due because Congress did not engage in neutral fact-finding. A fundamental right, requiring heightened court scrutiny and independent review of congressional findings, is at issue, and two district judges, in extensive trials in the two cases, made findings contrary to those of Congress.

The heart of the congressional fact-finding process -- and the reason Congress receives its greatest deference on economic or sociological facts -- is its ability to use a diverse array of means to collect and analyze information, said Charles Tiefer of the University of Baltimore School of Law, a former solicitor to the U.S. House of Representatives.

However, he added, "Where the issue is a matter of weighing social values against civil liberties, Congress may or may not have a good feel for the viewpoint of the voting population, but it doesn't have some superior method of somehow factually establishing where the balance point is."

The high court, with some ups and downs, gave considerable deference to congressional findings from the late 1930s to the mid-1990s and the advance of the Rehnquist Court's federalism movement, said Tiefer and others. In the last decade, a divided court struck down a number of applications of federal laws to the states, often because of a lack of congressional findings or despite extensive congressional findings.

Some lawmakers have voiced considerable unhappiness with the court's "lack of respect," most recently in the confirmation hearings for Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

While scholars agree that it's hard to find a consistent approach across the justices' rulings, Neal Devins of the College of William and Mary Marshall-Whythe School of Law suggests that where the court generally applies a rational-basis standard of review to a law affecting a right or classification, the court gives extreme deference to Congress.

"The whole theory of rational-basis review is essentially these are matters the legislative process will self-correct if mistakes were made," said Devins, who has studied the findings issue. "But then, there are fundamental rights cases, like cases involving abortion, where the court says the nature of the right or the classification involved is such we can't defer to the government."

The government argues that a series of First Amendment rulings by the high court "confirm that the degree of deference owed to congressional findings does not turn on the right at issue or the applicable level of scrutiny."

That position is "astounding and ridiculous," said David Faigman of the University of California Hastings College of the Law, who, with other scholars, filed an amicus brief on the findings issue on behalf of the law's opponents.

When legislation is subject to heightened scrutiny because it burdens a basic right, he said, the court has always made an independent review of factual findings. The government's position -- deference in all cases -- would permit legislative bodies to effectively overrule, through the guise of "fact-finding," the court's most critical decisions, he added, thereby undermining the court's pre-eminent role in constitutional interpretation mandated by Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137 (1803).

Ultimately, all agree, the pivotal figure is Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who dissented in Stenberg but holds a very strong view of the Supreme Court's role in the Constitution's scheme.

"He could view what Congress did as an affront to the court," said Devins. "This is where the rubber meets the road for Kennedy -- to find out which is the bigger pull -- the disapproval of Stenberg pull or the judicial supremacy pull."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Federal Observers At Polls In 22 States (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 7, 2006

Federal poll watchers will be in 22 states Tuesday, safeguarding against fraud or discrimination in election districts marked by tight races, large numbers of minority voters and faulty ballot machines.

Justice Department monitors and observers are being assigned to Cuyahoga County, Ohio, which has been dogged by problems with computerized touch-screen voting machines. They will be in Bergen County, N.J., a must-win prize for both candidates in the state's Senate race.

And they will watching more than a dozen counties nationwide where polls are on American Indian reservations and in big cities dominated by black voters.

In all, the Justice Department is sending an estimated 850 poll watchers to 69 cities and counties — what officials on Monday called an unprecedented number, and twice as many during the 2002 congressional midterm elections.

The government has dispatched poll watchers to ensure fair elections since the 1965 Voting Rights Act was enacted.

Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, who heads the Justice Department's civil rights programs, told reporters last week that the election districts were selected in part because of close races there.

They include Fort Bend and Galveston counties in Texas, where Republican write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is seeking to keep a GOP hold on the seat vacated by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Texas Democrats have accused Sekula-Gibbs of twice entering early voting locations — which is prohibited by law — to introduce herself to voters and workers.

That race also has been marked by allegations of poll workers offering unrequested assistance if voters need help with writing in a candidate or need help writing in Sekula-Gibbs.

Poll watchers will be in several major cities — including Boston, Chicago, Denver, New Orleans, San Francisco and parts of New York City — where black and other minority voters traditionally have claimed they were denied access to the ballot box.

DOJ_NMG_0091475

The federal watchdogs will be in some small cities, too, like Springfield, Mass., where the Justice Department forced officials to hire bilingual poll workers to help Spanish-speaking residents at the polls.

Eight counties in South Dakota alone — which hosts a number of American Indian reservations — will be visited by the observers and monitors. They will also be in largely rural Berks County, Pa., one of about nine counties that won't count absentees ballots on election night.

Justice Department Dispatches Election Monitors (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, Justice Producer

CNN.com, November 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Justice Department Monday announced it has dispatched an army of election observers and monitors across the country to polling places where it sees a potential for discrimination or other voting rights violations.

After weeks of considering requests for a federal presence, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and his Civil Rights Division lawyers decided to send 850 poll watchers to 69 jurisdictions in 22 states.

The federal authorities are being sent to monitor a wide variety of specific issues. In New Orleans, Louisiana, however, the observers will be there primarily to provide support to a wobbly post-Katrina election system that could be overwhelmed by residency issues. (Watch what the Justice Department will be looking for -- 1:59)

The federal force includes more than 500 trained observers from the Office of Personnel Management. They are going to places with troubled histories as certified by the Attorney General or the federal courts under provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1965. Those locations include polling places where allegations of racial, ethnic and language discrimination have surfaced in the past -- some as far back as the 1970s.

In Alabama, observers are going to Chambers, Lee, and Tuscaloosa counties. They are three of seven white majority counties where black candidates are challenging white candidates. African-American groups asked for observers to ensure their rights are protected.

In Noxubee County, Mississippi, observers will be watching polling stations where alleged discrimination against white voters by black elections officials triggered a federal investigation and lawsuit.

The Justice Department is also sending more than 350 monitors, including attorneys from its Civil Rights Division and U.S. Attorneys offices, to other hot spots where complaints have been registered or tensions have run high.

The Justice Department has declined official comment on why any of the locations were selected.

Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Wan Kim said the anticipated closeness of races would be one factor in making the final decisions on where to send observers. But in the end, few of the jurisdictions receiving federal scrutiny will be in states with heated Senate races.

Eight counties in South Dakota and five in Arizona with substantial Native American populations are on the list. In Arizona, Native Americans have warned of tensions in a race where there is debate over whether a Native American state senator endorsed a congressional candidate.

Unfettered access to the polls and the availability of minority language ballots are among the issues in Kings County, Queens County and Richmond County in New York and in five counties in New Jersey. Many of the locations have substantial Spanish-speaking communities.

An official with the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights called the Justice Department's announcement Monday "a mixed bag."

"It seems they took some of our recommendations to heart," said attorney Julie Fernandez. "Our biggest disappointment is that they are not sending anyone to North Carolina or Alaska," she said.

In Chatham County, North Carolina, there is a hotly contested referendum on county commission voting districts, which is opposed by black residents who have expressed fear of voter suppression tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0091476

Civil Rights groups charge that in Alaska, the state has not implemented the language protections required to ensure the rights of Native Americans. Some small native villages have no polling precincts and have complained about problems with absentee ballots.

However, the Justice Department did send monitors to several other locations recommended by minority groups. Observers will be in St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, where there is a racially heated runoff for a vacant sheriff's seat. In that contest, the black female interim sheriff alleges her opponent used racial slurs at a number of public campaign events.

FBI Looks Into Voter Intimidation (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch, November 7, 2006

The FBI is looking into possible voter intimidation in Virginia's hard-fought U.S. Senate contest between Republican incumbent George Allen and Democrat Jim Webb.

Just ahead of today's election, state officials alerted the U.S. Justice Department to several complaints of suspicious phone calls to voters about where they cast ballots and their preferences for the Senate.

Jean R. Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said yesterday that she was subsequently contacted by an agent in the FBI's Richmond office. The FBI is the investigative arm of the Justice Department.

Dee Rybiski, spokeswoman for the FBI here, declined comment.

Jensen said she called the Justice Department's civil rights office in Washington and the Virginia attorney general after receiving a complaint Sunday from a voter in Arlington County and one yesterday from the registrar in Accomack County.

Jensen said she later received a report from the Hampton registrar about a call to a voter there. That complaint came in response to an e-mail from Jensen to local registrars about possibly deceptive phone calls.

"Voters should not be intimidated or deceived by phone messages purporting to be from election officials," Jensen said in a written statement. "Any communication from federal, state or local election officials will always be in a written form clearly identifying the official source."

With published polls depicting the Allen-Webb race as a tossup, both sides are mobilizing lawyers and voting experts to watch for irregularities and prepare for a possible recount.

In a written statement issued by the Webb campaign, state Democratic Party counsel Jay B. Myerson suggested that Republicans are behind efforts to suppress votes for Webb.

"We've seen this tactic before, and it is about time the Republicans learned that it will not work," Myerson said.

Shawn M. Smith, executive director of the Virginia Republican Party, said the state GOP and Allen campaign are focusing on mobilizing votes for Allen.

As for voter intimidation or suppression, Smith said: "We are not aware of any such activities taking place and are skeptical of the claims being made. Nonetheless, we condemn such activities if they are being conducted by outside organizations."

J. Tucker Martin, spokesman for Attorney General Bob McDonnell, had no immediate comment.

Police Look Into Cross Burning Attempt At Grand Coteau Town Hall (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

GRAND COTEAU, La. (AP) — Someone tried to set a cross on fire in the town hall parking lot of Grand Coteau, where the black mayor is in a runoff Tuesday against a white woman.

Authorities said Monday that they had few leads, other than for a pickup truck seen leaving the parking lot without its lights on late Thursday, the night before the cross was planted.

"This is just not our community. This is not a reflection of the community as a whole. Grand Coteau is not like that," said Gail Lark, who had 44 percent of the primary vote to 23 percent for Mayor Jean Coco in the town of 1,000.

Lark said at least 200 people — black and white — had called her, upset by the incident. Mayor Jean Coco did not return a call for comment Monday.

Police Chief Jonty Coco said officers answered a report of a small fire in the parking lot about 9 p.m. Friday, and found a 5-foot tall cross placed into a wooden base. The cross itself never did catch fire, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0091477

Chief Coco said the state police and the FBI had been informed. A preliminary investigation indicated the cross had been soaked with used motor oil, he said.

No suspects were reported, but the chief said officers were looking for a gray Chevrolet pickup spotted in the lot the night before.

Suspected Pimp Charged With Sex Trafficking (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

A California man suspected of being a pimp has been charged with sex trafficking.

Twenty-seven-year-old Jeremiah Crayton of San Francisco is charged in Phoenix with two counts of Sex Trafficking of a Minor and two counts of Interstate Transportation of a Minor for Prostitution.

The U-S Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton says they plan to aggressively prosecute those who trade in the pain and misery of children.

The complaint alleges that in August of 2004, Crayton took a juvenile female, who he knew was under 18 from Phoenix to San Francisco, where he forced her to work as a prostitute.

Authorities allege Crayton met the teen at a bus stop in Phoenix.

N.Y. Plans To Make Gender Personal Choice (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

Separating anatomy from what it means to be a man or a woman, New York City is moving forward with a plan to let people alter the sex on their birth certificate even if they have not had sex-change surgery.

Under the rule being considered by the city's Board of Health, which is likely to be adopted soon, people born in the city would be able to change the documented sex on their birth certificates by providing affidavits from a doctor and a mental health professional laying out why their patients should be considered members of the opposite sex, and asserting that their proposed change would be permanent.

Applicants would have to have changed their name and shown that they had lived in their adopted gender for at least two years, but there would be no explicit medical requirements.

"Surgery versus nonsurgery can be arbitrary," said Dr. Thomas R. Frieden, the city's health commissioner. "Somebody with a beard may have had breast-implant surgery. It's the permanence of the transition that matters most."

If approved, the new rule would put New York at the forefront of efforts to redefine gender. A handful of states do not require surgery for such birth certificate changes, but in some of those cases patients are still not allowed to make the change without showing a physiological shift to the opposite gender.

In New York, the proposed change comes after four years of discussion among health officials, an eight-member panel of transgender experts and vital records offices nationwide. It is an outgrowth of the transgender community's push to recognize that some people may not have money to get a sex-change operation, while others may not feel the need to undergo the procedure and are simply defining themselves as members of the opposite sex. While it may be a radical notion elsewhere, New York City has often tolerated such blurring of the lines of gender identity.

And the proposal reflects how the transgender movement has become politically potent beyond its small numbers, having roots in the muscular politics of the city's gay rights movement.

Transgender advocates consider the New York proposal an overdue bulwark against discrimination that recognizes an emerging shift away from viewing gender as simply the sum of one's physical parts. But some psychiatrists and doctors are skeptical of the move, saying sexual self-definition should stop at rewriting medical history.

"They should not change the sex at birth, which is a factual record," said Dr. Arthur Zitrin, a Midtown psychiatrist who was on the panel of transgender experts convened by the city. "If they wanted to change the gender for all the compelling reasons that they've given, it should be done perhaps with an asterisk."

The change would lead to many intriguing questions: For example, would a man who becomes a woman be able to marry another man? (Probably.) Would an adoption agency be able to uncover the original sex of a proposed parent? (Not without a court order.) Would a woman who becomes a man be able to fight in combat, or play in the National Football League? (These areas have yet to be explored.)

The Board of Health, which weighs recommendations drafted by the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, is scheduled to vote on the proposal in December, and officials say they expect it to be adopted.

At the final public hearing for the birth certificate proposal last week, a string of advocates and transsexuals suggested that common definitions of gender, especially its reliance on medical assessments, should be abandoned. They generally praised the city for revisiting its 25-year-old policy that lets people remove the sex designation from their birth certificate if they have had sexual reassignment surgery. Then they demanded more freedom to choose.

Michael Silverman, executive director of the Transgender Legal Defense and Education Fund, said transgender people should not have to rely on affidavits from a health care system that tends to be biased against them. He said that many transgender people cannot afford sex-change surgery or therapy, and often do not consider it necessary.

Another person who testified, Mariah Lopez, 21, said she wanted a new birth certificate to prevent confusion, and to keep teachers, police officers and other authority figures from embarrassing her in public or accusing her of identity theft.

A few weeks ago, at a welfare office in Queens, Ms. Lopez said she included a note with her application for public assistance asking that she be referred to as Ms. when her turn for an interview came up. It did not work. The woman handling her case repeatedly addressed her as Mister.

"The thing is, I don't even remember what it's like to be a boy," Ms. Lopez said, adding that she received a diagnosis of transgender identity disorder at age 6. She asked to be identified as a woman for this article.

The eight experts who addressed the birth certificate issue strongly recommended that the change be made, for the practical reasons Ms. Lopez identified. For public health studies, people who have changed their gender would be counted according to their sex at birth.

But some psychiatrists said that eliminating identification difficulties for some transgender people also opened the door to unwelcome advances from imposters.

"I've already heard of a 'transgendered' man who claimed at work to be 'a woman in a man's body but a lesbian' and who had to be expelled from the ladies' restroom because he was propositioning women there," Dr. Paul McHugh, a member of the President's Council of Bioethics and chairman of the psychiatry department at Johns Hopkins University, wrote in an e-mail message on the subject. "He saw this as a great injustice in that his behavior was justified in his mind by the idea that the categories he claimed for himself were all 'official' and had legal rights attached to them."

The move to ease the requirements for altering one's gender identity comes after New York has adopted other measures aimed at blurring the lines of gender identification. For instance, a new shelter policy approved in January now allows beds to be distributed according to appearance, applying equally to postoperative transsexuals, cross-dressers and "persons perceived to be androgynous."

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority also agreed last month to let people define their own gender when deciding whether to use the men's or women's bathrooms.

Joann Prinzivalli, 52, a lawyer for the New York Transgender Rights Organization, a man who has lived as a woman since 2000, without surgery, said the changes amount to progress, a move away from American culture's misguided fixation on genitals as the basis for one's gender identity.

"It's based on an arbitrary distinction that says there are two and only two sexes," she said. "In reality the diversity of nature is such that there are more than just two, and people who seem to belong to one of the designated sexes may really belong to the other."

Uncivil Rights (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Today in Michigan, voters face a choice on Proposal 2, which would add the following language to the state constitution: "The state shall not discriminate against, or grant preferential treatment to any individual or group on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public education or public contracting."

DOJ_NMG_0091479

One might think a law banning discrimination would be a triumph for civil rights. Instead, opponents have spent $3 million trying to defeat it, using some of the most low-down arguments of this low-down election year. Consider this ad running on Detroit radio:

"If you could have prevented 9/11 from ever happening . . . would you have? If you could have prevented Katrina from ever happening . . . what would you have done? On Nov. 7th there's a national disaster headed for Michigan . . . the elimination of affirmative action. And on Nov. 7th there's only one way to stop this disaster . . . by voting no on Proposal 2."

We're not against "negative" advertising, but to equate the abolition of racial and gender preferences to the damage done by terrorists and a hurricane seems a tad hyperbolic, not to mention dishonest.

Women's groups are also in on the distortion. They're using statewide ads to claim that ending affirmative action would lead to an end to women's health clinics, programs to tutor girls in math and science, and funding for breast cancer treatment. There's one problem with these scare tactics: The initiative doesn't apply to health clinics or tutoring programs. Two states -- California and Washington -- have passed nearly identical initiatives, and there has been no negative effect on women's opportunities.

The opponents of Proposal 2 have also rolled out Tommy Amaker and Tom Izzo, the men's basketball coaches at Michigan and Michigan State University, respectively. They declared at a press conference that the initiative would hurt the university system by reducing "diversity." Once upon a time, the goal of civil rights legislation was equal opportunity. But with that goal largely achieved, the proponents of racial preferences have now moved the goalposts to "diversity" for its own sake. This sets race above other qualities, which erodes public confidence in individual merit as opposed to group rights.

In any case, the proponents of the Civil Rights Initiative sent the two coaches a question: "Do you use quotas or preferences when you choose the players on your basketball teams?"

In 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Michigan universities may not use race as a primary factor in admissions but could use it as one of several. But a new study from the Center for Equal Opportunity shows that race is an even larger factor now than before at the University of Michigan. In 2005, an Asian or white student with a 1240 SAT and 3.2 grade point average had only a 1 in 10 chance gaining admission, while a black student with the same record had a 9 in 10 chance.

Another reason opponents are spending so much money to defeat this initiative is that it would ban the "setting aside" of minority business contracts -- a practice that has made a lot of people very rich in Michigan. Left unsaid is that those set-asides can cost Michigan taxpayers millions of dollars in inflated contracting costs.

There's nothing wrong with schools or businesses considering a candidate's background when deciding whether to admit or hire. But the application of racial and gender quotas has become a corrupting and divisive process that violates our Constitutional heritage of equal rights and fairness. Polls in Michigan had the Civil Rights Initiative narrowly ahead in the final days, notwithstanding the 3-to-1 funding advantage of the opponents. If it prevails despite the distortions used by opponents, it will be a tribute to the faith among Michigan voters in equal opportunity.

ANTITRUST:

Merrill Gets Justice Department Query On Buyouts, Person Says (BLOOM)

By Brett Cole

Bloomberg, November 7, 2006

Nov. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Merrill Lynch & Co., the world's third-largest securities firm, received a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an antitrust inquiry of the leveraged-buyout industry, a person familiar with the probe said.

Justice officials have already sent letters seeking information to Carlyle Group, Clayton, Dubilier & Rice Inc., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the inquiry isn't public. The Merrill letter was reported earlier today by the Wall Street Journal.

``The DOJ is probably focusing on three to four deals initially, and if it finds any problems then it may widen the probe to include other firms and deals," Sean Boland, co-chair of the antitrust practice at Washington-based law firm Howrey LLP, said today in a telephone interview. Boland said the probe may last more than a year.

LBO firms have teamed up on $201 billion of acquisitions this year, compared with $31 billion in all of 2001, according to data compiled by London-based Private Equity Intelligence Ltd. In July, the industry's biggest deal was announced, the $33 billion takeover of hospital chain HCA Inc. by KKR, Bain Capital LLC, Merrill Lynch's private-equity unit and HCA co-founder Thomas F. Frist Jr.

Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill acquired Hertz Global Holdings Inc. last year from Ford Motor Co. for $15 billion. The Park Ridge, New Jersey-based car-rental company said last month it planned to sell as much as $1.83 billion of shares in an initial public offering.

Offer Prices

Mark Herr, a spokesman for New York-based Merrill, declined to comment. Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, didn't return a call seeking comment. Spokesmen for the buyout firms declined to comment.

Buyout firms form partnerships to spread risk and increase the size of purchases they can make. The Justice Department may be concerned that cooperation among bidders is unfairly pushing down prices, said Robert Burka, an antitrust lawyer at Foley & Lardner in Washington and a former official the Federal Trade Commission.

Report: Regulators Eye Private Equity (AP-YBIZ)

AP, November 7, 2006

Report: Regulators Examining Whether Anticompetitive Behavior Occurs at Private Equity Firms

NEW YORK (AP) -- Regulators are looking into whether private equity firms, which are increasingly the driving force behind some of Wall Street's biggest buyout deals, have engaged in anticompetitive behavior.

The Wall Street Journal reported Monday that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking documents from Merrill Lynch & Co.'s private equity business as part of a larger informal probe. The newspaper reported that at least four other private equity companies have received letters in recent weeks, including Carlyle Group; Clayton, Dubilier & Rice; Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.; and Silver Lake Partners.

"We never comment on government investigations except to say that we cooperate with them," Merrill Lynch spokeswoman Jessica Oppenheim told The Associated Press Monday.

Carlyle Group, Clayton Dubilier, Kohlberg Kravis and Silver Lake also would not comment. A Justice Department official also declined to comment.

The U.K.'s Financial Services Authority said in a statement Monday it is weighing whether it provides adequate oversight of the private equity market.

Merrill's private equity business, Merrill Lynch Global Private Equity, has been on a tear, with profits of more than $300 million last quarter. The operation was involved in the $21.3 billion leveraged buyout agreement of hospital chain HCA Inc. Kohlberg Kravis and Bain Capital LLC also took part in that deal.

The news comes as investors are cheering the premiums that private equity deals can bring; the private equity deals can also generate enormous fees on Wall Street. Monday brought a flurry of private equity news, with offers being made for Four Seasons Hotels Inc. and OSI Restaurant Partners Inc., which is the parent of such chains as Outback Steakhouse.

The Journal reported that the addition of Merrill to the inquiry could mean investigators could be eyeing the auction of Hertz Global Holdings Inc., which was carved out of Ford Motor Co. in December. Carlyle, Clayton Dubilier and Merrill Lynch beat out a rival consortium of Bain Capital LLC, Blackstone Group LP, Texas Pacific Group and Thomas H. Lee Partners LP in that deal, the newspaper reported.

An initial public offering for Hertz is slated for next week.

Many private equity firms see opportunity in taking a company private, making changes and then in some cases taking a company public to reap the potential windfall. Some investors are also looking to private equity deals as costs of doing business as a public company have increased. Regulatory requirements have been tightened, increasing some overhead costs at companies, following scandals seen in recent years such as the one that brought down Enron Corp.

Feds Request Info In Smithfield Deal (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

Federal Regulators Want More Information From Smithfield and Premium Standard on Acquisition

SMITHFIELD, Va. (AP) -- Smithfield Foods Inc. and Premium Standard Farms Inc., the nation's two largest hog producers, said Monday they received requests for additional information from federal regulators related to Smithfield's pending acquisition of Premium Standard.

The request by the Department of Justice's antitrust division extends the waiting period imposed by federal law until 30 days after the two companies have substantially complied with the request.

Under terms of the deal announced in September, Smithfield Foods will buy Premium Standard for about $674 million in cash and stock. Smithfield will also assume about $117 million of Premium Standard's debt.

Both companies said they intend to respond expeditiously to the request and to work toward a prompt closing, which they hope to achieve in the first quarter of 2007.

Smithfield shares rose 40 cents to close at $26.10 on the New York Stock Exchange. Premium Standard shares picked up 25 cents to end at $18.68 on the Nasdaq.

Ahold Says It Will Sell U.S. Foodservice (AP)

By Toby Sterling, Associated Press

AP, November 7, 2006

Analysts put value at $5 billion

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands – Supermarket chain operator Royal Ahold NV announced plans Monday to sell its U.S. Foodservice unit, which distributes bulk food to cafeterias, as part of a major strategic shift back to its roots in retailing.

As part of the plan, Ahold also said it would sell its Tops stores in New York and Pennsylvania, divest its retail operations in Poland and Slovakia, and sell its 49 percent stake in Portugal's Jeronimo Martins Retail.

“The basic decision we've taken is to commit to retail, to go back to where we come from,” Chief Executive Anders Moberg told reporters. “We will keep retail operations in markets in the United States and in Europe only where we can secure and maintain a No. 1 or No. 2 position.”

Analysts said the moves were the logical next step for Ahold, which has gradually returned to firm financial footing by refinancing and selling assets after an accounting scandal centered around U.S. Foodservice pushed it to the edge of bankruptcy in 2003.

“It all makes perfect sense,” said analyst Bryan Roberts of Planet Retail.

Ahold said last week that third-quarter sales at its Columbia, Md.-based U.S. Foodservice operation, which distributes food to cafeterias in hospitals, schools and prisons, increased by 5 percent to $4.5 billion. Analysts put its value at around $5 billion.

Ahold, one of the largest food retailers in the United States and Europe, promised to use the proceeds from the sale of Foodservice and the grocery chains to return at least 2 billion euros ($2.5 billion) to shareholders and reduce net debt by the same amount.

The company also said it would cut annual operating costs by 500 million euros ($638 million) by the end of 2009.

Ahold operates the Stop & Shop and Giant chains in the United States and several large European chains, including its highly profitable flagship supermarket, Albert Heijn, which is dominant in the Netherlands.

Ahold will keep its stores in the Czech Republic, where it holds a leadership position, and the Swedish-based ICA supermarkets, in which it holds a 60 percent stake.

When the smoke clears, Ahold will have around 60 billion euros ($76.3 billion) in consolidated annual sales, Moberg said.

Ahold shares rose 0.1 percent to 8.36 euros ($10.63) in Amsterdam trading. But with the stock still lingering below its level before the scandal struck, Ahold has been under pressure to make a major change.

In August, investment funds Paulson & Co. Inc. and Centaurus Capital Ltd., which hold 6.4 percent of Ahold's shares, said the company should sell Foodservice and split the U.S. and European retail operations, a proposal some analysts agreed with and which caused a spike in share prices.

DOJ_NMG_0091482

The Financial Times reported last week Ahold is in talks to sell Foodservice to private-equity firm Clayton Dubilier & Rice Inc., and Dutch media have reported Ahold is in merger talks with Delhaize Group of Belgium. Clayton Dubilier & Rice could not immediately be reached for comment Monday.

Moberg declined to confirm either idea, but noted that "since 2003 there's been speculation we would sell Foodservice. We haven't had discussions with potential buyers ... but there's a lot of interest out there and that's good for getting a good price."

Roberts said Delhaize would be a good match for Ahold.

Delhaize is smaller, with $4.4 billion in sales in the United States from chains including Food Lion, Harvey's, Sweetbay and Hannaford in the second quarter of 2006. Ahold had around $5.3 billion in sales from its U.S chains in the same period.

In Belgium, Delhaize had second-quarter sales of around 1.1 billion euros ($1.4 billion), compared to Albert Heijn's 1.7 billion euros ($2.2 billion) in the Netherlands.

"They obviously have great overlap in the Benelux countries, though there could be some antitrust concerns," Roberts said. "Ahold could benefit from some of Delhaize's best practices in the States, where its stores are outstanding in both price and quality."

Ahold, which will report third quarter earnings Dec. 1, warned last week that margins are slipping at its U.S. stores under heavy competition. Its Albert Heijn stores' sales were up 10 percent in the third quarter.

After the scandal, senior former executives resigned and were later convicted of fraud but let off with fines. Several high-ranking managers at Foodservice are awaiting trial.

Ahold settled with regulators for a small fine and last year announced a $1.1 billion settlement with shareholders, apparently putting the last remaining issue from the scandal behind it.

Roberts said the company's current management deserved credit for not selling Foodservice under financial distress. He predicted the company would now "get a decent price for Foodservice, given that private equity firms have already been sniffing around it."

Morgan Stanley and Visa Settle Dispute Over Access to European Network

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Morgan Stanley and Visa International have agreed to settle a long-running dispute over business in Europe, the two companies said in a statement Monday.

However, the European Commission cautioned that the settlement wouldn't end its investigation into Visa's commercial practices.

Visa had refused to let Morgan Stanley join its card network in Europe because Morgan Stanley runs a competing card service in the United States, Discover. Morgan Stanley complained to the European Union in 2000.

The two companies said they "reached an amicable settlement, without any admission of liability." Morgan Stanley has become a member of Visa in Europe. In return, it withdrew its complaint to European regulators and ended court proceedings in England.

After Morgan Stanley complained, European antitrust regulators formally charged Visa with blocking competitors from its network in August, 2004. It sent Visa a formal "statement of objections," saying Visa's rule barring competitors from using its network squelches competition in a growing segment of the credit-card industry and reduces choice for merchants. This case will continue despite Monday's news.

Jonathan Todd, the EU antitrust spokesman, said the investigation is ongoing.

In a previous case, settled in 2002, Visa agreed to reduce by about 20 percent a fee that is borne by retailers and their banks.

The credit-card cases are part of a renewed drive by regulators to open up competition in Europe's financial-services sector.

Shares of Morgan Stanley rose $1.64, or 2.2 percent, to $75.92 on the New York Stock Exchange in afternoon trading Monday on the New York Stock Exchange. The financial services company is based in New York.

EU To Rule By Dec. 8 On Universal Music Group's Purchase Of BMG Music Publishing (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium — EU regulators on Monday set a Dec. 8 deadline to rule on Universal Music Group's plans to buy BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion.

BMG — owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG — has the rights to more than a million songs by recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Vivendi SA's Universal is the world's largest music company.

Its purchase of BMG Music Publishing must be cleared by both EU and U.S. regulators. It is likely to face careful scrutiny in Europe after an EU court in July overturned the European Commission's go-ahead from a merger between the music units of Sony and Bertelsmann AG.

That deal — reducing the number of major record companies from five to four — must be re-examined and analysts warned it could raise the stakes for similar mergers. The Commission has already said it had to watch the music sector closely to check that antitrust rules are not being broken.

EMI suspended $4.6 billion takeover talks with U.S. rival Warner Music Group after the court ruling since it cast doubt on whether an EMI-Warner deal would receive regulatory approval.

The Court of First Instance — the EU's second-highest court — said regulators had not properly shown that there was a monopoly in the recording industry before the deal or that there would not be one afterward.

It also said the Commission did not explain why it dropped earlier charges that the deal could exacerbate "tacit collusion" in the industry, leading to higher CD prices and less choice for consumers in a market where there is already too little competition.

NTP Files Patent Suit Against Palm (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

NTP Inc., which successfully sued the maker of BlackBerry devices for infringement of wireless email patents, said it is suing Palm Inc., maker of the Treo smartphone.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, alleges that Palm's products and services have improperly used NTP's wireless email technology. The suit asks the court to bar Palm from "continuing to infringe on NTP's patents" and seeks monetary damages for the alleged past infringements.

In March, BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. agreed to pay NTP $612.5 million to settle a four-year patent dispute. Though it never conceded wrongdoing, RIM acknowledged that customers had delayed placing new orders due to the threat of a court-ordered shutdown of the BlackBerry system in the U.S.

The Palm complaint also centers on products and services that integrate email systems with wireless communications, including the Treo, Palm VII, Palm i700 and Tungsten products. At issue are seven patents, dating from 1995 to 2001, according to the lawsuit. Five of the patents were part of NTP's lawsuit against RIM.

"We have attempted -- on numerous occasions -- to resolve this issue with Palm without resorting to litigation that is both time-consuming and costly," said Donald Stout, NTP's co-founder, in a statement. "Despite our efforts, Palm has chosen to continue to unlawfully infringe on our patents."

A spokesman for Palm couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Richmond, Va.-based NTP, a closely held patent company, has licensed its technology to Nokia Corp., Good Technology Inc. and Visto Corp.

Swift Transportation Gets $2.2 Billion Bid From Its Ex-CEO By ANN KEETON (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

Jerry Moyes, the former top executive and largest shareholder of Swift Transportation Co., has offered to buy the Phoenix trucking company for $2.2 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0091484

Swift, a long-haul trucking carrier, said that Mr. Moyes offered $29 a share, a 21% premium to Friday's trading price of $24.05. The company said its board will review the offer.

Swift shares rose $5.79, or 24%, to $29.84 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, an indication that some investors anticipate a higher offer. In a letter to the company, Mr. Moyes said he would consider increasing the offer if an examination of Swift's books and records showed that the shares are worth more than $29.

In the third quarter, trucking companies reported that they hadn't seen the usual seasonal upturn in business, with retailers preparing for the holiday season. A slowing economy would hurt the trucking business.

For 2005, Swift reported net income of $101.1 million, or $1.37 a share, on revenue of $3.2 billion.

Mr. Moyes, 62 years old, started out in the trucking business with a single truck and later helped to found Swift in 1966. In 1984, he became chairman, president and chief executive of the company. He retired from those positions in 2005.

McKesson To Purchase Per-Se For $1.1 Billion, Adding Clients By NICOLE URBANOWICZ (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 7, 2006

McKesson Corp. agreed to buy Per-Se Technologies Inc., which sells administrative services to doctors and hospitals, for about $1.1 billion, expanding the drug-distribution giant's customer base and transaction-processing capabilities.

McKesson also will assume Per-Se's debt outstanding under the deal. As of Sept. 30, Per-Se had long-term debt of $510.6 million.

The buyer will pay $28 in cash for each Per-Se share outstanding, a 14.5% premium to the Alpharetta, Ga., company's Friday closing share price. Per-Se shares rose $3.09, or 13%, to $27.54 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. McKesson rose $1.17, or 2.4%, to 49.69 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

McKesson Chief Executive John Hammergren said the acquisition will strengthen customer relationships in existing McKesson businesses while adding a pharmacy transaction business to the San Francisco company's portfolio.

Hedge fund ValueAct Capital, which controls about 15.5% of Per-Se's voting common stock, and certain of its affiliates agreed to vote in favor of the transaction. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter.

After the deal, the scale of McKesson's transaction-processing services and associated offerings is expected to more than double to about 560 million transactions annually, representing an estimated $300 billion in billed charges.

McKesson distributes medicines to more than 25,000 U.S. health-care locations such as pharmacies, including those at Wal-Mart Stores Inc., plus hospitals, nursing homes and doctors' offices.

Per-Se's customers include about 100,000 physicians in small practices, 17,000 hospital-affiliated physicians, 3,000 hospitals and 50,000 retail pharmacies.

McKesson expects pretax synergies from the deal of $50 million to $75 million by the third year.

Last week, drugstore company CVS Corp. agreed to acquire McKesson's biggest customer, Caremark Rx Inc., in a $21 billion deal to create an even bigger customer that could negotiate lower prices. A combined CVS-Caremark might try to shift more business to Cardinal Health Inc. and away from McKesson, according to analysts.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

One Chemical At A Time (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

An industry association, a labor union and a public health group recently settled a court case over a new standard for worker exposure to a cancer-causing chemical, hexavalent chromium. It was a rare example of agreement in worker-safety regulation.

Under the Oct. 25 settlement, the Surface Finishing Industry Council , whose members use the chemical to coat metals, agreed to move faster to improve ventilation and make other engineering changes to reduce workers' exposure levels. In return, the United Steelworkers union and an ally agreed that workers would have to wear a respirator only for certain jobs, unless they requested one.

"It's a good trade-off," said Scott Nelson , a lawyer with Public Citizen Litigation Group , which worked with the union in getting the Occupational Safety and Health Administration to revise the standard.

"How often, when you have zealously guarded positions, do you achieve common ground?" agreed Baruch Fellner , an attorney for the industry group.

OSHA said last week that it was amending the final rule to incorporate the settlement, a promising development.

Unfortunately, it's not a harbinger this election day of a real breakthrough in one of Washington's most contentious issues.

The problem is that the hex chromium rule covers hundreds of thousands of other workers not part of the settlement, and several other court challenges remain. They involve Nelson's clients and other unions, as well as the specialty steel and electric utility industries and the National Association of Manufacturers .

More significantly, there is no sign that the single agreement will cure the paralysis that for years has crippled the process for setting "permissible exposure limits" for chemicals in the workplace.

Exposure limits for some 400 chemicals were set when OSHA was set up in 1971. Only about 20 have been reviewed and revised since, according to the agency. In some cases, including hexavalent chromium, the science underlying the rule hasn't been updated since the 1920s.

The American Industrial Hygiene Association , in a 2002 study of the problem, called it "a disservice to worker health that the majority of OSHA permissible exposure limits are based on recommendations that were made almost 30 years ago."

This means hundreds of companies operating in the shipyard, construction and chemical industries have only to adhere to woefully outdated standards for protecting workers from harmful chemical exposure.

In 1988, OSHA proposed a wholesale upgrade of 212 of the existing standards, as well as an additional 164 exposure limits for substances that never had been regulated. Industry groups sued, claiming the proposals were too stringent; the AFL-CIO sued, saying some weren't strong enough and monitoring plans were weak.

In 1992, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta ruled that while the agency could propose generic rules, it had to justify the limit chosen for each chemical.

"The lesson learned was that it was difficult to update 400 permissible exposure limits under the OSHA rulemaking process," said Randel Johnson , an official at the Labor Department at that time. He now is vice president of labor, immigration and employee benefits at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce .

There was another unsuccessful attempt in 1996, when OSHA said it intended to update the exposure limits for about 20 substances. That idea never reached the proposal stage.

Canada, European countries and several states have stricter exposure limits than OSHA's for some chemicals. No one involved in the federal rulemaking process likes the inertia.

Almost everyone blames the legal requirements the agency has to meet, including exhaustive administrative reviews, such as considering a rule's possible effect on small business. Time-consuming peer reviews of the science backing the rule add to the delays.

"We can't simply say a substance is dangerous. We have to do quantitative analysis and determine there is a significant risk. It's not a simple undertaking," said Joseph Woodward , an associate solicitor for OSHA at the Labor Department.

Peter Lurie , deputy director of Public Citizen's Health Research Group, doesn't buy the explanation. He blames Democrats and Republicans alike for ignoring the issue, and the agency for dragging its feet.

"The underlying problem is both parties are on the take from major industry and, as a consequence, their enthusiasm for regulating those industries is practically nil," Lurie said. Some of the few standards that have been updated emerged only after groups like his sued the agency to force action.

OSHA has exposure standards for two substances -- crystalline silica and beryllium -- on its regulatory to-do list. They have been listed there for years, and some agency work has been completed, but no proposals made.

Public Citizen petitioned the agency for an emergency standard for beryllium in 1999 and 2001. OSHA has said since 1996 that it was a priority to regulate silica.

DOJ_NMG_0091486

Unions, employer groups, and safety and health professionals formed a committee in 2002 to examine whether the timeliness of exposure standards could be improved by action in Congress.

"We made some progress, but after a while we ran out of gas, I guess," said Frank White , senior vice president of ORC Worldwide , a management consulting firm in Washington, and a participant in the talks. The group sensed a lack of interest on the part of OSHA and Congress.

Perhaps the recent accommodation between one industry group and union on the hex chromium rule points the way to more bite-size progress on chemical-exposure standards, White suggested. Maybe OSHA could try proposing 20 at a time.

In Maine, A Public Park In Search Of Public Support (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, November 7, 2006

MILLINOCKET, Me., Nov. 1 — Roxanne Quimby could be forgiven if she thought she was emulating the likes of Henry David Thoreau, Percival P. Baxter, John D. Rockefeller Jr. and other lovers of Maine's landscape when she started to buy bits of the vast northern woodlands near here to be the core of a new national park.

Who knew that when she began using some of the fortune she had earned from her organic personal-care business, Burt's Bees, to buy up woods to preserve, she would be greeted with "Ban Roxanne" T-shirts? Or, that her efforts at preservation — banning snowmobiling, hunting and all-terrain vehicles on 50,000 of her acres — would be taken as an attack on the old-time values of the timberland?

Who knew that even some conservation-minded groups would be reluctant to support the decade-old vision of a national park that had inspired Ms. Quimby?

Still, one might have guessed, looking at the streets of this town of 4,700 people, where hunter's blaze orange is the fall fashion statement of choice during this month's deer hunting season.

Millinocket residents fear that turning timberland into parkland will further cut timber jobs, strip them of their accustomed hunting grounds and prevent the development of resorts and snowmobile parks they see as one way out of the downward economic spiral.

"What Roxanne and the others want to do, they want to create a park up here the size of Connecticut and take it out of the heartland of the Maine forest," Eugene Conlogue, the town's manager, said in an interview. "That's a nonstarter for us."

Other environmental groups, while sympathetic to the idea of a national park, see it as an unwelcome distraction from their fight to block a proposed 420,000-acre resort development that the Plum Creek Timber Company has unveiled for Moosehead Lake, just west of here.

As Brownie Carson, executive director of the Natural Resources Council of Maine, said, "You can't pour energy into protection of a single area, even though it's large and hugely important, without risking losses, big losses, in other really important areas of Maine's North Woods forest."

Thirty years ago, Ms. Quimby was living a subsistence counterculture life in the North Woods. After building her financial empire, she was taken with an idea conceived a decade ago by Jym St. Pierre and other local conservationists for a Maine Woods National Park that would envelop Baxter State Park, in the conservation equivalent of Russian nesting dolls. The new park would be the size of Yellowstone and Yosemite combined.

"I find it pretty ironic, or humorous, that people make a national park out to be such a radical idea," said Ken Spalding, the project coordinator for the moving force behind the park, Restore, a group with offices in Hallowell and in Concord, Mass. "American people love their national parks."

Ms. Quimby, 56, hopes Mr. Spalding and Restore's director, Mr. St. Pierre, are right. The idea of a park, she said, "floats my boat."

She prefers that her 75,000 acres become a base on which Restore's 3.2-million acre park could be built.

But in the past few weeks, she has started to explore conservation alternatives and has met with her opponents to see if her goals to bring the northlands back to their pre-logging state can be reconciled with their goals of finding economic value and personal freedom in the same woods.

DOJ_NMG_0091487

In the last six years, more than six million acres of timber company land have changed hands. Timber companies have come and gone like truckers at a roadside stop.

"What has happened over the years," Ms. Quimby said, "is that there were very few landowners and they had a very permissive policy toward land use as long as you stayed out of the way of the logging operation. So people had this unrestricted access."

"So now that the ownership is changing," she said, "it's becoming quite clear that this is private property. And as a private property owner I don't have to let anybody on it."

That, she added, "is becoming the alternative to public land."

When Ms. Quimby banned snowmobiling and hunting and all-terrain vehicles from the first two tracts she bought, which totaled more than 50,000 acres, the "ban Roxanne" cries were heard everywhere here. When she bought her third tract, 23,000 acres, earlier this fall, adjacent to the critical parcel in a state-brokered deal to expand Baxter park, opponents erupted again.

This time, Ms. Quimby sat down and met with them and made a deal. For at least a year, snowmobiles and hunters could continue to use the new purchase, called Sandy Stream. In the meantime, the competing visions of the North Woods' future could be debated with less pressure.

"Mainers are more individualistic." she said. "They're used to having more space about them. They are very self-sufficient, including in the way they think about things."

It is not clear whether Ms. Quimby's efforts at appeasement will beget a more conciliatory attitude to other conservation deals, particularly the not-yet-completed purchase of land around Katahdin Lake. This is a place whose haunting views of Maine's largest mountain, have been a magnet for American landscape painters, from Frederic Church on.

Patrick McGowan, the commissioner of Maine's Department of Conservation, has spent months trying to put all the pieces in place to add 6,000 acres to the eastern side of the 204,800-acre Baxter State Park, ensuring that Katahdin Lake, the artists' beaches and the surrounding woodlands would be preserved. The deal was buffeted on its way through the Maine Legislature, but survived, with two provisos.

Mr. McGowan, aided by the nonprofit conservation group, The Trust for Public Lands, had to get $14 million in private donations to complete the purchase. Facing a Dec. 15 deadline, he is more than $3 million shy of the goal. The Trust is organizing fund-raising events, and artists like Evelyn Dunphy are donating canvases of Katahdin.

The second proviso was that one-third of the new parkland— though not the area around lake — had to be open to "traditional" uses like hunting and snowmobiling.

That deal was barely done when Ms. Quimby announced the purchase of her latest, 23,000 acre, tract from a local logging operator.

Hunters saw the Quimby announcement as a double blow. They were losing access to 23,000 acres, and those acres were the main way in to the 2,000 acres of proposed parkland set aside for them.

"Everybody perceived this as a threat," said Bob Cram, a local hunter and a director of the statewide hunters' group, the Sportsmen's Alliance of Maine. "I did, too."

How Ms. Quimby's talks with the hunters' groups will change the landscape is unknown. Acadia and Baxter parks faced opposition before their creation. It took decades to assemble the land and gain legislative approval. Mr. Spalding, of Restore, said: "The opposition is very much a minority. It is clear that the Maine public, statewide, overwhelmingly supports the acquisition of more public land for conservation."

For the moment, the conservation will likely continue to be ad hoc, with individuals like Ms. Quimby, groups like the Appalachian Mountain Trail Club and state-private partnerships raising the money for individual tracts. These might be combined in a national park, a national forest or a state preserve. They might also remain private, part of a checkerboard of conservation areas and resort development.

A national park, Ms. Quimby said, is not the only solution. "I think a national forest is a possibility, like the White Mountain National Forest," she said. "It has much broader usage."

"Everyone has to give up something in a compromise," she said. "But you get your most important things if it's a good compromise."

Female Leader Would Be First For Navajos (WP)

By Felicia Fonseca

The Washington Post, November 7, 2006

WINDOW ROCK, Ariz., Nov. 6 -- One candidate in Tuesday's Navajo Nation presidential election promises accountability and staunch protection of tribal land. The other vows to build on the reservation's economic progress in the past four years.

But in the race between incumbent Joe Shirley Jr. and challenger Lynda Lovejoy, the overriding issue is sex.

A win would make Lovejoy the first female leader on the largest Indian reservation in the United States, which extends into New Mexico, Arizona and Utah.

"She is a woman, and that is going to be an issue no matter what her stance on policy," said Dale Mason, an associate professor of political science at the University of New Mexico at Gallup. "She represents something entirely new."

Lovejoy, a former New Mexico state lawmaker and current member of the Public Regulation Commission, hopes to unseat Shirley, 58, a former tribal council delegate who has been leading the tribe for four years.

"I can't control people making their decision to vote for me because I'm a woman," she said. "I certainly appreciate and welcome that. Any vote is important to winning this ticket on November 7."

Shirley, who has focused on economic development in his campaign for reelection, acknowledges some people will vote based on sex, but he says he is hopeful that most won't.

Some traditional Navajos believe that women and men have distinct roles in society -- women as caretakers of the home and of children, and men as providers and leaders, said Tommy Begay, a Navajo and University of Arizona doctoral student who is studying the evolution of cultures.

Although Navajo is a matriarchal society, traditional Navajos will probably stick to the belief that only men should serve as president, Begay said.

"When you live your life in a very traditional way, the beliefs really dictate your action," Begay said. "They become sort of the boundaries of existence."

Less traditional Navajos either have not been taught those beliefs, dismiss them, or have a hard time maintaining them because of the dominant society's influence, Begay said.

Lovejoy has based her campaign on ensuring an open and accountable government, creating jobs, protecting land and natural resources, and cutting unnecessary spending.

Shirley often participates in sweat lodges, where he says he learns songs about the tribe's religion and culture and also draws inspiration from the elders as they talk about how to regain the tribe's economic independence.

Many Navajos are poor, and unemployment hovers around 50 percent.

Shirley has been pushing projects that include the coal-fired Desert Rock Power Plant and the construction of six casinos. The first could be built next year, he said.

The president said those projects would bring in thousands of jobs and provide tribal members with basic necessities -- a home, transportation and income.

Detroit FBI Chief Earns A Promotion (DEN)

Detroit News, November 7, 2006

Special agent will help lead criminal division, which handles everything but terror-related cases.

WASHINGTON -- The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a top job overseeing criminal investigations nationwide.

Michigan native Daniel D. Roberts, who has led the Detroit field office of the FBI since July 2004, will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington. The criminal division oversees all investigations except terror-related cases, which are handled out of a separate division.

DOJ_NMG_0091489

The criminal division handles public corruption; organized crime; financial crime, including corporate fraud and health care fraud; violent crime; gangs; and civil rights violations. It also is involved in many of the most high-profile investigations -- like the numerous investigations into congressional corruption.

In an interview Monday, Roberts said he would start his new job -- his fourth in Washington -- by Jan. 1.

"I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge," Roberts said, calling the job "a natural fit."

He said he wasn't looking forward to uprooting his family again, finding a buyer for his Oakland County home or facing the high cost of living in Washington.

Last month, FBI director Robert Mueller asked Roberts to take the new job; his replacement will come from outside Detroit, as is standard policy.

The FBI is in the process of filling many jobs at FBI headquarters and reshuffling the top agents at the nation's 56 field offices. The top agents in Kansas, Cleveland, Boston, Knoxville and Oklahoma City have been moved in recent months.

Roberts said he was most proud of his office's handling of many special events without incident -- from last month's World Series to Super Bowl XL in February -- not to mention the NBA Finals, 2004 Ryder Cup and 2005 Major League Baseball All Star Game.

"These are huge challenges when you're talking about getting multiple agencies to the table and coordinating a lot of resources," Roberts said, praising the cooperation between the dozens of agencies involved.

Roberts said he was proud that there haven't been any terror incidents in Detroit under his watch.

Roberts, 46, who grew up in Franklin and is a former Franklin and Oak Park police officer, graduated from Groves High School in Birmingham.Roberts' 19-year FBI career has had many highlights. In 2002, he was in the spotlight as acting special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City bureau during the first few weeks of the Elizabeth Smart disappearance and he also oversaw the FBI's role in security at the 2002 Salt Lake Olympics.

Roberts' most visible assignment in Detroit came when the FBI began digging for the remains of former Teamsters President James. R. Hoffa in May at a Milford horse farm -- a search that prompted intense international coverage. A day after U.S. Rep. Joe Knollenberg, R-Bloomfield Township, was quoted questioning the cost of the search, the two-week dig was called off. Roberts defended the cost. "Dan's a consummate professional," U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy III in Detroit said. "He's an excellent law enforcement leader with great judgment and it's been a real honor to work with him."

Roberts made it a priority to recruit FBI agents to the Detroit office, making the pitch that the area gets an unfair rap, and also got funding to boost the size of the office, which is the 11th largest U.S. FBI field office.

Detroit FBI Chief Promoted To Post In Washington (AP)

AP, November 7, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — The special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI has been promoted to a job overseeing nationwide criminal investigations in Washington.

Detroit native Daniel D. Roberts, 46, will become the deputy assistant director of the FBI's criminal division Jan. 1. He has led the Detroit field office since July 2004.

Roberts joined the FBI in 1987 and was assigned first to Chicago, as a SWAT team member and later as a supervisory agent directing the city's joint task force on gangs. Following a stint as chief of the violent crimes/fugitive unit at FBI headquarters, he served as an assistant special agent in charge in Salt Lake City, where he helped oversee security during the 2002 Winter Olympics.

He got his start as a police officer in suburban Franklin and also worked in the Oak Park Police Department in the 1980s.

"I would have loved to stay here, but I am looking forward to the new challenge," Roberts told The Detroit News for a story Tuesday.

Roberts presided over the search earlier this year at an Oakland County farm for the remains of former Teamsters President Jimmy Hoffa. He said he's most proud of his office's handling of several high-profile, incident-free events in Detroit such as last month's World Series and Super Bowl XL in February.

His replacement will come from outside Detroit.

Five Indicted On Cocaine Charges (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post (FL), November 7, 2006

FORT PIERCE — A federal grand jury has formally charged five people with conspiracy to distribute crack cocaine in a drug case spawned by an investigation into the killing of a family found shot to death last month on the side of Florida's Turnpike.

Investigators say four of the West Palm Beach-area residents indicted in the federal drug case are connected to the Oct. 13 slaying of the Escobedo family on the side of the highway in Port St. Lucie - though no one has been charged in the homicides. The federal indictment was issued Friday by a grand jury in West Palm Beach and made public during a court hearing Monday morning in Fort Pierce.

Also released Monday were dozens of photographs investigators took inside the West Palm Beach home where the five defendants were arrested on Oct. 26. These photos show bags of cocaine, a 50 -gram "crack cookie," guns including an assault rifle, cash hidden inside a shoe, translucent plastic masks, black wigs and black ski masks.

One photo shows 18-year-old defendant Liana Lopez's student ID card for John I. Leonard High. That ID, along with her driver license, was sitting next to a Chanel makeup bag inside the house at 6458 Garden Court, in the gated Briar Bay community.

On Monday, another of the five defendants, Ricardo Sanchez Jr., was led by U.S. marshals into the federal courthouse in Fort Pierce where family members and friends packed one row in a courtroom to watch his attorney ask that he be released on bond.

Defense attorney Michael Cohen argued Sanchez, 23, has lived in Palm Beach County for more than a decade and has a wife and 3-year-old child.

"He apparently has an extensive family network in Palm Beach County," Cohen argued.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Ann Vitunac, however, said Sanchez was a flight risk and danger to the community and ordered he be held in jail without bail. Sanchez also pleaded not guilty to the indictment's single count of conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack cocaine.

Afterward, Sanchez's family declined to comment. No information about the homicide investigation was released during the hearing, and Cohen said he has not heard anything official about that investigation.

"I have no knowledge of him being involved," Cohen said of Sanchez.

Suspected drug ledgers and notebooks found in the Greenacres home where Jose Luis Escobedo Jr., 28, his wife, Yessica, 24, and sons Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3, lived before they were killed led investigators to the defendants now being held on drug charges. Investigators believe Escobedo was involved with cocaine trafficking, and items found in his home link him to Sanchez and defendants Daniel Troya, 23, Danny Varela, 26 and Lopez. Drug defendant Jose Gutierrez, 20, is not connected to the killings, officials say.

A federal magistrate on Friday denied Troya and Varela's requests for bond. The drug charges carry a maximum sentence of 10 years to life in prison.

Bond hearings for Lopez and Gutierrez have not been scheduled.

Grand Jury Indicts Four In Escobedo Case (STCN)

Scripps Treasure Coast Newspapers, November 7, 2006

FORT PIERCE — All four people described as "persons of interest" in the Escobedo family killings have been indicted on federal drug charges, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Monday.

Daniel Troya, 23, Daniel Varela, 26, Ricardo Sanchez, 23 and Liana Lopez, 18, were indicted by a grand jury in West Palm Beach on Friday on a single count each of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute crack cocaine, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Steve Carlton.

The charge carries a punishment of 10 years to life in prison and a fine up to $4 million.

The four also are suspected of being linked to the deaths of Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife Yessica, 25, and their two sons, Luis Damien, 4, and Luis Julian, 3, whose bodies were found on the side of Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie on Oct. 13.

No one has been charged in the killings, which authorities say were related to the theft of drugs and money.

A fifth man who is not linked to the homicide investigation also was indicted as part of the drug case.

All five charged in the drug investigation lived together in a sparsely furnished home in a gated community in West Palm Beach, where most of the bedrooms had only mattresses on the floor. Carlton said masks, wigs, gloves and handcuffs were found in a bedroom shared by Varela and Lopez that were believed to have been used in "drug rip-offs."

Troya and Varela were denied bail last week after being deemed dangerous to the community and flight risks. Sanchez went before a magistrate Monday and pleaded not guilty. He also was ordered held without bail.

Sanchez and Troya have been identified as the suspected gunmen, according to WPTV NewsChannel 5, which cited "reliable sources" in its report.

"I have no knowledge of him being involved," said Sanchez's attorney, Michael Cohen. "I've heard speculation, that's all."

Investigators were led to the drug operation by apparent references to several of the defendants in ledgers found in the Escobedo home, which recorded payments next to names, according to court records. Agents who raided the West Palm Beach home found a powder and crack cocaine, Ecstasy pills and guns.

In Sanchez's room, investigators found about half an ounce of cocaine powder. A crack cocaine "cookie," a large, round piece that is broken up into smaller pieces for sale, was found in a kitchen drawer in the house, along with wrapping material to pack cocaine, Carlton said.

Man Thought Connected To Turnpike Killings Denied Bond (AP)

AP, November 6, 2006

FORT PIERCE, Fla. - A federal magistrate denied bond Monday for a man considered a person of interest in the killings of a family of four found along Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie.

Ricardo Sanchez, 23, of suburban West Palm Beach, was arrested Oct. 26 on cocaine charges with four others. Police believe four of the five people arrested that same day are connected to the slayings of the family.

Sanchez also Monday entered a plea of not guilty on a charge of participating in a drug conspiracy, Michael Bruce Cohen, his attorney, said.

"It's very early on in the case. I really have no other information," Cohen said.

Two men arrested with Sanchez, Daniel Troya, 23, and Danny Varela, 26, were denied bond Friday. Two others, Liana Lopez, 18, and Jose Gutierrez, 20, have not had their bond hearings.

Lopez is considered a person of interest in the slayings, but police do not believe that Gutierrez had any connection to them.

All five are being held on drug charges. A federal grand jury in West Palm Beach on Friday indicted all five on one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 50 grams of crack cocaine. The charge carries a maximum penalty of 10 years to life in prison.

Killed in the Oct. 13 slaying were Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, his wife Yessica, 25, and their sons Luis Damian, 3 and Luis Julian, 4. The family was found shot to death. They had been living in Greenacres.

Medical Marijuana Remains In Legal Limbo (SDUT)

Prop. 215 approved by voters decade ago

Paul Cody has titanium rods jutting up either side of his spine. Without them, he couldn't sit upright in his wheelchair.

Over the years, doctors prescribed Vicodin, Valium and a medicine chest of other drugs to soothe his constant pain, but the narcotics killed his appetite and kept him awake at night. Until he started smoking marijuana, Cody could barely sit still for a movie.

Ten years ago, 56 percent of California voters decided that people with medical problems like Cody's should be able to grow and smoke marijuana on their physician's recommendation.

But the potential of Proposition 215, which conflicts squarely with federal laws that classify marijuana among the most dangerous drugs, has never been realized.

Thousands of California patients have no legal access to medical marijuana. Thousands of others worry they may be found out and arrested for cultivating too many plants or storing too much dried pot, because most cities and counties haven't passed the laws needed to regulate the dispensation of marijuana used for medical purposes.
